EVANS, P. J. The action was by E. Lewis Hill against M. D. Luke, Mrs. Ellen Luke, Warren J. Luke, W. Z. Luke, and Jim Johnson, to recover of them damages for a malicious prosecution and for abduction and alienation of the affections of his wife, Nora Hill, née Luke, the daughter of the defendants M. D. and Mrs. Ellen Luke. According to the evidence of the plaintiff he married Nora Luke on the night of the 6th or 7th of December, 1907. Agreeably to a previous arrangement she met the plaintiff at an appointed place near the home of her father, got in the buggy with him, and they drove off and were married by a minister. After the marriage they went to the home of a relative of plaintiff to spend the night. After they had been there two or three hours, and had retired, some of the defendants came, entered the house, struck matches, and looked over the house. They came to the bed where plaintiff and his wife were, pulled the cover, and, upon remonstrance from the plaintiff and demand to desist, made threats against him; one of them pretending to be the sheriff. They then began to entreat his wife to return home. The plaintiff remonstrated, telling them (one of whom was the brother of plaintiff's wife) that they were married, that she was his wife, and to let her alone. They replied that they had come to take her, dead or alive. The plaintiff was detained by some of the defendants, while others procured a warrant against him for kidnapping, and all of the defendants were acting in concert. The sheriff and one of the defendants then carried the plaintiff to the railroad station, from where he was carried by the sheriff and lodged in jail. His wife was taken in charge by the other defendants. She went away with them, and has never returned to him. He was given a commitment trial and bound over to await the action of the grand jury, who acquitted him by the return of a "no bill." The father and mother of plaintiff's wife had both told plaintiff that his wife was over 14 years of age at the time of his marriage to her, and it was "common talk in the family" that she was near 16 years of age. He introduced other evidence also tending to establish his contention that she was beyond the age of 14 years at the time of the marriage. The defendants denied liability, and also denied that they were actuated by any other motive than to find the minor daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Luke and restore her to her parents. They asserted that in the suing out of the warrant they acted under the advice of counsel, that the alleged marriage of Nora Luke to the plaintiff was illegal, because at the time the marriage ceremony was performed she was less than 14 years of age, and that the marriage had subsequently been annulled by a decree of court. There was a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendants made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled by the court, and they excepted.

[1] 1. Shortly after the marriage ceremony was performed between E. L. Hill and Nora Luke, the latter, by prochein ami, brought suit against the former to annul the marriage on the ground that she was under 14 years of age and incompetent in law to contract marriage. The suit eventuated in a decree of annulment of the marriage. The entire proceedings were introduced in evidence in this case, and the court ruled that the plaintiff was not concluded in the present action, by the decree of annulment, from showing that Nora Luke at the time of her alleged marriage was over the age of 14 years. The defendants excepted to this ruling, on the ground that the decree was conclusive on the plaintiff in the present suit that Nora Luke was under the age of 14 at the time of her alleged marriage to him. It is a general universal rule that estoppels must be mutual. Strangers can neither take advantage of, nor be bound by, an estoppel. Harris v. Amoskeag Lumber Co., 101 Ga. 643, 29 S. E. 302. A decree in a matrimonial suit fixing the status of the parties, in distinction from the specific findings therein, is to be regarded as a judgment quasi in rem. So far as the adjudication fixes the status of the parties, the judgment concludes both parties and strangers; but, beyond the adjudication of the status, the decree does not conclude strangers. Bigelow on Estoppel, 227. Our statute fixes the age of consent to marry in the female at 14 years; and while the ceremonial marriage performed between the female who has not reached this age and the man competent to contract marriage may be said to be void, yet the female, after reaching the consentable age, may affirm the marriage, and it is thereafter binding, and no new marriage is required. 1 Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, 577. Such marriages partake more of the nature of voidable than void marriages. They are imperfect marriages, which the party may affirm or disaffirm after reaching the age of consent. Hence, upon reason, a decree in a nullity suit because of the nonage of one of the parties should be treated as a decree of dissolution of a voidable marriage, so far as it affects strangers. The adjudication of the status is conclusive upon strangers but does not bind them upon causes of action springing from the marital relation prior to the decree. A divorce decree will not estop a party thereto from contesting with a stranger the truth of the grounds as affecting his liability in another suit upon a cause of action arising pending the divorce suit, but before the decree. In Corry v. Lackey, 105 Mich. 363, 63 N. W. 418, it was held that the fact that the defendant's wife procured a divorce from him on the ground of extreme cruelty will not conclude him from denying that he was guilty of cruelty, on an issue as to her justification for leaving him, raised in an action against him by a third person for necessities furnished the wife after she had left her husband and before getting her divorce. To the same effect is Burlen v. Shannon, 3 Gray (Mass.) 387, and Gill v. Read, 5 R. I. 343, 73 Am. Dec. 73. Beyond the legal effect of determining the status of the parties, the law applies as in other judicial proceedings, that a judgment is not conclusive in another suit, except in cases in which the same parties or their privies are litigating in regard to the same subject of controversy. The plaintiff in error is estopped by the decree of annulment from denying his matrimonial status; but in a cause of action against strangers, arising before the decree of annulment, based on the legality of his marriage, he is not estopped by the decree from contesting with them the truth of the grounds upon which the decree was prayed.

[2] 2. The court permitted the plaintiff to testify that it was common talk in the family that Nora Luke, at the time of his marriage to her, was nearly 16 years of age. Pedigree, including birth, may be proved by general repute in the family. Civil Code 1910, § 5764.

[3] 3. Exception is taken to the exclusion of the testimony of one of the defendants, to the effect that he acted on the advice of counsel in taking the course which he pursued. The testimony was relevant; but the error was harmless, because it appears from the brief of evidence that the same witness gave substantially the same testimony in another part of his evidence. Bertody v. Ison, 69 Ga. 317.

[4] 4. In charging on the subject of the effect of the advice of counsel, the court read Civil Code 1910, § 4958: "Clients shall not be relieved from their liability to damages and penalties imposed by law, on the ground that they acted under the advice of their counsel, but are entitled to redress from them for unskillful advice." The defendants introduced evidence that they acted on the advice of counsel, and the charge was not inappropriate to the case.

[8] 5. Complaint is made that the court failed to instruct the jury that a committal by the magistrate was an adjudication of the existence of probable cause for the prosecution of the plaintiff. The binding over of a defendant by a magistrate is prima facie, but not conclusive, evidence of probable cause. Lindsay v. West, 6 Ga. App. 284, 64 S. E. 1005. It was not error to fail to charge as contended, because an instruction that the committal of a defendant is an adjudication of probable cause is in effect a charge that it is conclusive on that subject.

[8] 6. The following excerpt from the court's charge to the jury on the subject of the impeachment of witnesses by proof of previous contradictory statements is criticised: "It is for you to say whether or not you believe the witnesses sought to be impeached or the witnesses introduced for the purpose of impeachment." It is contended that the charge amounted to an instruction that the jury had a right to arbitrarily disregard the testimony of a witness introduced for the purpose of impeachment. We do not think this criticism of the charge is merited. The impeachment of a witness by proof of contradictory statements involves the ascertainment by the jury if the witness attacked really made the statement, and, if he did make the alleged contradictory statement, its effect on his testimony. The excerpt related to the first of these propositions and was not erroneous. Price v. State, 137 Ga. —, 72 S. E. 908, decided November 14, 1911.

[7] 7. The charges on the subject of conspiracy and the measure of damages were neither inaccurate nor inapplicable. The authenticity of the letters were sufficiently identified to authorize their reception in evidence. The evidence warranted the verdict, and no error appears.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 246*)—ADVANCES—LIEN ON CROP.

The special lien of a landlord for supplies furnished to make the crop exists only against the particular crop which the supplies were furnished to make; but where the landlord at the beginning of a year advances to his tenant corn and similar products, and at the end of the year the tenant has on the place an adequacy of like products with which to repay the advancement, but needs them in order to make the next year's crop (the relation of landlord and tenant continuing for another year), and it is agreed between the landlord and the tenant that the latter, instead of delivering the products to his landlord, shall keep them and use them to make the second year's crop, and the tenant does so, the landlord has a lien as to them upon that year's crop.

Error from City Court of Lumpkin; M. T. Hickey, Judge.

Money rule between the Fletcher Guano Company and others and L. E. Vorus and others. From the judgment determining the validity of certain liens, the Fletcher Guano Company and others bring error. Affirmed.

G. Y. Harrell, for plaintiffs in error. T. T. James, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. The case arises on money rule to determine the rank and validity of certain liens claimed by various creditors upon the proceeds arising from judicial sale of the crops raised in the year 1910 by a tenant upon a plantation of Miss Vorus, the defendant in error. The case, as presented in this court, narrows to a single question: Did Miss Vorus have a valid landlord's lien for supplies? The facts are as follows: At the beginning of the year 1909 she furnished to this tenant corn, fodder, cotton seed, and cane, as crop supplies for that year. These articles were consumed, of course, during the year; but at the end of the year the tenant had enough corn, etc., to have replaced them. However, he was to remain on the place as a tenant for the year 1910, and would need these articles to make that year's crop. So it was agreed that he should keep them and repay out of his crop for 1910. For these things Miss Vorus claims the landlord's lien, and the other creditors say that she has no lien as to them, because the supplies were furnished for the crop of 1909, and not for the crop of 1910.

The ordinary rule among creditors is that equality is equity. Hence laws giving special liens are strictly construed, and the person claiming a special lien must show that he is plainly within the law under which he asserts it. Nevertheless, common sense must prevail as to this as well as to other propositions of law and of equity. The law gives a landlord a special lien on the crops of his tenant for such necessities as the landlord may furnish in order to make that crop. Back debts due from the tenant to the landlord cannot, by any agreement between the parties, be counted as advances to make any new crop. No tacking is to be allowed. No estoppel can raise the lien. Parks v. Simpson, 124 Ga. 523, 52 S. E. 616. Cf. Fountain v. Fountain, 7 Ga. App. 361, 66 S. E. 1020. And under the decision in Parks v. Simpson, supra, if the tenant at the end of the year 1909 had simply said to his landlord, "I can pay you now, but let the indebtedness go over, to be paid out of next year's crop," and the landlord had acquiesced, no lien would have arisen. But law and common sense both differentiate that case from the case at bar.

In this case the corn, etc., furnished the tenant in 1909 were to be repaid in kind (though, perhaps, that makes no great difference), and at the end of the year there was in the crib and other places of storage, ready to be delivered, if called for, more than enough corn, etc., to make the repayment. The landlord's agent went to the place to arrange this matter and to make contracts for the coming year. The rent for the year 1910 was agreed on. The landlord's agent said to the tenant, "I suppose you will need that corn, fodder, hay, cotton seed, and sugar cane in making another crop." The tenant replied in the affirmative. The agent then told him to go ahead and use it, and to repay it out of the 1910 crop. This transaction amounted to constructive delivery of the corn, etc., from the tenant to the landlord, and redelivery from the landlord to the tenant. If there had not been enough of these articles on hand to repay the landlord, the case would be entirely different. There could be no constructive delivery of a shortage; nor could there be a delivery of supplies to make the 1910 crop, by construction or otherwise, through counting a failure to pay for 1909 supplies, or the debt arising from the failure to pay as if it were supplies for 1910. But here the supplies, the things necessary to make the 1910 crop, were on hand at the very place where the tenant could most expediently use them.

It was not necessary, in order to satisfy the law and to create a lien, that the tenant should put the corn out of the crib, move the fodder stack, tear up the cane bed, and go through some form of trying to put them into the landlord's hands, and then have the landlord turn them back into his hands, whereupon he would have to put the corn back into the crib, move the fodder stack back, and bed the cane again. This would be nonsense. People would laugh at the law if it required any such thing. The law recognizes constructive delivery in such cases, just as people do. The trial judge held correctly.

Judgment affirmed.

I. S. Peebles, Jr., and T. F. Harrison, for plaintiff in error. B. B. McCowen, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Upon the hearing the judge of the superior court entered a judgment sustaining the certiorari, with cost against the defendant in certiorari. No final direction was given to the case, and though the judge of the superior court, in his discretion, might have instructed the lower court upon the principles which should govern another trial, this duty was not mandatory. The sustaining of a certiorari, without the entry of a final disposition of the case, has the same effect as the granting of a new trial upon motion therefor.

There were several errors in the trial in the justice's court, any one of which would have authorized the judge to sustain the certiorari. Nothing is better settled than the principle announced in Fair v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, 2 Ga. App. 376, 58 S. E. 492: "Unless the judgment rendered is absolutely demanded by the evidence, the first grant of a new trial on certiorari will not be interfered with." The case at bar seems to be controlled by the ruling in Rhodes Furniture Company v. Jenkins, 2 Ga. App. 475, 58 S. E. 897; but from the testimony in the record there is some question as to which party rescinded the contract. Another trial may more satisfactorily resolve this doubt in favor of one party or the other.

Error from City Court of La Grange; Frank Harwell, Judge.

T. G. Landreth was convicted of a violation of the prohibitory law and brings error. Affirmed.

M. U. Mooty, for plaintiff in error. Henry Reeves, Sol., for the State.

HILL, C. J. Plaintiff in error was convicted of a violation of the prohibition law in keeping on hand at his place of business intoxicating liquor, and, his motion for a new trial being overruled, he brings the case here solely on the general grounds.

On Sunday morning a policeman of the city of La Grange saw the accused enter his place of business, and in a few minutes thereafter a negro also entered. The officer went into the store and told the accused that he had a search warrant for whisky that he believed was in the store, and the accused thereupon took from a thread case four pints of whisky, two of rye and two of corn, and handed them to the officer. The policeman testified that the accused appeared to be coming out of the store just as he (the policeman) entered. The accused explained the possession of the whisky by stating that his wife was sick and that he had gotten the whisky that morning from two negroes, and that he had come by the store for the purpose of getting some money to pay for medicine which he intended to procure for his wife. The ingenious counsel for plaintiff in error suggests to this court two reasons why he thinks the verdict in this case was contrary to law. First, he says that there was no keeping on hand of the whisky at the defendant's place of business, and the whisky was temporarily in the place of business while in transit to the sick wife of the accused; and, second, that the storehouse was not the place of business of the defendant on Sunday as on that day it was closed to public access.

The first point assumes that the accused told the truth in his statement in accounting for the presence of the whisky at his storehouse. The jury probably did not give the same faith to this statement, and in view of the circumstances there was some ground for this incredulity. If the whisky was simply in transit, only waiting for a few minutes for the accused to get the money, it is somewhat singular that he should have placed it in the thread case, and should have been leaving the store when the officer entered. It is more reasonable to believe that, if his statement was the truth, he would have made some temporary deposit while he got the money, and would have taken the whisky with him when he left the store. In other words, there was no evidence that the whisky was simply in transit, but there were circumstances that justified the jury in believing that the whisky was kept on hand at the place of business. The majority of this court in Cohen v. Sate, 7 Ga. App. 6, 85 S. E. 1096, held that a mere temporary keeping of whisky at a place of business was a violation of this part of the statute.

2. The second point urged by counsel also depends upon the statement of the accused. The jury under the evidence could very well have found that the whisky, although found in the store on Sunday, was probably there on Saturday, and would probably be there on Monday. Irrespective, however, of this question, we do not subscribe to the logic of the proposition that a man's place of business ceases to be a place of business on Sunday. We are inclined to the opinion that it remains his place of business on Sunday, although the law prohibits him from transacting his business there on that day. We are clear that the evidence fully supports the verdict, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

The plea in this case made the evidence of the absent witness immaterial as to some part of it, and inadmissible as to the other part, and there was no error in refusing the continuance. Richter v. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1099)—SECOND TRIAL—LAW OF THE CASE.

Where this court, upon exception to nonsuit, passes on the legal sufficiency of the evidence, and it is held sufficient to support a verdict in the plaintiff's favor, and upon a retrial of the case on substantially the same evidence a verdict for the plaintiff is rendered, and the case is brought to this court again with no new question presented, but on the sole assignment of error that the verdict is without evidence to support it, it is the duty of this court to affirm the judgment, with damages.

Action by H. A. Holliman against Washington County. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

T. W. Evans and Hardwick & Wright, for plaintiff in error. Evans & Evans, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. When this case was here before (8 Ga. App. 718, 70 S. E. 100) on exception to nonsuit, we held that whether the defendant was guilty of negligence and whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence were jury questions, under the evidence as then presented. The evidence in the present record is substantially the same, though, perhaps, a little stronger in the plaintiff's favor. The retrial of the case resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. The only exception is that the verdict is contrary to the evidence. Even if it were likely that this court would change its views so soon on the questions presented alike by the former and the present records, it has not the right or legal power to do so, so far as affects this case. The plaintiff in error certainly could not have hoped for any benefit, other than delay, from bringing the case to this court. As we cannot escape the conclusion that the case is brought for delay only, it is our duty to award damages.

Judgment affirmed, with damages.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 823*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CURING ERROR.

Where, in a prosecution for disorderly conduct, the evidence only showed that defendant, in a public street, called another a liar, precipitating a difficulty, an instruction, making defendant's conviction depend on whether his language was disorderly conduct or the use of profane language to the annoyance of a citizen, was cured by another charge that the only question was the manner in which defendant addressed complainant when he called him a liar, and that if he approached complainant in an insulting manner defendant was guilty, and should be punished, etc., but that if he called complainant a liar in a cool and reserved way he was not guilty; which was too favorable to defendant.

4. DISORDERLY CONDUCT (§ 12*)—DEFENSES—JUSTIFICATION—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in a prosecution for disorderly conduct in calling a police officer a liar in a public street, there was evidence that abusive language of the officer, uttered outside the course of his duty, provoked defendant to use language no more disorderly or abusive than that used by the officer, the court should charge that, if defendant's language was provoked by the conduct of the officer outside the course of his duty, the officer was not justified in arresting accused without a warrant for such offense.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Georgetown County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

C. Le Roy Scurry was convicted of disorderly conduct, and he appeals. Reversed.

Walter Hazard, for appellant. Walter H. Wells, Sol., and James W. Wingate, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The appellant, C. Le Roy Scurry, was convicted by a jury in the court of the recorder, in the city of Georgetown, under the charge of violating the following ordinance: "That any and every person guilty of disorderly or drunken conduct or all parties assisting to produce any riot, or in any way maliciously or mischievously disturbing the peace and good order of the town, or using any profane or obscene language, to the annoyance of any citizen, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not exceeding ($12.00) twelve dollars for each offense, nor less than ($5.00) five dollars, or to be confined in the county jail for not exceeding ten days." The specification of the offense is thus set out in the warrant: " * * * That at Georgetown, in said state, on the 23d day of May, A. D. 1911, Le Roy Scurry, in the city of Georgetown, S. C., did disorderly and unlawfully conduct himself, in that he (the said Scurry) did resist a lawful arrest by striking and fighting an officer of the said city, duly authorized to make arrest, and refused to submit to the said arrest, then and there being lawfully made. * * * "

[1] The circuit court affirmed the judgment of the recorder's court. The case turned mainly on the issue whether the defendant was guilty of such disorderly conduct on the street as to justify the chief of police in arresting him without a warrant. L. L. Bolick, chief of police, thus testified against the defendant: "On last Tuesday morning, in the forenoon, Mr. Scurry, the sheriff, and I were talking. We first started talking on the sidewalk, and afterwards I got in my buggy. Mr. Le Roy Scurry came up while we were talking, and said these words: 'I told you in the recorder's court that you were a liar, and I still say you are a liar.' Then I appealed to his father, and told him I would not stand for that; if he called me a liar again, I would arrest him. Afterwards Le Roy said: 'Chief, I told you that you and Spry both lied, and I mean it.' I then started towards him, and he began to strike me several times about the body and arm. If he ever struck me in the face, I didn't feel it. I had him about the neck with my left arm, and his father, Mr. Scurry, got hold of my right hand; then Mr. Tom Skinner came up, and said: 'Mr. Bolick, I will hold Le Roy, turn him loose'—and I then got loose from the sheriff, and told him not to put his hands on me any more, and I turned around as if I was going towards Le Roy, and Mr. Scurry said: 'Don't arrest him; I will put up a bond for him'—and I charged him with $10 bond, and I told him I also wanted $10 fine."

The defendant did not testify, but the account given on his behalf by C. W. Scurry, his father, was as follows: "On last Tuesday morning, somewhere about noon, Mr. Tommy Skinner and I called into Mr. Smith's office to sign a bond. When I came out of the office, I saw the Chief, and I walked up to shake hands with him, and asked him had any excitement taken place during my visit, and he said: 'Everything is quiet; reasonably so.' 'You haven't had any trouble at all?' 'Only Le Roy tried to take charge of the town since you were gone. His mother told me that Mrs. Doar had the cow locked up; that was all I heard.' He then told me what was done, and said Le Roy went on ridiculous, and also had lied. I said: 'Well, Le Roy is a boy, and is hot-headed, I know; but I didn't know he was a liar.' Mr. Bolick said: 'He lied, and we made him admit it on cross-examination at the recorder's court.' About that time Le Roy walked up, and said: 'Chief, I told you that you were a liar, and why do you continue lying?' Mr. Bolick said: 'I am not going to stand for it.' And I said, 'Chief, there is no use of this,' and finally he got out of his buggy. I don't remember what he said. Le Roy said: 'I told you that you and Spry lied, and I mean it.' Chief got out of his buggy, and they commenced fighting. He said: 'I am going to lock this young man up; I have been watching him quite a while.' And I said, 'I will furnish bond for him,' and Chief still said, 'I am going to lock him up.' Tom Skinner came up about that time, and grabbed hold of Le Roy and pulled them apart. I said: 'If you want a bond, just say so; but you cannot lock him up to-day.' And then Mr. Bolick stated that he wanted $10 for bond. I went in my office and got the $10, and gave it to him. He then said: 'I want $10 fine,' and I went in and got it from some one and gave it to him."

The scene of the disorder was immediately in front of the courthouse, and John Harrison, a witness for the defendant, testified that he heard the abusive language of the defendant in the aisle of the courthouse, where he was engaged in conversation. In view of this testimony, it seems to us clear that the appeal cannot be sustained on the ground that there was no evidence to sustain the conviction for the offense charged.

[2, 3] In his charge to the jury, the recorder made the question of Scurry's violation of the ordinance depend entirely on whether his language in the street was disorderly conduct, or the using of profane language to the annoyance of any citizen. It was in effect an instruction that the defendant could not be convicted of resisting an officer, if his language was not such as to warrant the officer in making the arrest. It is true that profane language is language irreverent toward God or holy things, and the recorder erred in charging the jury that calling a man a liar in an insulting manner would be using profane language. But we think the error was cured when, in concluding his charge, the recorder thus submitted but one issue to the jury: "The one question for you all to decide is the manner in which Mr. Scurry addressed Mr. Bolick when he called him a liar. If it is plain to your minds, jurors, that Mr. Scurry approached Mr. Bolick in an insulting manner while he was addressing his father, which would cause

Mr. Bolick or any citizen not in uniform to resent it by a fight, Mr. Scurry is guilty, and should be punished. If, on the other hand, Mr. Scurry felt that Mr. Bolick was saying something detrimental to his character, and called him a liar in a cool and reserved way, Mr. Scurry is not guilty and should not be punished." The evidence of defendant's own witness tended to show that the language used by him was very abusive, and loud enough to be heard by persons passing along the street. It was too favorable to the defendant to charge that such language would not justify arrest, unless it was calculated to bring on a fight.

[4] There is one point on which we think the recorder committed a fatal error. There was evidence on the part of the defendant from which the jury might have drawn the inference that the abusive language of the chief of police, uttered entirely outside the course of his duty, provoked the defendant to use language no more disorderly or abusive than that used by the officer. A police officer who goes out of the course of his duty, and speaks so abusively of a citizen, in his presence, as to elicit language in reply which is no more disorderly, either in substance or in manner, than the language of the officer provoking it, is not justified in arresting, without warrant, the citizen for disorderly conduct in using the abusive language. The recorder should have given an instruction to this effect, as requested by defendant's counsel.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1022*)—FINDINGS OF REFEREE—CONCLUSIVENESS.

An action to recover possession of land, defended on the ground that the deed from defendant to plaintiff was fraudulent, is an action at law, and the court at law may declare the deed a nullity, and the findings of fact of the referee approved by the trial court are not reviewable in the Supreme Court on appeal.

5. REFERENCE (§ 100*)—REPORT OF REFEREE—CONCLUSIONS OF LAW AND STATEMENTS OF FACT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 294, 295, requiring referees to report within 60 days from the final submission of the action to them, and in default thereof either party may serve notice on the opposite party that he elects to end the reference, a party who does not end the reference by notice to the opposite party may not complain of the failure of the referee to file his report within the specified time.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Calhoun County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by William F. Stack against Angeline Haigler. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jacob Moorers, for appellant. Moss & Lide, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action to recover the possession of a tract of land, containing about 30 acres. The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and alleged that the deed from the defendant to the plaintiff was fraudulent and without moral or legal consideration. The case was referred to a special referee, whose findings of fact and conclusions of law were in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant filed exceptions to the report of the referee, but they were overruled and the report was confirmed, whereupon he appealed to this court.

The first question that will be considered, is raised by the following exception: "The circuit judge erred in overruling the following exception to the report of the referee: (1) Because the report herein is void for the reason that Hon. Robert E. Copes, referee herein, was at the time of filing the report herein, to wit, the 1st day of April, 1911, and for some time before that date, a duly qualified judge of the circuit courts of this state, and as such judge, he was without authority to file the report in this case. This was error, because filing the report of a referee is an official act of a referee, and, when done by a circuit judge, it is in violation of article 5, § 9, of the Constitution of 1895 of this state."

Section 9, art. 5, of the Constitution, provides that: "Judges shall not be allowed any fees or perquisites of office, nor shall they hold any other office of trust or profit, under this state."

[1] Section 295 of the Code contains the provision that "no judge or justice of any court, shall sit as referee in any action, in the court of which he is judge or justice, and not already referred, unless the parties otherwise stipulate." The words "and not already referred" were intended to apply to just such a case, as the one now under consideration.

[3] There is another reason, why this exception cannot be sustained. His honor Judge Copes unquestionably acted in good faith, and under a supposed authority to file the report, after his election and qualification as a judge. In filing the report he was a de facto officer for that purpose, and, therefore, must be regarded as clothed with proper authority to make the report. Cromer v. Bolnest, 27 S. C. 436, 3 S. E. 849.

[4] These exceptions assigning error on the part of his honor the presiding judge, in sustaining the referee's findings of fact, must be overruled for the reason, that the issue of title is legal in its nature, and the findings of fact thereon, are not reviewable by this court. Peeples v. Cummings, 45 S. C. 107, 22 S. E. 730; Peeples v. Warren, 51 S. C. 560, 29 S. E. 659; Johnson v. Jones, 72 S. C. 270, 51 S. E. 805; Gunter v. Fallow, 78 S. C. 457, 59 S. E. 70.

The same principle is applicable to the issue of fraud, alleged in the answer. The court of equity has not exclusive jurisdiction in cases of fraud. Miller v. Hughes, 33 S. C. 530, 12 S. E. 419; Dubose v. Kell, 76 S. C. 313, 56 S. E. 968. And in an action to recover possession of land, when it is alleged that the deed of conveyance, upon which the plaintiff relies is fraudulent, it is not necessary to invoke the equitable aid of the court, as a court of law, for the purposes of the issue then pending may, declare the deed a nullity. McKenzie v. Sifford, 45 S. C. 496, 23 S. E. 622; Griffin v. Ry., 66 S. C. 77, 44 S. E. 562; Hodges v. Kohn, 67 S. C. 69, 45 S. E. 102.

[5] The next question for consideration is whether the circuit judge erred in refusing to recommit the report of the referee, on the ground that the facts found and the conclusions of law are not stated separately. This requirement of section 294 of the Code is merely directory, and the proper practice "was not to except because of the omission, but to move for a recommitment of the report, that it might be reproduced in the desired form." Bollmann v. Bollmann, 6 S. C. 29; Charleston v. Cauldfield, 19 S. C. 201.

[6] Furthermore, as the findings of fact are not the subject of review by this court, even if there was error, it was not prejudicial.

[7] We proceed to consider whether there was error in refusing to set aside the report, on the ground that it was not filed within 60 days after the reference was closed.

Section 294 of the Code provides that "masters or referees shall make and file with the clerks of the courts of common pleas, of their respective counties, their reports within sixty days, from the time the action shall be finally submitted to them, and, in default thereof, they shall not be entitled to any fees." Section 295 contains the following provision: "The referee or referees shall make and deliver a report, within sixty days from the time the action shall be finally submitted; and, in default thereof, and before the report is delivered, either party may serve notice on the opposite party, that he elects to end the reference; and thereupon the action shall proceed, as though no reference had been ordered, and the referees shall not in such case, be entitled to any fees." The defendant did not undertake to end the reference, by serving a notice to that effect, on the opposite party. Furthermore, where the delay is not attributable to the laches of a party to the action, he shall not be made to suffer, by reason of the action of the court, in causing the delay. State v. Fullmore, 47 S. C. 34, 24 S. E. 1026.

[8] The next question for consideration is presented by the following exception: "Because the circuit judge erred in refusing defendant's motion to recommit the report of the referee, which motion was as follows: 'Defendant moves for leave to prove the loss of the written agreement, between her and plaintiff in this action and the contents thereof, and also moves for leave and extension of time to give notice to plaintiff's counsel to produce any and all receipts and papers in the case that may be specified in said notice.' The refusal of this motion was greatly prejudicial to the defendant's cause, in that she was denied the right to prove that she had paid the mortgage in question, and did not owe the amount as testified to by the plaintiff."

The appellant has failed to show that there was an abuse of discretion on the part of the circuit judge, and this exception is overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by Robert B. Sanders against the Southern Railway, Carolina Division. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Logan & Grace, for appellant. Jos. W. Barnwell, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. This is an appeal from an order of nonsuit in an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff, as the result of the alleged negligent, reckless, and wanton conduct of defendant in operating a train of cars, which struck plaintiff, knocked him down and ran over his leg, crushing it so that it had to be cut off. At the close of plaintiff's testimony, the defendant moved for a nonsuit upon two grounds: (1) Because there was no evidence of recklessness or wantonness; (2) because, as to the cause of action for negligence, under the evidence, plaintiff was a trespasser in defendant's switchyard, and defendant owed him no duty, except not to recklessly or wantonly injure him. The presiding judge sustained the first ground, but overruled the second, holding that the evidence made an issue whether plaintiff was not a licensee and entitled to ordinary care to prevent injury to him. But he granted the nonsuit on two grounds: (1) That there was no evidence of negligence, saying that the negligence complained of was in operating the train at a high rate of speed, and that the only evidence of the speed of the train was that of the plaintiff, who said that he neither saw nor heard the train, and, therefore, he could not testify as to its speed; (2) that plaintiff's injury was caused by his own negligence in walking on or near the track when there was room enough for him to walk at a safe distance from it. These rulings are made the grounds of exceptions; and the defendant, according to proper practice, gave notice that this court would be asked to sustain the nonsuit upon the second ground upon which it was moved for on circuit.

[1] Appellant's contention that respondent is not entitled to have the second ground upon which the motion for nonsuit was based on circuit considered by this court, as a sustaining ground is untenable. The cases cited in support of his position hold merely that a nonsuit will not be sustained by this court on additional grounds which were not presented to the circuit court. In Lewis v. Hinson, 64 S. C. 578, 43 S. E. 15, the court did consider an additional ground to sustain a nonsuit; but in that case, as in this, the ground considered was one which had been presented to the circuit court. In Kennedy v. Greenville, 78 S. C. 127, 58 S. E. 990, the court does say: "It is well settled that a nonsuit cannot be sustained on grounds additional to those on which it was granted." Standing alone, this statement of the rule is inaccurate, and is susceptible of a meaning which was not intended by the court, as appears from a consideration of the opinion as a whole, for on the next page, the court stated the rule, correctly thus: "Hence we hold that the motion for a nonsuit must stand or fall upon the grounds set forth in the motion."

[2] As the case will have to go back for a new trial, we will not discuss the testimony more than is necessary to sustain our conclusion; and, in what we shall say, we must not be understood as expressing any opinion as to the sufficiency of the evidence to prove the facts in issue, or as to whether the inferences which we suggest might have been drawn from the testimony should be drawn. What inferences should be drawn are exclusively for the jury. But we merely hold that there was some testimony tending to support plaintiff's case, and, therefore, that the nonsuit was improper.

[3] Plaintiff's testimony tended to show that he was struck while walking alongside of defendant's track in a well-beaten path at a place where the general public had been accustomed to walk for many years, without any objection from defendant; that the train which struck him was running backwards, at the rate of from 12 to 20 miles an hour, through a populous section of the city of Charleston at a place where men, women, and children were constantly passing and re-passing along defendant's right of way and upon and near its tracks; that the train ran upon him from behind, without any signal or warning of its approach being given. We think this testimony made out a prima facie case for plaintiff. From it the jury might reasonably have inferred that the use of its right of way by the public was known to and acquiesced in by defendant, and, therefore, that plaintiff was a licensee and entitled to ordinary care on the part of defendant to prevent injury to him; and, also, from the frequency of the use by the general public, that defendant should have anticipated the presence of persons on or near its tracks at that place, and should have exercised due care to prevent injury to them. Jones v. Railway, 61 S. C. 556, 39 S. E. 758; Matthews v. Railway, 67 S. C. 499, 46 S. E. 335, 65 L. R. A. 286; McKeown v. Railroad Co., 68 S. C. 483, 47 S. E. 713; Goodwin v. Railroad Co., 82 S. C. 321, 64 S. E. 242; Bamberg v. Railroad Co., 72 S. C. 389, 51 S. E. 988; Lamb v. Railroad Co., 86 S. C. 106, 67 S. E. 958, 138 Am. St. Rep. 1030.

In the Jones Case, the court said: "Even though the use of the track by the public as a walkway was not for such length of time nor of such character as to give a legal right to so use the track, and even though the evidence fell short of showing any positive consent to such use by the company, yet if there was evidence tending to show knowledge of any acquiescence in such use without protest, such evidence would tend to show that the railroad company had much reason to expect the presence of persons upon the track, who were there not as bald trespassers, but using it with the knowledge and acquiescence of the company, under such circumstances it would be the duty of the railroad company to keep a reasonable lookout, or to give warning of the approach of the train, or generally to observe ordinary care under the circumstances to avoid injury." In the Matthews Case, the court said: "But where a railroad company allows the public to use its right of way for a long time at a particular place in a large town so continuously and frequently that it becomes a well-beaten or clearly defined path, plain and open, a reasonable man may well infer that he will not encounter unguarded cuts and the other dangers of the ordinary path along the railroad track. In such a case, the owner of the property knows and acquiesces in the use, and by his acquiescence those wishing to go in that direction are lured into a sense of safety in following the course obviously taken by those who have preceded them. If the owners, or those in control of the property, fail to observe ordinary care in avoiding injury to persons who travel the path, relying on the safety suggested by the implied invitation, they must be held responsible." This doctrine was reaffirmed in each of the other cases above cited and it is the settled law of this state.

But in its second ground of the motion for nonsuit and in its argument in this court, defendant seeks to bring this case within the principle upon which the cases of Hale v. Railroad Co., 34 S. C. 292, 13 S. E. 537, and Haltiwanger v. Railroad Co., 64 S. C. 7, 41 S. E. 810, were decided. The facts upon which those cases were decided were somewhat alike, but not so nearly so that the Hale Case cannot be distinguished from the Haltiwanger Case, and also from the cases above cited and from this case, but the Haltiwanger Case cannot be reconciled with the cases above cited, and therefore it and the Hale Case, in so far as they are at variance with those cases, are no longer to be considered as authority.

The defendant contends that this case should be distinguished from the Jones Case and those following it, on the ground that, in this case, the accident occurred in defendant's switchyard, where there were numerous tracks upon which cars and trains were being constantly switched, and therefore the danger to pedestrians was so great and obvious that it cannot be reasonably inferred that defendant acquiesced in the use of its switchyard by them. There is some force in this contention, and it is supported by high authority. The same rule that was announced in the Jones Case prevails in the state of Georgia, yet the courts of that state hold that it is not applicable to cases where the injury occurs in the railroad company's switchyard. This exception to the rule is based by the Georgia courts upon the ground that the continuous use of the tracks in a switchyard for switching purposes and the obvious and peculiar dangers to pedestrians there are inconsistent with an inference that the company has impliedly invited or licensed persons to use the yard as a walkway. Waldrop v. Georgia R. & Banking Co., 7 Ga. App. 342, 66 S. E. 1030.

We think, however, that ordinarily the question whether the company knew of and acquiesced in such use of its right of way, whether it be in the switchyard or elsewhere on the right of way, is one of fact to be determined by the jury. In the Matthews Case the court said: "It is, of course, always a question for the jury to determine whether the way was so plain and so constantly used, with the acquiescence and consent of the owner, as to imply an invitation to the public to enter."

[4] Of course, the testimony tending to support the allegation of knowledge and acquiescence on the part of the company may be susceptible of only one inference, and, in that event, the court should declare what that inference is. But, as in other cases, where more than one inference can be reasonably drawn from the testimony, the jury must be allowed to say what inference should be drawn. We held, in the Lamb Case, that the obvious danger of attempting to walk across a river on a high railroad bridge, a quarter of a mile long, over which trains were frequently passing when the company had posted a notice forbidding such use of the bridge, was fatal to any reasonable inference of acquiescence on the part of the company in such use of its bridge. In that case, the court said: "When a railroad company or other owner of dangerous property warns persons against its use, those who insist on incurring the peril of using it, however numerous they may be, have no right to charge the owner with acquiescence in the use." But in this case, there was testimony that, for more than 35 years, the defendant's right of way at the place where plaintiff was hurt had been used by plaintiff and the public generally as a footway, without let or hindrance, and that no sign or notice had ever been posted forbidding such use. We think, therefore, that there was no error in overruling the second ground of the motion for nonsuit.

[6] His honor erred in holding that the rate of speed was the negligence complained of. The complaint charges negligence in that "said train of cars approached said traveled place or walkway and populous part of the city of Charleston at a high and dangerous rate of speed, and without giving any signal by ringing the bell so that the said plaintiff might have been made aware of the approach of said train of cars, or taking any precautions whatever to avoid injuring said plaintiff, so that said plaintiff was unaware of the approach of said train of cars."

[8] Considering plaintiff's testimony as a whole, we think the issue as to the speed of the train should have gone to the jury. At a previous trial, when he was asked at what speed the train was moving, plaintiff answered: "Judging from the way it hit me, I should judge it was not less than 12 to 15 miles an hour." This was brought out on his cross-examination at this trial, because, in his direct examination at this trial, he testified that the speed of the train was "at least about 12 to 15 or 20 miles." At this trial, however, he gave no reason for his estimate of the speed, except as it may be involved in his answer at the former trial. But he testified that he did not lose consciousness when he was run over by the train, and he did not say that he did not see or hear the train after it struck him. His estimate of its speed may have been based upon what he saw and heard of it at the time it struck him and was passing over him and after it had passed over him. Sometimes we reach correct conclusions without being able to give satisfactory reasons for them. Inasmuch as plaintiff testified positively as to the speed of the train, and although he assigned a reason at the former trial for his estimate of the speed which may have been faulty, we are not prepared to say that his testimony on this point is entitled to no weight at all. It should have been submitted to the jury for what it was worth.

[7] We think his honor erred also in holding that plaintiff was guilty of negligence in walking too close to the track when there was room enough for him to walk at a safe distance from it. The testimony was that he was walking in a well-defined path. From this, the jury might have inferred that the path had been used by many people before, and that in walking where many others had gone before, plaintiff was exercising ordinary care. In Lamb's Case, the court said: "In the cases cited (that is, the Jones Case and those following it), it was entirely consistent with reason to say that it was not negligence per se for a person to walk on the right of way expecting to step off on the approach of a train." See, also, Matthews v. Railway, supra, and Sentell v. Railway, 70 S. C. 183, 49 S. E. 215.

MACKORELL BROS. v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.†

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 73*)—TELEGRAPH MESSAGES—TRANSMISSION—FORWARDING BY TELEPHONE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where the addressee of a telegraph message had a direct telephone connecting with one of defendant's intermediate offices from which the message could not be sent by telegraph to destination because of a strike of the operator located there, whether it was defendant's duty to forward the telegram from such intermediate point to the addressee by telephone was for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 76; Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 38*)—TRANSMISSION OF MESSAGES—DELAY.

It was the duty of a telegraph company, as soon as it discovered that its office at the destination of a commercial message was closed, to promptly notify the sender so that he might take further steps in the premises to protect his interests.

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 38*)—MESSAGES—TRANSMISSION—DELAY.

The fact that defendant's telegraph office at the destination of a commercial message was closed because the operator had gone on the strike did not excuse a delay of two days in delivering the message by mail, in the absence of proof that the strike was not brought about by the telegraph company's fault or negligence, and that it exercised due care and diligence to supply the place of the striking operator.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County: J. W. De Vore, Judge.

Action by Mackorell Bros. against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Geo. W. S. Hart and John R. Hart, for appellants. John Gary Evans and Thos. F. McDow, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. On August 20, 1907, plaintiffs, who are wholesale grocers, filed with defendant's agent at Yorkville, S. C., a night message, addressed to the Dunlop Milling Company, at Clarksville, Tenn., as follows: "Book two thousand barrels same price as last contract." The addressee was engaged in the manufacture and sale of flour, and the telegram was an order for 2,000 barrels at $4.75 each, that being the price at which the company had last sold plaintiffs flour. According to the testimony, the custom of the trade is that if an order, like the one sent by plaintiffs, is accepted, no notice of acceptance is given, and where no reply to such an offer is received, the party making it regards it as accepted and acts accordingly. Receiving no reply, plaintiffs regarded their offer as accepted and sold flour to their customers on a basis of $4.75 per barrel, for which they had to pay $4.95 in the market to fill their contracts. If their telegram had been promptly delivered on the morning of the 21st, as it should have been, in due course, plaintiffs' order would have been accepted, but if it had been declined, they would have been notified, according to the custom of the trade, and they could and would have bought the flour elsewhere at the price which they offered the Dunlop Milling Company. The message was transmitted to Nashville, Tenn., by telegraph, but, on account of a strike among defendant's employees, the defendant's office at Clarksville, was closed, and the agent at Nashville forwarded it to the milling company by mail. On receipt of it, on August 22d, the milling company declined to accept it, and so notified plaintiffs. There was a telephone line between Nashville and Clarksville, and the addressee had a telephone in its office connected with that line. The message could have been telephoned from Nashville directly to the addressee. Defendant sent no service message notifying plaintiffs that its Clarksville office was closed, or of its failure to promptly transmit and deliver the message. When the message was filed, plaintiffs knew that there was a strike among defendant's employees and that some of its offices were closed on that account, but did not know the Clarksville office was closed. The testimony was conflicting as to whether plaintiffs were informed, when the message was filed, that it would be received only "subject to indefinite delay" on account of the strike.

This action was brought to recover damages alleged to have resulted to plaintiffs on account of the failure to deliver the message promptly. Under the instructions given them, the jury found for the defendant, in whose favor judgment was duly entered.

[1] The circuit judge erred in charging the jury that it was not the defendant's duty to telephone the message from Nashville to the addressee. This instruction was based upon a misapprehension by his honor of the decision of this court in the case of Hellams v. Tel. Co., 70 S. C. 83, 49 S. E. 12. In that case, the telegram was sent from Greenville, S. C., to Hellams, who was on Sullivan's Island, near Charleston, S. C. The island was connected with the city of Charleston by steamboats and also by a telephone line, but Hellams had no telephone in his house. On the back of the blank upon which the message was written were the following words: "And this company is hereby made the agent of the sender without liability to forward any message over the lines of any other company when necessary to reach its destination." Construing this language, the circuit judge instructed the jury that if defendant could have forwarded the message by telephone and failed to do so, they should find for plaintiff, if they also found that due care and diligence in the transmission of the message required the forwarding thereof by telephone. On appeal, this court held that this instruction was erroneous, holding that the words in the contract above quoted, "the lines of any other company," meant the lines of any other telegraph company, and not the lines of any telephone company. The court also held that, as the proof showed that Hellams had no telephone in his house, to impose on defendant the duty of forwarding the message by telephone would have required the intervention of some third person through whom it would have had to be conveyed to Hellams, which would have impaired the confidential relations assumed in the handling of the telegram. In this case, the message could have been telephoned directly to the addressee, without in the slightest degree impairing the confidential relations assumed in undertaking to deliver it. The court should have left it to the jury to say whether, under the circumstances, due care and diligence in the transmission and delivery of the message required defendant to forward it from Nashville to Clarksville by telephone. In Sullivan v. Tel. Co., 82 S. C. 569, 64 S. E. 752, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1214, 129 Am. St. Rep. 903, this court said: "It is the duty, however, of these companies, where they have been thus interfered with (that is, by a strike) to make a reasonable effort to transmit the telegram by other lines or other means, and on failure to do so, they will be held liable for all losses suffered."

notify plaintiffs, as soon as it discovered that it could not deliver the message promptly on account of the office at Clarksville being closed, so that they might take such further steps in the premises as they might have deemed necessary for the protection of their interests.

[3] The mere fact that the Clarksville office was closed, because the operative there had gone on a strike, does not excuse the delay. Before it can avail itself of that defense, the burden is upon the defendant to prove that the strike was not brought about by its own fault or negligence, and that it exercised due care and diligence to supply the place of the striking employé. Jones on T. & T. Cos. §§ 361, 365.

Defendant seeks to sustain the judgment on the ground that the court should have directed the verdict in its favor. As there was some evidence in support of the facts hereinbefore stated, there was no error in refusing to direct the verdict. Lathan v. Telegraph Co., 75 S. C. 129, 55 S. E. 134.

Judgment reversed.

GARY, C. J., concurs.

WOODS, J. (concurring in the result). I concur in reversing the judgment and in the reasoning of the opinion except in one particular. When delay in the carriage of goods or in the transmission and delivery of telegraph messages is due to a strike of the carrier's employes, the question whether the burden is on the carrier to prove that the strike was not brought about by its own negligence is a difficult and important one which seems not to be settled by a controlling current of authority. The point is not made in the exceptions, and its decision is not necessary to a disposition of the appeal. I think, therefore, the court should not commit itself on the question until a case arises in which it is directly involved, and the court has had the benefit of full argument.

STATE v. DETYENS et al.

1. COUNTIES (§ 101*) — TREASURER — BOND — DEFENSES.

In an action on a county treasurer's bond for failing to turn over fish stamp taxes collected under act of 1906, it was no defense as to the surety that the stamps were left in the treasurer's office by the treasurer's predecessor, and were never receipted for by the treasurer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

2. COUNTIES (§ 101*) — TREASURER — BOND — DEFENSES.

In an action on a county treasurer's bond for failing to pay over road taxes collected, it was no defense that they were collected after expiration of the time during which by law he was entitled to collect the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Georgetown County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by the State of South Carolina against James F. Detyens and another. From an order sustaining a demurrer to defenses, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The order and exceptions thereto referred to in the opinion read as follows:

"Order.

"This action was brought by the state against James F. Detyens as principal and the American Bonding Company of Baltimore as surety on the official bond of Detyens as county treasurer of Georgetown county.

"It is alleged in the complaint and specifically admitted in the answer of the American Bonding Company that Detyens, as county treasurer, collected certain moneys as taxes imposed upon persons engaged in gathering oysters, catching fish, etc., which tax is provided for under the act of 1906, and that the money so collected was not turned over to Detyens' successor in office. The bonding company sets up as a defense for failure of its principal in this respect that the fish stamps were left in the treasurer's office by the predecessor of Detyens and were never receipted for by the said Detyens as county treasurer or so as to render his official bond responsible therefor. The state interposed a demurrer to this defense upon the ground that the allegations contained therein fail to constitute a defense.

"I am of the opinion that the demurrer in this respect should be sustained for the reason that the tax imposed by the act of 1906, commonly known as the fish stamp tax, has been paid by the individuals and collected by the treasurer as a tax upon fish taken in the public waters of the state, and such tax is a part of the public revenue. The fact that Detyens did not receipt for the unsold stamps on hand when he took charge of the office cannot affect the case. He actually received them—his answer so specifically admits—and sold them to persons liable for the tax, and, having failed to account for the money so collected, his surety is liable to the public therefor.

"As a further defense to the cause of action set up by the plaintiff, the defendant American Bonding Company alleges in the fourth and fifth paragraphs of its answer that included in the amount of the admitted shortage are items erroneously charged against the said county treasurer for commutation of road duty collected by the treasurer after the expiration of the time during which by law he was entitled to collect the same; that the treasurer had no authority to receive the same, and that it, as surety upon the bond, cannot be held liable therefor. The plaintiff demurs to the defenses set up in these paragraphs of the answer upon the ground that they fail to state facts sufficient to constitute a defense. Defendant contends that the law did not require or allow the collection of the highway tax at the time of the actual collection thereof, and that having been collected under such circumstances no liability rested upon it as surety to account; that if there is any liability whatsoever it rests upon James F. Detyens as a personal and private obligation and not as an official trust. To sustain this view, defendant relies upon the case of State v. White, 10 Rich. Law, 442, and Elliott v. Jeter, 59 S. C. 483, 38 S. E. 124. An examination of the White Case will show that the money for which the surety of the ordinary was sought to be held was neither taxes nor public revenues of any kind, nor was it money received by the ordinary colore officii. The court said the only way he could receive it was as a mere personal trust, for which he alone was responsible. In the Jeter Case neither tax nor public revenue was involved; the liability was to individuals for personal funds. In that case the court held that if the probate judge had no jurisdiction to partition realty, any funds coming into his hands from a partition sale could not create a liability under his official bond. The defendant cited cases from other states which seem to be more nearly in accord with its contention, but the great weight of authority is to the contrary. In the case of Town of Pawlet v. Kelly, 69 Vt. 401,¹ it is said: 'It is no defense herein that the selectmen included the unpaid highway tax for 1891 and 1892 in the tax bill for 1893. If the taxpayer paid Kelly the amount of the tax, the money became the money of the town, and the surety liable if the collector did not pay it over. If the tax levy was invalid, it was no defense as to the nonpayment of the moneys in fact collected.'

"In Fuller v. Calkins, 22 Iowa, 305, it is said: 'The substance of the whole matter, however, is that, though the collector may not have been legally bound to receive this money at the time, yet he did receive it, and, as we are bound to presume, executed the usual and proper receipts, and entered the proper memorandum on the tax list at the time, or so soon as the same was placed in his hands. By so doing he was in no just sense the mere custodian or trustee of the taxpayers, holding the funds for their use and alone liable to them, or individually to the government, for the faithful application of the funds. This was public money, funds in his hands by virtue of his office, revenue which he was bound to account for and pay over; and, by the very terms of the bond, the sureties were liable therefor. As was said in Warren County v. Ward, 21 Iowa, 84, the officer was perhaps not bound to take the money, but he did, accepting it as collector, and he is therefore bound for it as money received by virtue of his office.'

"In the monographic note to the case of Feller v. Gates, 91 Am. St. Rep. 558, it is said: 'Where, however, money is received by a treasurer as public funds, and in his capacity as treasurer, he or his sureties cannot, by the weight of authority, attack the validity of the means by which it was raised, in order to turn his official trust into a private one, or make his appropriation of such money an extra official delinquency, and, therefore, not a breach of his official bond. Thus, where money is borrowed or raised by taxation, and paid into the treasury, it is no defense that the board which raised the money, in so doing, exceeded its lawful authority. As is said in Cheboygan Co. v. Erratt, 110 Mich. 156, 67 N. W. 1117: "We think it altogether clear that, when it is shown that moneys have actually come into the hands of the treasurer as treasurer, neither he nor his bondsmen can avoid liability by showing that either irregularities exist in the proceedings by which such moneys were collected, or that there was no authority to enter into the agreement which resulted in the receipt of the money by the county. It is enough to impose upon the treasurer an active duty that the county has received the money, and the obligation on the bond exists when the money finds its way into his hands as treasurer." So it is no defense for failure to pay over or account for money paid into the treasury as taxes, that they were collected without warrant (Berrien Co. v. Bunbury, 45 Mich. 79, 7 N. W. 704), or that the levy was irregular (Ma-haska Co. v. Ingalls, 14 Iowa, 170). * * *

"In the cases above considered, and by the authorities generally, no distinction is made between a treasurer and his sureties, so far as concerns the right of either to question the legality of the means by which money paid to and received by him as treasurer was raised.' And in this case, page 554, a number of authorities are cited as sustaining the rule that sureties are even liable for taxes collected under an unconstitutional statute.

"It is admitted that the highway tax was collected by Detyens, as county treasurer, and no excuse for failure to turn it over to his successor is given other than that it was paid subsequent to the time fixed by statute. The state requires certain citizens to perform manual labor upon the public highways each year, but grants to each the privilege of commuting such service by the payment of a fixed amount of money before the 1st day of March. The payment of money within the time prescribed is a privilege granted the citizen, of which he may avail himself or not in accordance with his desire, but if he fails to pay within the required time, he cannot complain upon being required to labor upon the highway for the stipu-ated number of days. On the other hand, if the treasurer permits the payment, and in fact receives the tax after the expiration of the prescribed time, the citizen being thereby relieved of performing the labor, the money so collected is a public revenue, and is received by the county treasurer by virtue of his office. This, at most, was a mere irregularity in the collection thereof, which should not, according to an unbroken line of authorities, excuse the treasurer from turning it over to his successor, and could not relieve the surety from liability therefor. The various persons liable to perform road duty have only tardily paid the tax, and the treasurer having elected to receive it, neither he nor the sureties will now be heard to say that it was irregularly or improperly collected. Having been thus intrusted with this fund by virtue of his office, it was the duty of Detyens to turn it over to his successor, as provided by section 605, Code of Laws 1902, volume 1. The demurrer to the fourth and fifth paragraphs of the answer must, therefore, be sustained.

"Exceptions.

"First. Because the circuit judge erred in sustaining the demurrer to the defense set up in the sixth paragraph of the answer of the defendant, the American Bonding Company of Baltimore, the error assigned being that it was alleged in said paragraph and admitted by the demurrer that the said Detyens, county treasurer, never receipted for, nor did he assume any responsibility whatever for the fish stamps therein mentioned, and his surety was never in law responsible to the state or the county for said fish stamps.

"Second. Because the circuit judge erred in sustaining the demurrer to the defense set up in the seventh paragraph of the defendant's answer, the error assigned being that the amount therein mentioned as charged against the county treasurer as moneys received by him in commutation of road duty was alleged in the answer and admitted by the demurrer to have been received by the county treasurer after the expiration of the time during which by law he was entitled to collect the same, and the surety was therefore not responsible for his failure to pay over the same.

"Third. Because the circuit judge erred in sustaining the demurrer to the defense set up in the eighth paragraph of the defendant's answer, the error assigned being that the answer having alleged that the said county treasurer received the amounts stated in said paragraph in commutation of road duty after the expiration of the time when he was by law authorized to collect the same, and that the surety was therefore not responsible for his failure to pay over the same.

"Fourth. Because the circuit judge erred in not holding that if there was any liability resting upon the county treasurer because of the collection of the commutation of road duty, the same created simply a personal liability on the part of the county treasurer, and was not a liability for which his bondsman would be responsible."

Mordecai & Gadsden and Rutledge & Haggood, for appellants. J. Fraser Lyon, Atty. Gen., and Walter H. Wells, Sol., for the State.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] This appeal is from an order sustaining demurrer to the fourth and fifth paragraphs of the answer, which order is herewith reported with exceptions thereto.

After due consideration we are satisfied that the exceptions should be overruled for the reasons stated in the order.

Judgment affirmed.

TAYLOR v. GARY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 12, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Error was assigned upon rulings of the court relative to the admissibility of evidence, and upon the charge of the court and refusal to charge, and also upon the refusal of the judge to grant a new trial on the ground of alleged newly discovered evidence. Upon a careful examination of the entire record it does not appear that there was any error of law committed upon the trial, or that the newly discovered evidence was of such character as would probably produce a different result on another trial. The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

1. HOMICIDE (§§ 203, 216*)—CRIMINAL LAW (§ 822*)—EVIDENCE—DYING DECLARATIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

On the trial of one indicted for murder, where it appeared that the deceased was badly cut with a knife, and died three or four hours thereafter, and that upon being cut he exclaimed ed, "Oh Lordy! I am stabbed to death!" and very shortly thereafter stated that he was cut all to pieces and was dying, a prima facie case was made for the admission in evidence of his statement, then made, as to who cut him, and there was no error in admitting such statement; it appearing that the court gave to the jury, in connection therewith, proper instructions on the subject of dying declarations. Jones v. State, 130 Ga. 274 (2), 60 S. E. 840; Lyens v. State, 133 Ga. 587 (3), 66 S. E. 792.

(a) This rule is not altered by the fact that a physician, subsequently to the time the declarations were made, informed the declarant that he had a chance of recovery. Wheeler v. State, 112 Ga. 43 (5), 37 S. E. 126.

(b) While it was inaccurate to instruct the jury that they might pass upon the "admissibility" of the alleged dying declarations, the context in connection with which this portion of the charge complained of was given clearly shows that the jury could only have understood the court to mean that they might consider the alleged dying declarations as evidence only in the event they believed that they were made under such circumstances as to constitute them dying declarations.

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 201*)—DEED BY WIFE—CANCELLATION—DURESS—PAYMENT OF HUSBAND'S DEBT.

Equity will entertain a petition by a married woman to cancel, in the hands of her grantee, a warranty deed improperly procured by duress and in payment of her husband's debt, which has been duly recorded, although the grantee be in possession of the land, and there be no specific prayer for the recovery of the land.

Where a married woman seeks cancellation of a deed on the ground that it was procured by the grantee in payment of her husband's debt, and the grantee contends that the consideration was the payment of a certain sum of money and a note and mortgage on the land, executed by the plaintiff to a third person, it is competent for the grantee to prove that he did actually pay the mortgage without notice that its consideration was the husband's debt.

Error from Superior Court, Washington County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Action by Polly Ann Hunt against George T. Gilmore and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

W. E. Armistead and Hines & Jordan, for plaintiffs in error. Hardwick & Wright and J. E. Hyman, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. Polly Ann Hunt filed her petition against George T. Gilmore and his wife, making substantially the following allegations: During the night of December 11, 1906, George T. Gilmore brought with him three other men, one of whom was an officer authorized to make arrests, to the home of the plaintiff, and demanded that D. H. Hunt, her husband, pay a debt due by him to said Gilmore. "The said Gilmore exhibited a criminal warrant, sworn out by said Gilmore, charging said D. H. Hunt with larceny after trust, and threatened to have the same then and there executed unless said indebtedness was then and there settled and satisfied. The said Gilmore suggested and demanded that petitioner execute the aforesaid deed [a deed hereinafter referred to] in settlement of the indebtedness of said D. H. Hunt, and acting under stress of the surroundings and circumstances, and being coerced by the fears of said threatened criminal prosecution against her husband, and being moved by the importunities of her husband, and the demands, coupled with said threats, of the said Gilmore, petitioner authorized her name to be signed to said deed, which had already been prepared by said George T. Gilmore." Her deed was made to the wife of George T. Gilmore upon a stated consideration of $300, and contained a warranty of title, and it was duly recorded. The only consideration of the deed was the settlement of a debt due by the plaintiff's husband to George T. Gilmore. "The said defendant George T. Gilmore knew at the time that the land described in said deed was the property of petitioner, and that her husband, D. H. Hunt, had no interest therein; and he knew that said deed was given for the sole purpose of paying a debt of petitioner's husband, for which petitioner was in no wise liable or responsible." The defendants are in possession of the land which the deed purports to convey. In addition to a prayer for process, the prayers of the petition are that the deed "be, by the judgment and decree of this court, declared null and void, and the same be canceled; that the said defendants be required to produce said original deed into court, that the same may be canceled by the clerk thereof as a cloud upon petitioner's title; that petitioner have such other and further general relief as necessities of the case may require." A verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. The defendants excepted to the overruling of their motion for a new trial, and to the refusal of the court to sustain their demurrer.

[1] According to the allegations of the petition, the deed sought to be canceled was without consideration. The deed of a married woman in payment of the debt of her husband is void. Likewise a deed executed under compulsion or duress is not binding upon the maker. It is alleged in the petition that late at night one of the defendants came to the house of the plaintiff, accompanied by three men, one of whom was an officer, and called up her husband from bed, threatening to arrest him for some criminal offense, unless he would procure her to sign a deed; and yielding to her husband's entreaties, and under fear that their threats of prosecution would be carried into execution, she signed the deed. These circumstances constitute duress. Southern Express Co. v. Duffy, 48 Ga. 358; Crawford v. Cato, 22 Ga. 594; Civil Code 1910, § 4255. It is urged by way of demurrer that, notwithstanding the deed sought to be canceled may be invalid, according to the allegations of the petition the plaintiff is not entitled to a decree of cancellation, because she had an adequate remedy at law by ejectment to recover the land. It is true that a married woman may recover possession from her grantee, who claims under a deed from her given in payment of her husband's debt, without equitable pleadings to cancel it on account of its invalidity. Taylor v. Allen, 112 Ga. 330, 37 S. E. 408; Bond v. Sullivan, 133 Ga. 160, 65 S. E. 376, 134 Am. St. Rep. 199. There is also an instance of a physical precedent where a plaintiff sued in ejectment, notwithstanding the defendant undertook to defend under a deed from the plaintiff, which the jury found to have been procured by fraud and duress. Findley v. Hulsey, 79 Ga. 670, 4 S. E. 902. However, it is one of the established grounds of equitable jurisdiction to cancel deeds obtained by fraud or other illegal means.

Under the common-law practice in ejectment, the issue only comprehended a competition between the titles of the adverse parties. The plaintiff could only recover upon legal title or its equivalent, a perfect equity; and ordinarily it was a good reply to the plaintiff's title to exhibit a deed from the plaintiff. In the course of time the practice allowed proof of the invalidity of a deed relied upon as muniment of title; but this practice did not serve to oust equity of its jurisdiction, if the remedy at law was not as adequate as that afforded in equity. In Crawford v. Cato, supra, one of the parties, by means of duress, obtained three promissory notes from the other. He brought his action upon one of them, whereupon the maker filed a bill to restrain that action and to cancel all the notes; and the court held that, as the notes were obtained under duress, a court of equity would relieve the maker by canceling them and by preventing their collection. In Walker v. Hunter, 27 Ga. 336, the defendant was in possession of land under a deed obtained by undue influence, and the heirs at law of the maker brought suit to decree its cancellation; and it was held that a court of equity had jurisdiction to cancel a deed without consideration, which was procured by undue influence. In Bond v. Watson, 22 Ga. 637, there was an ejectment suit pending against the defendant, who filed a bill to cancel the deed under which the plaintiff held, on the ground that it had been improperly obtained; and the court held that such an equitable suit was maintainable, because the court of law had no jurisdiction to set aside and cancel a deed improperly obtained. There can be no doubt that, if the plaintiff had prayed for a recovery of the land, her suit would have been maintainable. Fulghum v. Pate, 77 Ga. 454.

Since the uniform procedure act of 1887 (Laws 1887, p. 64), it is competent for the plaintiff to obtain both legal and equitable relief in the same suit; but it does not follow that a plaintiff cannot go into a court of equity, where the only relief claimed is of an equitable character. The plaintiff would have a right to go into a court of equity and have the deed canceled, preparatory to filing her action to recover the land, if she elected to prosecute her demands separately. It is no reply to the maintenance of her action for cancellation that she could recover in ejectment without having the deed canceled, for the reason that if she did recover the land the recorded deed would be outstanding against her, and would be a cloud upon her title. While it may be true, as a general rule, that, in order to maintain a petition to remove a cloud upon a title, the land must be vacant or the plaintiff be in possession, or have no present right of action (Weyman v. Atlanta, 122 Ga. 539, 50 S. E. 492), nevertheless an action is always maintainable to cancel a deed procured by fraud or duress, where the legal remedy is not as efficacious as that afforded by a court of equity.

[2] 2. On the trial there was a sharp conflict between the testimony of the plaintiff and the defendants respecting the consideration of the deed sought to be canceled and the circumstances under which it was executed. The plaintiff's testimony tended to support the allegations of her petition. The defendant Gilmore testified that the deed was freely and voluntarily executed by the plaintiff; that it was executed in consideration of the payment of a mortgage on the land conveyed, given by the plaintiff to one Jackson, and a certain sum to be paid the plaintiff; that he paid the amount due on this mortgage to Jackson, which the plaintiff had neither paid nor offered to pay. The plaintiff replied to this contention by testifying that the mortgage to Jackson was given to secure a debt of her husband, and that the defendant paid the same after its maturity. The defendant Gilmore then offered to testify that at the time he paid the mortgage to Jackson he had no knowledge that it was given to secure her husband's debt. The court repelled the testimony. We think the testimony was admissible. Any contract of a married woman to secure or pay her husband's debt is void, and in the hands of the payee, or one with notice, she may set up this defense. Such defense, however, is not available against one who pays the debt at her instance, without notice that it was the debt of her husband. This is not a suit to enforce the mortgage note, so as to make applicable the rule that one who takes negotiable paper after maturity takes it subject to any defense the maker may have to it. If the contention of the defendant Gilmore be true, he simply paid a certain sum of money in satisfaction of a mortgage note, apparently the debt of the married woman, and at her direction, without notice that it was her husband's debt; and she will not thereafter be permitted to repudiate the payment, made by him at her request and without notice of the invalidity of the note discharged by his payment. To hold otherwise would be to permit a married woman under these circumstances to perpetrate a fraud. This testimony was vital to the contention of the defendants, as made in the pleadings and in the evidence; and the court erred in repelling the testimony.

3. In other respects the trial was without error.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except FISH, C. J., disqualified, and HILL, J., not presiding.

MORTGAGES (§ 151*) — PRIORITIES — YEAR'S SUPPORT — RIGHTS OF WIDOW.

Where one executed to a named grantee a security deed, and subsequently, upon the death of the grantor, his widow became his administratrix, and a year's support was duly set apart to the widow, embracing all the right, title, and interest of the decedent in the lands conveyed by the security deed, she, remaining in possession, was entitled to the rents and profits growing out of the land, until the institution of an action to recover the land, or other appropriate proceedings by the grantee in the security deed to subject the land and mesne profits to the debt due him.

Error from Superior Court, Stewart County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action by J. M. Stevens against C. H. Worrill, administratrix. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Geo. Y. Harrell and T. T. James, for plaintiff in error. F. A. Hooper and Tomlinson Fort, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. J. M. Stevens was grantee in a deed to secure debt, made and executed by B. H. Worrill; the deed being second in priority to a deed given on the same day to the British & American Mortgage Company to secure a loan. The two deeds covered the same property, consisting of several lots of land in Stewart county; and in each instance the grantee gave to Worrill a bond to reconvey the property upon his making payment of the loan. Worrill died, having defaulted in the payment of either loan. The mortgage company filed in the United States court an equitable petition to foreclose its security deed as a mortgage, and obtained a judgment against the property for the amount of its debt. Under this judgment the land was sold for less than the mortgage company's judgment. Worrill having died in the latter part of 1905, the appraisers, in May, 1906, regularly set apart to Mrs. Worrill, as a year's support for herself "all the right, title, and interest which B. H. Worrill had at the time of his death in and to" the property covered by the security deeds given to Stevens and the mortgage company. Mrs. Worrill rented out the lands, and received the rents and profits therefrom for the years 1907, 1908, and 1909, before the land was sold in the fall of 1909. These rents were the only property that came into her hands which the plaintiff claimed was subject to his demands. After the sale of the land under the proceedings of the mortgage company, Stevens filed suit, praying a general judgment against Mrs. Worrill, administratrix, and a special judgment against the land. The administratrix filed a plea of plene administravit. Under the direction of the court the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the principal debt, with interest, "to be levied of the goods and chattels of B. H. Worrill that may hereafter come into the hands of Mrs. Carrie H. Worrill as ex. off. administratrix of B. H. Worrill," and found in favor of her plea of plene administravit. The plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and he excepted; he contending that the rents and profits received by Mrs. Worrill were a part of the Worrill estate, to be administered, and that the same were subject to his debt, while Mrs. Worrill contended that such rents and profits constituted a part of the year's support regularly set apart to her.

Under the statement of facts agreed upon by the parties to this case at the trial, which constituted the only evidence submitted for the consideration of the judge in passing upon the case, the sole question for determination was whether the plaintiff was entitled to a general judgment against the defendant as administratrix, to be levied of the goods and chattels of the decedent, or to a judgment quando merely. The trial judge was of the opinion that the plaintiff was entitled only to a judgment quando, and rendered such in his favor; and of this the plaintiff complains. Under the terms of the order setting apart to Mrs. Worrill the year's support in question, she took all the right, title, and interest in the lands involved in this controversy, which remained in her husband after the execution of the deeds to the mortgage company and to Stevens. It is only necessary to consider what right, title, and interest in the land was left in Worrill after the execution of the security deed to Stevens, because the right, title and interest of Worrill, the grantor in the deed to Stevens, was identical with the right, title, and interest which, after his death, the widow had in the lands. It is contended in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error that, after default in the payment of the debt secured by the deed, Worrill could have been compelled to attorn to Stevens, just as if the deed, after default, created the relationship of landlord and tenant between the two. This proposition is not supported by the authorities cited.

The exact question has been raised in this court before, and resulted in a holding laying down the reverse of the proposition maintained by the plaintiff. In the case of Polhill v. Brown, 84 Ga. 338, 10 S. E. 921, it was said: "While he [the holder of a security deed] had a right to the possession of the land, and might have recovered the same in an action of ejectment, he had no right to recover mesne profits from the owner of the land, * * * except pending the action and to apply the same in payment of the debt due him." And in the case of Ray v. Boyd, 96 Ga. 808, 22 S. E. 916, it was ruled that one who makes to a creditor, for the purpose of securing a debt, a deed to land, but retains possession of the land, does not thereby become a tenant either of such creditor or his vendee. If Worrill himself had continued in life and in possession of the lands conveyed by the security deed to Stevens, he would have had the right to collect and use the rents and profits growing out of the land, and to continue to do so, even after default in the payment of the debt secured by the deed, until the holder of the deed should bring an action to recover the land, or other appropriate proceedings to subject the land and mesne profits to the debt secured by that deed. And it follows, from what we have said above as to the identity of the right, title, and interest in the land vested under the year's support in the widow with the right, title, and interest which Worrill himself would have had, if he had continued in life, that his widow was entitled to the rents of the land which the plaintiff insists are subject to his claim.

WALKER v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 12, 1911.
Rehearing Denied Jan. 12, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 922*)—NEW TRIAL—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, on the trial of one accused of the murder of his wife, the defendant offered in evidence three letters purporting to have been written by his wife several months before her death and left with him, not to be opened until after her death, two of which were addressed to the sister of the wife and one to a young lady of the neighborhood, referring in affectionate terms to the defendant, and these letters were received in evidence in rebuttal of the proof submitted by the state tending to show that the defendant was cruel to his wife, though the court should not have restricted a consideration of them to this purpose, yet, in view of the evidence, such an instruction is not cause for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2210-2218; Dec. Dig. § 922.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 814*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SUFFICIENCY—APPLICABILITY TO CASE.

The state submitted evidence tending to show that the letters were written by the defendant, and in formulating the state's contention in this regard the court inadvertently used the word "conspiracy," in the sense of a premeditated plan, but the context, as well as the language complained of, is such that the jury were not likely to understand that the word "conspiracy" was used in its technical sense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 814.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 366*)—EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ.

Where the accused is on trial for the murder of his wife by setting fire to her person and clothing, and it appears that immediately after the clothing of the decedent was ignited the defendant ran to a neighbor's house about 175 yards distant, and also called to a person, who lived about 75 or 100 yards further on, that his wife was on fire and to run quickly, and that person ran to the house closely behind the defendant, the testimony of such person that upon entering the house and seeing the decedent lying on the floor, moaning and screaming, and the defendant pouring water upon her smoking body, the witness exclaimed: "My God! How did it happen?" And the decedent's reply was, "He did it. He stuck fire to me and did it. He did it on purpose." And, upon the defendant's saying to the witness, "I don't know no more about it than you do," the decedent called the witness to come nearer and said, "He [the accused] is afraid the court will handle him, and he did it on purpose"—is admissible as part of the res gestæ.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 811; Dec. Dig. § 366.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 785*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS.

It is not error to instruct the jury that "a witness is successfully impeached whenever the minds of the jury become satisfied from the testimony that that witness is unworthy of belief."

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 785*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESSES.

When there is no attempt to impeach any witness by proof of general bad character, but there is evidence tending to impeach a witness by proof of previous contradictory statements, and there is a conflict in the testimony of some witnesses, a charge on the subject of the impeachment of witnesses by proof of contradictory statements is not erroneous because the court does not in terms instruct the jury that one mode of impeachment of a witness is by disproving the facts testified by the witness, where the court properly instructs the jury upon the rules respecting the weight and credit to be given a witness in the event of conflicts in the testimony.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 811*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

Where there exists a difference between opposing counsel as to whether there is a discrepancy between the testimony of a witness and a previous statement alleged to be contradictory of the testimony, it is not error for the court to allude to the particular witness in stating the contentions of counsel in this respect, and instructing the jury that they must decide the controversy between counsel from the evidence in the case.

7. HOMICIDE (§ 166*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

The defendant, his wife, and his mother concurrently took out policies of insurance on their respective lives. The policies on the lives of the defendant's wife and his mother were payable to him, and that on his own life was payable to his wife. On the trial of the defendant for the murder of his wife, the state introduced the policy on his wife's life, as tending to show motive, and the defendant in rebuttal offered the policies on the life of himself and of his mother. The former was received and the latter repelled as irrelevant. This was not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 320-331; Dec. Dig. § 166.*]

8. HOMICIDE (§ 290*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONTENTION OF PROSECUTION.

Where an indictment for murder contains two counts, the first charging that the defendant threw gasoline and other inflammable liquids on the person and clothing of the decedent and then set fire to the decedent's person, and the second charge that he set fire to the person and clothing of the decedent, a statement of a contention of the prosecution that the defendant set fire to the person of the decedent is not erroneous because of the failure of the court to separately direct the attention of the jury to the formal charge in each count.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 290.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 560*)—DEGREE OF PROOF—NATURE OF CRIME.

It is not erroneous to decline to instruct the jury that, "on the trial of a person charged with crime, the manner of proof ought to be more clear in proportion as the crime is more detestable."

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 941, 945*)—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—PROBABLE EFFECT.

The alleged newly discovered evidence is cumulative, and not of such character as would probably produce a different result. The grounds of the motion are without substantial merit, and the evidence is sufficient to uphold the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2324-2328; Dec. Dig. §§ 941, 945.*]

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Judge.

W. B. Walker was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

Jno. P. Ross, for plaintiff in error. W. J. Grace, Sol. Gen., H. H. Elders, and T. S. Felder, Atty. Gen., for the State.

EVANS, P. J. The defendant was indicted for the murder of his wife, Alma Walker. He was convicted and sentenced to be hanged. The indictment contained two counts. The first charged that the defendant, after having thrown gasoline and other inflammable liquids upon her person and clothing, did set fire to her person; and the second count charged that he set fire to her person and clothing. The evidence was entirely circumstantial, and we think sufficient to authorize the verdict. It would be unprofitable to reproduce the essential features of the case as embodied in the voluminous record, and for that reason we will not attempt it.

[1] 1. The state offered evidence tending to show that the defendant had cruelly treated his wife. The defendant introduced certain letters purporting to have been written by his wife several months prior to her death and left with him not to be opened until after her death. Two of these letters were addressed to an unmarried sister of the decedent, and one to a young lady of the neighborhood. They referred most affectionately to the defendant, and each contained a request for the addressee to marry the defendant in the event of her death. The state submitted evidence tending to show that the letters were written by the defendant, and the defendant introduced evidence tending to prove that they were written by his wife. With reference to these letters the court charged that the defendant had offered them for the purpose of showing that no ill feeling existed between him and his wife, and that his treatment of her was kind and proper. The defendant complains that this instruction unduly limited the effect of the evidence, because the letters also tended to show a morbid disposition or unbalanced mind of the reputed writer so as to raise an inference of self-destruction, or accidental death by careless act. While the court's charge may have been somewhat restricted, yet, in view of the evidence in the record, we do not think the charge sufficient ground for a new trial.

[2] 2. In stating the state's contention with reference to the authenticity of the letters, the court said that the state contended that the letters were written by the defendant, "and contends that there was a purpose in writing those letters; that it fixes the crime as a conspiracy arising under this bill of indictment charging the defendant with the death of Alma Walker." The quoted language is objected to on the ground that no conspiracy was charged and none proved. It is clear from the context that the court did not use the word "conspiracy" in its technical sense, and it is equally clear that the jury could not have so understood. The trend of the charge, and the very next sentence, show that the court meant that it was the state's contention that the letters were fabricated in pursuance of a plan of the defendant which indicated preparation and premeditation.

[3] 3. A witness, Classie Lightfoot, was permitted to testify to declarations of the decedent, made while she was lying on the floor and her husband was pouring water on her smoking body, and within a few minutes after her clothing had become ignited, to the effect that the defendant had intentionally set her on fire. It is insisted that the declarations were not spontaneous with the act and indicated deliberation on the part of the declarant, and were inadmissible as part of the res gestæ.

It is impossible to frame a definition of the term "res gestæ" which will adequately cover all the various and different uses to which it is put. As was said by Bleckley, J., in Cox v. State, 64 Ga. 410, 37 Am. Rep. 76: "The difficulty of formulating a description of the res gestæ which will serve for all cases seems insurmountable. To make the attempt is something like trying to execute a portrait which shall enable the possessor to recognize every member of a very numerous family." Our Code defines it as declarations accompanying an act so nearly connected therewith in time as to be free from all suspicion of device or afterthought. Civil Code 1910, § 5766. "The res gestæ of a transaction is what is done during the progress of it, or so nearly upon the actual occurrence as fairly to be treated as contemporaneous with it. No precise point of time can be fixed a priori where the res gestæ ends. Each case turns on its own circumstances." Hall v. State, 48 Ga. 608. The best guide to keep within the rule is furnished by the decided cases which serve as illustrations of its application. In Monday v. State, 32 Ga. 676, 79 Am. Dec. 314, a witness was attracted by the cries of the person assaulted. He went to where he was, and some one ran off. He asked the person assaulted what was the matter, to which he replied that the defendant was trying to choke him to death; and this conversation was allowed in evidence as res gestæ. In Burns v. State, 61 Ga. 192, testimony of a witness who lived about 600 yards from the place of the assault, that the deceased came to his home about an hour before day, Sunday morning, bloody, and, when asked what was the matter with him, said, "You know I went to sleep on the chair and fell out on a piece of wood," was held to be a part of the transaction and so nearly connected with it as to constitute a part of the res gestæ. In Stevenson v. State, 69 Ga. 68, the witness' testimony was that he heard the report of a gun and the scream of a woman about 300 yards away. He ran immediately to her assistance, and when in speaking distance she cried out for help. He saw that she had been shot, was bleeding freely, could move nothing but her hands, and, whilst begging that something be done for her, she said that defendant had shot her. This occurred from three to five minutes after the shooting. It was held to be admissible as a part of the res gestæ. Where a wounded man, within five minutes from the time he was shot, asked one of the persons who was assisting him what he shot him for, this question was held to be a part of the res gestæ. Mitchell v. State, 71 Ga. 128. In Kirk v. State, 73 Ga. 621, evidence that immediately after the deceased was shot a person near by halloed and asked them what was the matter and who had shot him, to which he replied that the defendant had shot him, was admitted as a part of the res gestæ. Illustrations may be multiplied to show that declarations to be a part of the res gestæ need not be precisely concurrent in point of time, if they spring out of the transaction and are made so near to it as to preclude reasonably the idea of deliberation. Mitchum v. State, 11 Ga. 615; Herrington v. State, 130 Ga. 307, 60 S. E. 572. When the testimony in question was offered, evidence had been submitted tending to show that, immediately after the clothes of the decedent became ignited, the accused ran to a neighbor's house about 175 yards distant and told the young daughter of the neighbor that his wife was on fire; that about the same time the accused called a negro by the name of Frank Lightfoot, who lived about 75 or 100 yards from the neighbor's, and exclaimed: "Alma [the wife of the defendant] is on fire! Run quick!" The accused returned to his home, closely followed by Frank and his wife. When Frank entered the house, he saw the decedent upon the floor, "screaming and halloeing." Her body was smoking, and the accused was pouring water upon her. Frank left at once for a neighbor, at the request of the accused. His wife, Classie, then came into the room. She testified that she found the decedent lying upon the floor, moaning and screaming, and that the accused was pouring water upon her smoking body. Upon entering the room, the witness exclaimed: "My God! How did it happen?" The accused attempted to say something, but his wife headed him off and said: "He did it. He stuck fire to me. He did it. He did it on purpose." Upon the decedent's reiteration of the statement, the accused touched the witness and said, "Classie, I don't know no more about it than you do." Then the decedent called the witness to come nearer and said: "He [the accused] is afraid the court will handle him, and he did it on purpose." The decedent made no further statement, and died within an hour after the conversation with the witness. The transaction inquired about was the homicide of the decedent accomplished by burning. The conversation occurred within a very few minutes, possibly from five to seven minutes, after the clothing of the deceased was ignited. Although the flame had been extinguished, the body was still smoking, and the defendant was pouring water upon the prostrate form of his wife at the time of the conversation. The declaration of his wife, under such circumstances, was clearly a part of the res gestæ, and the instruction relative thereto is not subject to the criticism made on it.

[4] 4-6. The court instructed the jury on the law of impeachment of witnesses by contradictory statements and the effect of a successful impeachment. He also called their attention to the defendant's contention that the state's witness Classie Lightfoot had sworn differently on the commitment trial, and the Solicitor General's contention that the witness repeated the same testimony which she delivered in the committing trial, instructing them that there was an issue between counsel as to whether or not the witness delivered the same testimony on this trial as she did before the committing court, and the jury must determine that issue from the evidence. Many exceptions are taken to this charge. One relates to that part of the charge which instructed the jury that "a witness sought to be impeached, by showing that that witness has made contradictory statements, may be sustained by proof of general good character of that witness. You will see, therefore, whether or not as a question of fact a witness has been successfully impeached is a matter for determination of the jury. A witness is successfully impeached whenever the minds of the jury become satisfied from the testimony in the case that that witness is unworthy of belief." This instruction was not erroneous. Powell v. State, 101 Ga. 11, 29 S. E. 317, 85 Am. St. Rep. 277.

[5] Another objection is that, the court having undertaken to charge on the subject of impeachment of witnesses by contradictory statements, it was incumbent upon it to charge concerning other modes of impeachment of witnesses provided by law. Our Code declares that a witness may be impeached (1) by disproving the facts testified by the witness, (2) by proof of previous contradictory statements, and (3) by proof of the general bad character of the witness. Civil Code 1910, §§ 5880, 5881, 5882. If no testimony as to the general bad character of a witness has been offered, it would be error to instruct the jury that a witness may be impeached by this mode. City Bank of Macon v. Kent, 57 Ga. 284 (9). There was no attempt to impeach any witness by proof of general bad character. It is urged that there was conflicting testimony, and that the court should have charged in terms that a witness may be impeached by disproving the facts testified by the witness. In a certain sense testimony to disprove a statement of a witness is impeaching in its nature. A charge upon the weight and credit to be given a witness' testimony, and the rule as to conflicting testimony, is in effect and substance a charge relating to this mode of impeachment. The jury were elaborately and properly instructed in this respect, and the court's instruction was not open to this objection.

It was also alleged that the charge was confusing and misleading, and should have been more elaborate. We do not think the charge was either confusing or misleading. The subject of impeachment of witnesses is not one of the main questions in a case, but is of an incidental or collateral nature; and, where the court instructs the jury on the mode and effect of impeachment, the instruction is not so defective as to require a new trial because the court might have elaborated his instruction so as to cover minor corollaries which may be involved in the main proposition.

[6] Nor was the instruction erroneous because the court alluded to a particular witness in stating the deductions which counsel for the state and the accused drew as to any discrepancy between her testimony in the two trials. Counsel for the state contended there was none, and counsel for the accused contended otherwise. In justice to the witness, we do not think there was any substantial conflict; but certainly nothing was contained in the court's instruction, that the jury should decide this controversy between opposing counsel by a reference to the evidence in the case, which was calculated to harm the defendant. Besides, this witness was the only one sought to be impeached by proof of contradictory statements, and in such a case it is not error for the court, in instructing the jury on the subject of impeachment by contradictory statements, to refer to the witness by name. Shaw v. State, 102 Ga. 660, 29 S. E. 477.

[7] 7. The defendant offered three certificates issued by a burial association in December, 1908, respectively to himself, his wife, and his mother, entitling each to a burial and funeral benefit of a stated amount according to the by-laws of the association; also, a policy of insurance for $150 on the life of his mother, in which he was the beneficiary; and the premium receipt book of the company. This testimony was rejected. The defendant contends that in view of the fact that the state had introduced in evidence a policy of insurance on the life of the decedent of the same date and for the same amount, payable to him in the event of death, and that he had introduced in evidence a policy on his own life, payable to his wife in the event of death, issued by the same company, for the same amount, and on the same date, it was relevant to show that the insurance policies and burial certificates were all issued in pursuance of a plan of family protection, and to rebut any inference that he killed his wife to get the insurance on her life. The policy of insurance on his mother's life could not possibly illustrate any issue in the case. The burial certificates were likewise irrelevant; but, even if they tended to elucidate any issue in the case, their rejection was harmless, as an officer of the association was permitted to testify that the accused, his wife, and mother were insured in the association, and that the association buried the deceased on account of her certificate.

[8] 8. In stating the contention of the state, the court said: "Now the state claims in this case that Alma Walker died on the 21st of August of last year; and the state claims that her death was the result of a felonious act, an unlawful act of the defendant in bringing about her death, by setting fire to her and burning her up, in such a way as to bring about that death; and the state charges that the defendant in doing so is guilty of murder." This charge is alleged to be error, because the court failed to invite the jury's attention specially to the two counts in the indictment, one of which charged the defendant with setting fire to the decedent after having thrown upon her person and clothing gasoline and other inflammable liquids, and the other charged him with killing the decedent by setting fire to her person. The defendant was charged with having committed murder by setting fire to the decedent, and the indictment was framed to meet possible phases of evidence as to the manner in which life was taken; and the court's summary of the state's contention in this respect was fair to the accused, and not open to the criticism made upon it.

[9] 9. The court declined to charge, on request, that, "on the trial of a person charged with crime, the manner of proof ought to be more clear in proportion as the crime is more detestable." The same degree of proof is required in all criminal trials, viz., that the evidence be sufficient to establish the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. This request was properly declined.

[10] 10. The motion for new trial included numerous grounds; but, after a careful consideration, we do not find anything contained in them which requires a new trial. The newly discovered evidence was cumulative, and not calculated to produce a different result should another trial be had. The evidence is sufficient to uphold the verdict.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

GABBETT v. CITY OF ATLANTA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 18, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§§ 55, 180*)—PLEADING—ACTION FOR NUISANCE—LIMITATION—DEMURRER TO PLEADING.

The petition, properly construed, was an action for damages arising from a continuing nuisance.

(a) Although a suit for the creation of a nuisance may be barred by the statute of limitations, yet if the nuisance be of a continuing character, which can and should be abated, suit may be brought for damages arising from its maintenance.

(b) In an action for the maintenance of a continuing nuisance, damages may be recovered resulting from such maintenance which accrued at any time within the period prescribed in the statute of limitations before the institution of the suit.

(c) In such an action the fact that the petition may allege damages, some of which are barred by the statute of limitation and others not, will not render the petition demurrable as to those which are not barred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 299-306, 670-675; Dec. Dig. §§ 55, 180.*]

2. AMENDMENT OF PLEADING—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

The amendment did not set forth a different cause of action from that alleged in the petition, and it was the right of the plaintiff upon election to amend.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 242*)—PRESENTATION OF QUESTIONS IN TRIAL COURT—RULINGS ON PLEADINGS.

The special grounds of demurrer were not ruled on in the trial court, and will not be considered here.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1417-1425; Dec. Dig. § 242.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 671*)—QUESTIONS PRESENTED FOR REVIEW.

Questions argued in the brief of counsel, which are not made by the record, will not be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2867-2872; Dec. Dig. § 671.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. PLEADING (§ 248*)—AMENDMENT—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

Where the original petition for the maintenance of a continuing nuisance was sufficient as against a demurrer without amendment, a proposed amendment, alleging as the measure of damages the value of land affected for rent, and claiming a less amount than specified in the original petition, did not set forth a new cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 686-709; Dec. Dig. § 248.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by Sarah E. Gabbett against the City of Atlanta. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. R. Hammond, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Mayson and W. D. Ellis, Jr., for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. Sarah E. Gabbett instituted suit for damages against the city of Atlanta. The original petition alleged: That plaintiff owned described land in that city, through which the municipality constructed and maintained certain sewers as a part of the sewerage system of the city. "and in times of rain, which frequently occur, and especially of heavy rains, which are not infrequent, said sewers become filled with water and sewage, and become strained and burst, and overflow your petitioner's said land with water and sewage filth, so that the same is rendered unfit for cultivation or pasturage, whereby your petitioner is deprived of the profit from said land to which she is entitled and which she would otherwise receive. Said land is wholly and totally unfit for cultivation or pasturage, or for any useful or profitable purpose whatever, caused by said repeated overflows and the deposit of filth upon the same. And your petitioner avers that said conditions have existed for more than 10 years, and that said land had become permanently unsuited for cultivation or pasturage, or for any useful or profitable purpose whatever." Also: "Any vegetable crops your petitioner might raise upon said land, if the same could be raised at all on account of the repeated overflows of the same, and the grasses on said land, would be and are totally unfit for use, because of the poisonous sewage matter that becomes deposited on the same from the overflows of said lands, as herein set forth; and your petitioner avers that she cannot obtain cows for pasturage, or rent said lands for market garden purposes, for that reason." Also: "Petitioner avers that she has suffered injury and damage to her said land, by reason of said defective sewerage conditions, and by reason of the facts herein set forth, in the sum of $5,000; and she prays for the recovery of said amount." Plaintiff's written ante litem demand, which was presented to the city, was attached to and made a part of the petition. In such demand it was alleged that for reasons as above indicated the property was "rendered unproductive and valueless" to plaintiff, to her damage in the sum of $500 a year since 1893. After filing her petition, the plaintiff sought to amend by striking portions of it and inserting other allegations, so that the damages claimed should be for the rental value at $500 per year for the four years next preceding the institution of the suit, and praying recovery of $3,000.

To the petition as amended the defendant demurred as follows: "(1) The declaration as amended presents a new and distinct cause of action from the case made in original petition. This defendant says that the original suit was brought to recover damages to land, and the amendment seeks to bring an action as for a nuisance. (2) The original declaration was barred on its face, and therefore there was nothing to amend by. (3) The original declaration being by its terms barred, it is not permissible to so amend as to save the declaration from a motion to dismiss based on the original petition." Also several grounds of special demurrer were urged. On the hearing the judge ordered that the amendment be disallowed, and that the general demurrer be sustained and the case dismissed. The bill of exceptions assigned error upon this ruling.

[1] 1. The demurrer complained that the petition should be dismissed, because it appeared upon its face that the action was barred, and therefore there was nothing to amend by. This ground of demurrer, though general, restricted by its own terms its attack upon the petition to the single question that the action was barred. It is declared in Civil Code, § 4457: "A nuisance is anything that worketh hurt, inconvenience, or damage to another; and the fact that the act done may otherwise be lawful does not keep it from being a nuisance. The inconvenience complained of must not be fanciful, or such as would affect only one of fastidious taste, but it must be such as would affect an ordinary reasonable man." The allegations of the petition set forth the injury to the plaintiff and the causes thereof in such manner as to charge the existence of a nuisance. The nuisance was of such character as that it could be abated and the injury terminated. A nuisance of that character would be a continuing one, and the person injured would not be limited to a single action for damages resulting from its creation, but might sue for injuries resulting from its maintenance. City Council of Augusta v. Marks, 124 Ga. 365 (1), 52 S. E. 539, and citations. See, also, Nalley v. Carroll County, 135 Ga. 835, 70 S. E. 788. In a suit for the maintenance of such a nuisance, all legitimate damages are recoverable which accrued within the period of limitation prescribed by statute before the institution of the suit. Langley v. City Council of Augusta, 118 Ga. 590 (9), 45 S. E. 486, 98 Am. St. Rep. 133, and citations.

That some of the damages alleged were barred and others not will not render the petition objectionable as to those which were not barred. Monroe v. McCranie, 117 Ga. 390, 45 S. E. 246. It was alleged in the original petition that the injuries complained of were permanent, and that the value of the land was destroyed for all purposes, and the damages were laid at the lump sum of $5,000. Considered alone, such allegations are somewhat confusing as to whether the pleader contemplated a recovery of all of the past and future damages in one action, based on creation of the nuisance, or whether he contemplated a recovery of recurring damages based on the maintenance of the nuisance. But the allegations upon consideration of the general objection which was urged by demurrer are to be construed in connection with all of the other allegations of the petition. No prospective damages were alleged, but throughout the petition the allegations as to damages related to such as had incurred in the past. There were no allegations relative to diminution of the market value of the property, which would have been the measure of the damages had the suit been for a creation of the nuisance; but the damages laid had reference to the value of the land for pasturage and cultivation and other purposes for which the plaintiff could have used the property, and which would have rendered her profits had the nuisance not been maintained. The petition in its entirety was not subject to dismissal on the ground that the cause of action was barred.

[2, 5] 2. Under the views expressed in the first division, the original petition was sufficient as against the demurrer without amendment. The proposed amendment did not set out a new cause of action. The original petition, and as well the amendment, were for damages on account of the injury to the plaintiff, founded upon the maintenance of a nuisance upon her land. The mere fact that the amendment alleged as the measure of damages the value of the land for rent, and alleged a less amount than that specified in the petition, would not make it set forth a different cause of action. It was the right of the plaintiff, upon election to do so, to amend, even though unnecessary.

[3] 3. The court did not rule on the grounds of special demurrer, and no ruling will be made upon them.

[4] 4. Other questions were discussed in the brief of counsel for the defendant in error, in support of the judgment of dismissal. While the points thus raised might have been pertinent, had there been a general demurrer complaining that the petition set forth no cause of action, they were not pertinent to the question actually raised, namely, that the petition showed upon its face that it was barred by the statute of limitations, and therefore that there was nothing to amend by, and that the amendment set forth a different cause of action.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

STERLING et al. v. MAYOR AND ALDERMEN OF CITY OF ST. MARYS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 13, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CONTINUANCE (§§ 12, 26)—GROUNDS—DEATH OF PARTY—ABSENCE OF EVIDENCE.

On April 15, 1910, 12 plaintiffs united in one action to enjoin the sale of their respective properties under executions issued against each of them individually for taxes for the year 1909 by the mayor and aldermen of the city of St. Marys, and obtained a restraining order. One of the plaintiffs died about July 1, 1910, and there was no representation upon his estate. The case was set for hearing in a different county on November 11, 1910. On the 10th of November, and also prior thereto (the date not being disclosed by the record), the plaintiffs' counsel had applied to the clerk of the mayor and aldermen of the city of St. Marys for a certificate relative to certain matters which he desired to introduce in evidence, but which on both occasions the clerk refused to give. Held:

(a) The plaintiff who had died was not a necessary party to the suit of the remaining plaintiffs, and his death furnished them no ground upon which to continue the case.

(b) Even if the certificate of the clerk would have been admissible, the plaintiff showed no such diligence as would have required the judge to postpone the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Continuance, Cent. Dig. §§ 40, 74-93; Dec. Dig. §§ 12, 26.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§§ 121, 317*)—RELEVANCY—HEARSAY—DECLARATIONS.

A statement of the clerk of a municipal council, made to a person who inquired of him as to the existence of a municipal ordinance, that no such ordinance appeared upon the record in his office, and that he had never seen any such ordinance, and knew nothing of its existence, is mere hearsay, and not admissible in evidence to prove the nonexistence of such an ordinance, in a suit against the municipality to enjoin the collection of a tax. See Griffin v. Wise, 115 Ga. 610 (1), 41 S. E. 1003, and citations; Youmans v. Thompson, 122 Ga. 331, 50 S. E. 141, and citations.

(a) Such a statement cannot be introduced in an action of the character mentioned, on the theory that it was the declaration of an agent made dum ferret opus.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 308, 1174-1192; Dec. Dig. §§ 121, 317.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 958*)—POWERS IN GENERAL—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Even if the municipality of St. Marys did not have the power to assess and collect taxes for general purposes of the municipality under its original charter and various amendments thereto, such power was expressly given under section 12 of an amendment to its charter passed in 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 914).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 958.*]

4. AD INTERIM INJUNCTION—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Under the evidence submitted by the plaintiffs, and that introduced by the defendants without objection, there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to grant an ad interim injunction.

DE LANG v. CLARE et al.

(Syllabus by the Court.)APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 637)—RECORD—DEFACTS—EFFECT.

The judgment of the court overruling the motion for a new trial was rendered on May 27, 1911. The bill of exceptions assigning error on the judgment is regular upon its face down to and including the portions of the record specified in the same, except that it is not signed by the attorneys for the plaintiff in error prior to the certificate of the trial judge, which was signed on August 12, 1911, more than 76 days after the signing of the judgment complained of. It appears from the certificate of the clerk of the superior court of Ben Hill county: "I further certify that the April term of said court, at which said case was tried, adjourned —, 19—." In the acknowledgment of service, immediately following the certificate of the trial judge, by the attorneys for the defendant in error, it is stated: "We agree not to make any objection to said bill of exceptions on account of not being presented to the judge in time. Aug. 14, 1911." It further appears that the bill of exceptions is all bradded together, and marked "Filed in office" by the clerk of the superior court on August 19, 1911, and the judge's certificate follows immediately after the specification of the portions of the record desired sent to this court, and the bill of exceptions is not signed by the attorneys for plaintiff in error preceding the judge's certificate; but on a separate page, following the judge's certificate, appear these words: "And now comes the said Charles A. De Lang, within 30 days from the adjournment of the court, and presents this his bill of exceptions, and prays that the same may be signed and certified, that the errors complained of may be reviewed and corrected. Attorneys for Plaintiff in Error." Held, that this court is without jurisdiction to review this case, and the agreement of counsel for the defendants in error not to make objection in this court to the bill of exceptions as "not being presented to the judge in time" cannot confer such jurisdiction, and, therefore, the writ of error must be dismissed.

ALFORD v. STATE.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 286)—DETERMINATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION—NECESSITY.

The defendant, on trial charged with the offense of murder, filed a special plea alleging that "he was insane at the time the homicide was committed," and prayed that he be discharged from the custody of the superior court, where he was being tried, and that "he be tried before the ordinary of the county and lunacy commission according to the laws of the land." The plea contained no allegation of insanity at the time of the trial. Sections 3092, 3101, and 5215[?] of Civil Code of 1910, and section 1047 of the Penal Code of 1895 (as to the last of which sections see Acts 1903, p. 77), were attacked as unconstitutional and void, on the ground that they do not afford due process of law. Held, that none of these sections relates to or affects the trial of the issue made by one who sets up the defense of nonliability, under the law, to answer the charge of murder because of his insanity at the time the homicide was committed. Under the law of Georgia this defense must be made under the general plea of not guilty, and, if satisfactorily made out, would finally acquit the defendant of the charge preferred against him. Danforth v. State, 75 Ga. 614, 58 Am. Rep. 490. Consequently the question of the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the sections referred to was immaterial, and the judge did not err in striking the special plea.

2. MOTION FOR CONTINUANCE—NO ERROR.

Under the facts appearing in the record, the court did not err in overruling the motion for a continuance.

3. JURY (§ 131*)—IMPANELING—EXAMINATION OF JURORS.

The competency of a juror is tested primarily by propounding the voir dire questions prescribed in Pen. Code 1910, § 1001; and counsel for the accused cannot, as a matter of right, in order to further test the competency of a juror, extend the examination without first putting the juror on the court as a trier, though the court may, in his discretion, allow other questions, or may, if it appears that the juror does not understand the voir dire questions, of his own motion or at the request of counsel, explain any of the voir dire questions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 698*)—TRIAL—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—EFFECT OF RECEPTION WITHOUT OBJECTION.

The ground of the motion for a new trial complaining of the admission of evidence touching a confession of the defendant does not show that the evidence was objected to when offered. Confessions are legal evidence. Unless the circumstances under which they were made show they were not voluntary, they are admissible. If they are given in, and not objected to, it is too late after the verdict to say that there was not sufficient inquiry into the circumstances. Eberhart v. State, 47 Ga. 598.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1651-1654; Dec. Dig. § 698.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 828*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUISITES—NECESSITY.

Failure to charge upon the subject of impeachment of witnesses is not ground for a new trial, where no written request was made for pertinent instructions to the jury upon this subject.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2007; Dec. Dig. § 828.*]

6. CHARGE OF COURT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The portions of the charge excepted to were not error for any of the reasons assigned. The evidence supported the verdict, and the court did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

EVERETT et al. v. JENNINGS et al.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. NEW TRIAL (§ 27)—GROUNDS—RULINGS ON PLEADINGS.

The striking of the amendment to the plea and answer is not ground for a new trial. In so far as the amendment attempted to set forth the evidence upon which the defendants relied, it contained matter which does not find a proper place in the pleadings; and in so far as it contained allegations material to the defense, evidence to sustain them was admissible under the issues raised by the original answer to the petition, the defendant being allowed to introduce evidence sustaining the defense set up in the amendment; and the issues thus made having been submitted to the jury in the court's charge, the striking of the amendment was not harmful to the plaintiff in error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 41; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

2. REQUESTS TO CHARGE—GENERAL CHARGE SUFFICIENT.

The requests to charge, in so far as they were legal and pertinent, were sufficiently covered by the general charge.

3. RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES (§ 7*)—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Complaint is made of the following charge of the court: "Where a majority of the members of a congregational church adhere to the organization and doctrines of the church, the majority has the right to control; but should the majority of the members composing the membership of such church of a congregational form of government, that is to say, governed by action of its members, abandon its organization and doctrines, then those adhering to its organization and doctrines would constitute the church. In a church of a congregational form of government, a majority of those adhering to its organization and doctrines represents the church and has the right to manage its affairs and to control its property for the use and benefit of such church; and when such majority acts within the scope of its authority in matters appertaining to the affairs of the church, such act would be binding upon the part of the majority." This charge is excepted to on the grounds that it is confusing as a whole, and especially so in so far as it attempts to charge the law applicable to the defendants' contention in the case, that it does not attempt to give rules by which the jury may determine whether the majority have abandoned the doctrines of the church, and that it is too narrow in its scope. None of these exceptions point out any error in this charge authorizing the grant of a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 193*)—RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES (§ 7*)—INSTRUCTIONS—OPINION OF JUDGE—ARGUMENTATIVE INSTRUCTIONS.

Complaint is made of the following portion of the court's charge: "The court charges you that an arbitrary expulsion of the majority of the members of a church by a minority without notice or trial, or allowing such majority opportunity to appear and be heard, would be a void act." This charge is not objectionable on the ground that it intimates an opinion as to what has been proved, or that it is argumentative, or that it unduly stresses the opinion of the court on the subject as to how certain members of this church were expelled by the defendants, or that it instructs the jury that the expulsion of the majority by the minority was illegal and unauthorized.

5. TRIAL (§ 193*)—INSTRUCTIONS—OPINION OF JUDGE.

The following excerpt from the charge is also complained of: "The court further charges you that where a church is sovereign in its character of government, having the exclusive right and power to manage and settle its own internal affairs, and where it is not subservient to some higher church authority to settle disputes arising among the members, then the act or conduct of some other church or churches which may assume to voluntarily act in some matter of dispute would have no binding effect in the assumption to settle such disputes, but such act by such church or churches, unless clothed with authority to act in such matter, would be null and void." This charge was not objectionable on the ground that it contained an intimation of an opinion of the court upon any issue of fact in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

6. RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES (§ 7*)—TRIAL (§ 193*)—INSTRUCTIONS—OPINION OF JUDGE.

Complaint is made of the following charge: "The court charges you, further, that whereas there has been a dissension, and where some other church acts or attempts to act in the matter for the purpose of settling such dispute, that the party who claims the advantages of such act or settlement assumes the burden of showing the authority to act in such matter by some other church. It would be incumbent upon the party who claimed such benefit to show that the church or churches had jurisdiction or authority to act in such matter; and unless such authority be shown, then the party claiming it could not rightfully claim any benefit from such act." This charge was not objectionable on the ground that it was in effect an instruction to the jury to disregard the findings of the council of the churches "on the issue as to which faction constituted the Chickasawhatchee Primitive Baptist Church in order, and in effect left the decision of the whole matter to the decision of a majority of that church to decide upon the question of faith, customs, doctrines," etc. Nor did it contain an intimation of opinion which amounted to direct instruction to the jury as to the weight they should give to the findings of a council of the churches.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Religious Societies, Dec. Dig. § 7;* Trial, Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

7. INJUNCTION (§ 130*)—VERDICT—INSTRUCTION AS TO FORM.

The court charged the jury as follows: "Should you find for the plaintiffs, the form of your verdict would be: 'We, the jury, find for the plaintiffs, and we further find and decree that the defendants be enjoined and restrained as prayed for in the petition.'" The instruction here complained of was not objectionable on the ground that it authorized the finding of a "verdict for a mandatory injunction requiring the defendants to deliver up the books and records now in their possession."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Dec. Dig. § 130.*]

8. SUFFICIENCY OF CHARGE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The charge as a whole fairly submitted the contentions of the parties to the jury, and the evidence supported the verdict.

WHITE v. J. E. LEVI & CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PLEADING (§ 355*)—MOTIONS—STRIKING OUT PLEADING.

Where an action was brought to recover damages on account of an injury to the plaintiff, arising from being struck by an automobile, and the defendants named were the owner of the automobile and the firm to whose place of business it was being carried for repairs, but the only defendant served was one member of the firm, there was no error in overruling a motion to strike a demurrer filed by such defendant, on the ground that it was filed in his individual capacity, and not as one of the copartners, or in the interest of the copartnership.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Dec. Dig. § 355.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 801*)—INJURIES TO THIRD PERSON—AUTHORITY OF SERVANT.

If a master sent a servant to bring to his place of business an automobile for the purpose of having it repaired, and the servant so sent procured another to take the machine to its destination in his stead, the master was not liable for the negligence of such person, unless the servant had authority, express or implied, to employ him, or unless the employment was ratified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1210-1216; Dec. Dig. § 801.*]

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 329*)—INJURIES TO THIRD PERSON—ACTIONS—PLEADING.

In the absence of any direct allegation of ratification, a mere averment that the person so employed was arrested and fined for violating a municipal ordinance in regard to the driving of automobiles in the city, and that the master gave bond for the appearance of such assistant after his arrest, and paid the fine imposed upon him, will not suffice to sustain the petition against a general demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 329.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by George White against J. E. Levi & Co. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

R. J. Jordan, for plaintiff in error. Bell & Ellis, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. G. White brought suit for damages against J. E. Levi & Co., alleging that the defendant was a partnership composed of J. E. Levi and D. D. McCall, and against J. D. Davidson, a resident of a county other than that where the suit was filed. The allegations were in brief as follows: On June 4, 1910, Davidson came from his home in Griffin to Atlanta in an automobile. Because of the failure of some of the machinery of the car to work properly, it was left on the outskirts of the city of Atlanta, and Levi & Co. were notified to send for it and take it to their place for repairs. Accordingly, they sent one of their employés for the car. He found that by doing some work on the machine it would be unnecessary to pull the car into the firm's place of business. He and Davidson directed a young negro boy to take the machine to the place of Levi & Co. When they did so, they knew that the boy "was inexperienced and had no license to run an automobile in the city of Atlanta without first being examined and granted a license." While the plaintiff was crossing the street he was struck by the automobile and injured. This occurred from no fault of his, but was the result of gross negligence on the part of the driver of the machine. Had the latter known the duties of one skilled in the business of running automobiles, and had he kept a proper lookout, the injury would not have occurred; but he was not capable of running an automobile, and was looking across the street when the plaintiff was struck. The boy was tried before the recorder of the city of Atlanta for violating the municipal ordinance regulating the manner in which automobiles might be run in the city limits, and was adjudged guilty and fined $50 and costs, "which said fine was paid by defendants, or some of them." In another paragraph it was alleged that "said defendants, Levi & Co., gave bond for said boy after his arrest, and the boy's fine was paid by them." No service was made on any of the defendants except McCall; an entry of non est inventus being made as to J. E. Levi. McCall interposed a general and special demurrer. Counsel for the plaintiff made an oral motion to strike the demurrers, on the ground that they were filed by one of the partners, D. D. McCall, in his individual capacity, and not as one of the partners, or in the interest of the partnership. This motion was overruled. The general demurrer was sustained, and the case dismissed. The plaintiff excepted.

[1] 1. In the petition the defendants named were an individual and a partnership, alleged to be composed of two named persons. It does not appear that any service was made on the individual defendant. There was an entry of service on one of the partners, "one of the firm of J. E. Levi & Co.," and an entry of non est inventus as to the other. The partner served interposed a demurrer. A motion was made to strike this, on the ground that it was filed by one partner individually and not in the interest of the partnership. It was properly overruled. 15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 941; Wynne v. Millers & Sibley, 61 Ga. 343; Importers', etc., Bank v. McGhees & Co., 88 Ga. 702, 710, 16 S. E. 27.

[2] 2. It was alleged that, on account of the failure of some of the machinery of the automobile to work properly, the car was stopped at or near the limits of the city of Atlanta, and Levi & Co. were notified to send for it and take it to their place of business for repairs, and thereupon "sent one of their men for said machine," but that the man so sent, by doing some work on the machine, found it unnecessary to pull the car to its destination, and that he and the owner of the car directed a young negro boy, who was inexperienced and had no license to drive an automobile in the city, to take it to the place of business of Levi & Co. The employé of the defendant firm does not appear to have been present when the plaintiff was hurt. There was no allegation that the man sent by the firm to carry the machine to their place of business had any further authority, or that he was authorized, expressly or impliedly, to employ the boy, or direct him to carry the machine to its destination; nor was there any allegation that the boy was an employé of the firm. So far as appears from the petition, the man sent to get the machine acted outside the scope of his authority in employing the boy and delivering the machine to him. Under such circumstances, the firm was not liable for the negligence of the boy, unless the act of employment was ratified by them. Atlanta & West Point R. Co. v. West, 121 Ga. 641, 49 S. E. 711, 67 L. R. A. 701, 104 Am. St. Rep. 179; Cooper v. Lowrey, 4 Ga. App. 120, 60 S. E. 1015; Mechem on Agency, §§ 185, 197.

[3] 3. There was no sufficient allegation of ratification. It was not alleged that the defendant firm confirmed or ratified the act of their employé in procuring the subagent. The only averment on that subject was that, after the plaintiff had been injured by being struck by the automobile while it was driven, the boy driver was prosecuted in the recorder's court of the city for violating a city ordinance regulating the manner in which automobiles should be run, and was fined, and that the firm gave bond for the appearance of the boy after his arrest, and paid his fine. What was the ordinance violated did not appear. In another part of the petition it was stated that the fine was paid "by defendants, or some of them." Had there been a proper allegation of ratification of the employment of the boy and the intrusting of the machine to him, perhaps the facts above mentioned might have been admissible in evidence as bearing on the question, leaving the jury to draw proper inferences or conclusions from them and any other evidence pointing toward ratification, if there was any. But the pleader must allege his case, and not merely set out certain detached pieces of evidence, which do not directly prove ratification, and trust to inference to supply the lack of it. The petition alleged neither express nor implied authority on the part of the person sent for the automobile to employ the person who was driving it when the plaintiff was injured, nor ratification of his act in so doing. It was, therefore, properly dismissed on demurrer.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

PROCTOR & GAMBLE CO. v. BLAKELY OIL & FERTILIZER CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 14, 1911.
Rehearing Denied Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CUSTOMS AND USAGES (§ 17*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where differences arose between parties in relation to the purchase and sale of cotton seed oil, and the differences were submitted for arbitration by the parties thereto in writing, "to the arbitration and decision of the arbitration committee on cotton seed products of the Memphis Merchants' Exchange, or a quorum of them," etc., it is not competent to prove a custom of the exchange which varies the plain written agreement of such submission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Customs and Usages, Cent. Dig. § 34; Dec. Dig. § 17; Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1945-1952.]

2. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The verdict is supported by the evidence in this case.

3. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 26*)—SUBMISSION—PERFORMANCE OR BREACH.

Where by the terms of a written submission to an arbitration committee, which is composed of five members of a regular standing committee of the Memphis Merchants' Exchange, one of the members is absent and fails to act, but another person, not a member of the regular standing arbitration committee, is substituted by the chairman of the committee to act in the place of the absent member, such appointment being without the consent of one of the parties to the submission, and the substituted arbitrator hears the matter in controversy and signs the award with the other committeemen, it follows, as a matter of law, under the contract of submission, that the award is null and void, and cannot be the foundation of a suit predicated thereon.

Error from Superior Court, Early County; W. C. Worrell, Judge.

Action by the Proctor & Gamble Company against the Blakely Oil & Fertilizer Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

D. F. Crosland, for plaintiff in error. C. L. Glessner and J. R. Pottle, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. This is the third time this case has been before this court. It will be found reported in 128 Ga. 606, 57 S. E. 879, and 134 Ga. 139, 67 S. E. 389. The decisions in those cases turned upon questions of procedure, exclusion of evidence, defenses, etc., but the case was finally remanded to the trial court for determination upon its merits. The present case was brought by the Proctor & Gamble Company against the Blakely Oil & Fertilizer Company in Early superior court for the sum of $1,732.38, alleged to be due the plaintiff by the defendant by reason of a certain award finding said amount due the plaintiff by the Blakely Oil & Fertilizer Company. It was alleged by the plaintiff that it purchased from the defendant two tanks of crude cotton seed oil, on a basis of "prime"; that upon the arrival of the oil at destination a difference arose between the plaintiff and the defendant as to the quality of the oil, and as to what deduction should be allowed the plaintiff, if any, from the contract price of 33½ cents per gallon; that the plaintiff had paid for the oil on the basis of prime crude at the contract price of 33½ cents per gallon; that under the terms of the contract of submission the differences between the plaintiff and the defendant were to be submitted to the arbitration and decision of the arbitration committee on cotton seed products of the Memphis Merchants' Exchange, or a majority of them; that the arbitration committee did, on the 7th day of May, 1903, make their award, in which they held that the oil was not "prime crude," and accordingly awarded the plaintiff 13 cents per gallon on each tank, which amounted to the sum of $1,732.38. The defendant, in its answer, among other defenses, alleged that the award was not binding upon it; that it was void and of no effect, because the contract and agreement of submission claimed by the plaintiff to have been made by the defendant provided that the differences and controversies between the parties were to be submitted to the arbitration and decision of "the arbitration committee of cotton seed products of the Memphis Merchants' Exchange, or a quorum of them;" but defendant alleged that the award was signed by one A. H. D. Perkins, who was not a member of the arbitration committee on cotton seed products of said Memphis Merchants' Exchange, but that said Perkins was called in by four members of said committee to take the place of an absent member of the committee, to wit, H. P. Johnson; that said Perkins participated in said arbitration and award without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, which had but recently, and since the award was published, discovered that the said Perkins participated in the award, and that he was not a member of the arbitration committee of the Memphis Merchants' Exchange, to the members of which alone were the matters in controversy between plaintiff and defendant submitted under the alleged contract of submission. After the charge of the court, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant, the Blakely Oil & Fertilizer Company. A motion for a new trial was made by the Proctor & Gamble Company on the various grounds therein stated, which was overruled by the court, and this ruling is assigned as error.

[1-3] We think that the decision of this case rests upon the proper construction of the contract or "agreement for arbitration" entered into between the parties to this case. That agreement is as follows: "Memphis Merchants' Exchange. Agreement for Arbitration. This article of agreement, made and entered into this 27th day of April, A. D. 1903, witnesses: That whereas, difference and controversies are now existing and pending between Blakely Oil & Fert. Co., Blakely, Ga., and the Proctor & Gamble Company, Cincinnati, Ohio, in relation to purchase and sale of cotton seed oil, terms, basis prime crude weights and quality guaranteed, in accordance with the rules of the Memphis Merchants' Exchange, arbitration at Memphis: Now, therefore, we, the undersigned, do hereby mutually and voluntarily agree to submit the said differences and controversies to the arbitration and decision of the arbitration committee on cotton seed products of the Memphis Merchants' Exchange, or a quorum of them, with the right of appeal on the part of either of the above-named parties to the committee of appeals, according to the rules and regulations of said Memphis Merchants' Exchange; and we do further authorize and empower the said arbitration committee, or a quorum of them, or, in case of appeal, the said committee of appeals, or a quorum of them, to arbitrate, award, adjust, and determine the differences now existing between us in the aforesaid matter.

A decision is desired upon the following points: Whether or not samples marked 'P and G 85, and 532 Blakely, Ga., April 7th' contain prime crude cotton seed oil; if not, to what allowance per gallon is the Proctor & Gamble Co. entitled? Samples to be submitted by the Proctor & Gamble Company, and properly tested by the official chemist." It will be observed upon an inspection of this agreement that differences existing between plaintiff and defendant in relation to the purchase and sale of certain cotton seed oil, and the price paid therefor, and the differences as specified in said contract, were to be submitted "to the arbitration and decision of the arbitration committee on cotton seed products of the Memphis Merchants' Exchange, or a quorum of them," etc. It appears from the record that one A. H. D. Perkins, who was not a member of the regular standing arbitration committee, though a member of the Exchange, was called in by the chairman of the arbitration committee of the Memphis Merchants' Exchange, and was a party to the award which is the foundation of the present suit, without the knowledge or consent of the defendant in this case.

It is insisted on the part of the plaintiff in error that the substitution of Perkins as a member of the arbitration committee for a regular member of the arbitration committee, who was absent, was the result of a long, constant, and common practice or usage of the Memphis Merchants' Exchange, and therefore was valid and binding, as a matter of law, upon both parties to the award; and it is insisted that, inasmuch as the court charged the jury that if such practice did as a matter of fact exist, such practice would be valid and binding as a matter of law upon both plaintiff and defendant, the verdict of the jury finding against such charge was contrary to law and the evidence and without evidence to support it. To this contention and charge we cannot give our assent. We hold that the contract entered into between the plaintiff and defendant was equally binding upon both. By the terms of that agreement all differences and controversies were to be submitted "to the arbitration committee on cotton seed products of the Memphis Merchants' Exchange, or a quorum of them," etc.; and no custom or long-continued practice, which substituted one not a member of that arbitration committee for one who was, would be binding on the defendant without its consent. When that agreement was entered into, the defendant doubtless knew who composed that committee, and with a knowledge of the personnel of such committee it might readily sign such an agreement; but it is in effect making a new agreement to substitute, without the consent of the defendant, a new committeeman for one already agreed to in writing by the defendant and the plaintiff as well. If one can be substituted by custom, why not two, or three, or four? In fact, A. S. Graves, the secretary of the Memphis Merchants' Exchange, testified that the chairman could have called in, under the custom, three more persons to fill the places of regular members of the committee who might be absent. Surely the parties to the original agreement never contemplated such a condition as that. It is one thing to agree to a certain standing committee as a board of arbitration; but it is quite a different thing to have that committee, or any portion of it, left off the board of arbitration, and an entirely different member, or members, substituted therefor, without the consent of one party to the agreement. We hold that a custom of the Memphis Merchants' Exchange, which was not authorized by their printed rules or regulations, and which is in conflict with the written contract or agreement of submission to arbitration between the parties in this case, cannot be proven in order to sustain an award which was rendered by arbitrators one of whom was not authorized to act by the agreement of arbitration. See Werner v. Footman, 54 Ga. 128 (6); Emery v. Atlanta Real Estate Exchange, 88 Ga. 330 (2), 14 S. E. 556.

It is further insisted by plaintiff in error that the submission was to be according to rules and regulations of the Memphis Merchants' Exchange, and that there were printed rules of the exchange which provided for a contingency in which a vacancy on the committee could be filled, and the manner of filling it; that all previous rules and regulations were abolished; and that while this usage or practice, if consistent with a written by-law or regulation, would nevertheless be valid and prevail over and repeal the same, yet, under the facts of this case, the usage was in no sense in conflict with any written regulation, but was supplementary merely to existing rules, etc. We think otherwise, and that an award made by certain members of the regular committee of the Memphis Merchants' Exchange and an outside member of the exchange was not a compliance with the written submission for an award; nor was this rendered a compliance with the submission by showing a custom of the committee to supply the place of absent members by calling in other members of the exchange to take part in arbitrations. It is therefore our opinion that, notwithstanding that portion of the charge of the court above referred to, the jury, under the law and the facts, reached a correct verdict. The ruling here made makes it unnecessary to pass upon the other questions made in the record.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

HUNTER v. BOWEN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EJECTMENT (§ 64*)—PLEADING—DESCRIPTION OF LAND—DEMURRER.

In an equitable action, which is the substantial equivalent of a suit to recover land, the premises sought to be recovered must be definitely described. As against a special demurrer, a description is too indefinite which describes the land in controversy as situated in the southeast corner of the western half of a certain lot in a certain land district of a certain county, bought from the defendant and on which he is farming, and adjacent to other lands of the defendant, without giving the area or the dimensions of the lot, or other descriptive words identifying the premises, so that the sheriff, in the execution of a writ of possession, can deliver the possession in accordance with its mandate.

2. RECEIVERS (§ 19*)—INSOLVENCY OF TENANT—SUIT TO RECOVER LAND.

A landlord may maintain against his insolvent tenant in possession, who is allowing the land to deteriorate, a suit to recover the land and to prevent waste pendente lite, by the appointment of a receiver to take possession of the land and hold the rents and profits until final decree.

Error from Superior Court, Ben Hill County; U. V. Whipple, Judge.

Action by R. V. Bowen against G. E. Hunter. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Otis H. Elkins, for plaintiff in error. Haygood & Cutts, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The plaintiff, R. V. Bowen, filed his petition against G. E. Hunter, alleging that he was the "owner of a certain tract of land situated in the southeast corner of the west half of lot of land No. 269 in the Third district of originally Irwin (afterwards Wilcox, now Ben Hill) county; the title thereto being derived as herein shown: The said described tract of land and other portions of the same land lot in the year 1887 belonged to D. E. Hunter, the father of the defendant, who had long owned the same and been in actual possession thereof, and his ownership and possession were open, peaceable, and notorious, and accompanied by a claim of right. On September 27, 1887, the said D. E. Hunter conveyed to his said son a portion of the land above described, and thereupon his son, the defendant, G. E. Hunter, took possession of the said lot of land, and remained in actual possession thereof, living and farming thereon, until the 31st day of August, 1905. On the 27th day of September, 1887, the said G. E. Hunter borrowed from the petitioner $269.50, and thereupon on said date the said G. E. Hunter executed to petitioner a warranty deed in fee simple, conveying to him the said described piece of land, which deed was duly executed, and was recorded, on April 11, 1904, in the clerk's office of Wilcox superior court, where the land was at that time located; the deed being recorded in Deed Book U, p. 620." It was further alleged that, though this deed was unconditional on its face, yet it was understood that the defendant would have the privilege of paying back the indebtedness and repurchasing the land, but that he agreed to and did pay rent for the premises during the time he held the same. On August 31, 1905, it was agreed between the plaintiff and defendant that the plaintiff should pay to the defendant the additional sum of $350, and should become the absolute owner of the tract of land, and that the defendant should make to the plaintiff a quitclaim deed for the purpose of showing that he had parted with his right of redemption. Accordingly the transaction was consummated, and the additional purchase money paid, and on said date the defendant executed to petitioner his certain quitclaim deed, reciting a consideration of $800, and conveying to petitioner the same described premises, which deed was duly executed and recorded in the clerk's office of Ben Hill county February 11, 1906, in Deed Book 4, page 37. It was further alleged that the defendant remained on the premises the succeeding year of 1906, under an agreement to pay a rental of $48. The defendant failed to pay the rent for 1906, and the plaintiff caused a distress warrant to be issued and levied upon certain property, which was claimed by members of the defendant's family. That on January 20, 1906, being unable to collect his rent, he sued out a warrant against the defendant as a tenant holding over, and the defendant under this warrant was dispossessed by a deputy sheriff of the county; and afterwards the defendant re-entered possession and has since that time forcibly and unlawfully held possession of the premises. That he was prosecuted in the city court of Fitzgerald for trespass on account of the manner in which he took possession of the land, and he had continued his case for at least three terms of court on various pretexts. That the plaintiff, in the hope of satisfying the defendant, caused the land to be processioned, due notice having been given to the defendant, who was in possession of an adjoining piece of land, which he claimed subject to a long loan deed to the same. That the processioners awarded the land to the plaintiff, but notwithstanding all of these facts the defendant continues in possession of the land, making a crop thereon, and refusing to allow the plaintiff to take charge of the same. That the defendant is insolvent, and it is doubtful whether the crop on the premises will be sufficient to pay the rent. Wherefore the petitioner prayed that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the entire premises, including the crops, that the defendant be enjoined from interfering with the possession of the receiver, that the premises be decreed to be the property of the plaintiff, that it be decreed that the defendant has no claim or interest therein, and for permanent injunction, general relief, and process. The defendant demurred generally to the petition, on the ground that no cause of action was stated, and that "the allegations of said petition set forth no description sufficiently accurate and definite to enable the court legally to enter any decree granting any of the prayers of said petition." The court construed the demurrer to be general, and overruled it, and the case proceeded to trial, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he excepted.

[1] 1. The petition was in the nature of an equitable action of ejectment. The plaintiff prayed for a decree declaring the title to be in him, and to enjoin the defendant from interfering with the premises. The defendant was alleged to be in possession, and the plaintiff sought to have him deliver up possession to the receiver, who was to turn over the land to him in the event that he prevailed. A suit of this character is substantially the equivalent of an action of ejectment. In Harwell v. Foster, 97 Ga. 204, 22 S. E. 994, it was held: "It is essential to the maintenance of an action of ejectment that the premises alleged to have been demised be described with such certainty as that, in the event of a recovery by the plaintiff, a writ of possession issued upon the judgment, and describing the premises as laid in the declaration, shall so identify the premises sued for as that the sheriff, in the execution of the writ, can deliver the possession in accordance with its mandate." This case has since been followed. Clark v. Knowles, 129 Ga. 291, 53 S. E. 841; Hollywood Cemetery v. Hudson, 133 Ga. 276, 65 S. E. 777. The only description of the land is that contained in the second paragraph of the petition, which describes the land as situated in the southeast corner of the west half of lot of land No. 269. Neither the area nor the dimensions of the lot are given; and its shape, whether in the form of a square, or other geometrical figure, or of irregular shape, is left to conjecture. The further allegation that it is the same land upon which the defendant was farming, or the same land that was described in a certain deed recorded in the clerk's office, which is not attached, will not serve to aid the defective description, as against a special demurrer. The rule of pleading is that the property sought to be recovered must be definitely described in the pleadings. We think that ground of the demurrer which complains of the insufficiency of the description of the premises was special, and not general, and that the defendant was entitled to have a more specific description of the land. The plaintiff prayed for a memorial record declaring that he had title to the land in controversy, and the defendant had the right to demand that the petition definitely describe the land as a basis of the decree. Not only this, but the petition affirmatively disclosed that the defendant was in possession of adjacent land, claiming title thereto; and it was important that the land should be so accurately described as to locate the boundaries between the land of the contending parties. This special demurrer should have been sustained.

[2] 2. If the land had been definitely described, the petition made a case entitling the plaintiff to relief. Patterson v. Clark, 89 Ga. 700, 15 S. E. 641; Tufts v. Little, 56 Ga. 139; Vizard v. Moody, 117 Ga. 67, 43 S. E. 426. In view of the erroneous ruling on the special demurrer, it becomes necessary to consider the various grounds of the motion for new trial.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

NICHOLSON v. DILLARD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 14, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 837*)—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—ERRORS—TIME FOR PRESENTATION.

The motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions in this case is without merit, as it comes within the ruling made in the case of Castleberry v. Parrish, 135 Ga. 527, 69 S. E. 817.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 837.*]

2. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 9*)—WORDS ACTIONABLE—INJURY IN PROFESSION.

The following words, spoken of a female school-teacher, are actionable in a suit for slander, brought by the person of whom the words were spoken against the person speaking them, to wit: "That under the circumstances I cannot send to her; that her character was not good; that my daughter Claudie Dillard had heard things concerning her character, and that she would not go to her unless I made her; that I have been told things by several that pointed to bad character; that I have been told by young men that they had been to her home and had taken drinks of coca-cola, cider, or something, and that she would give toasts that would actually make them blush, and that she and her sister, Susie Nicholson, lived in a home alone in Buena Vista, and that this house was a regular stopping-off place for traveling men; that if she was taken for a teacher it will cut me out of school, as she was mighty fast from what I have been told, and I believe what I have heard to be true; that I have a particular reason for not sending to her; that I have been told that her character was bad; that I have been particular with my own girl, and I don't [care] for her to associate with her."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 80-90; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

3. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 9*)—WORDS ACTIONABLE—INJURY TO PERSON IN TRADE OR PROFESSION.

At common law only words imputing a crime to another were actionable per se; but under our statute words calculated to injure one in his trade or profession are actionable.

4. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§§ 36, 50, 51*)—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS—RESPONSIBILITY.

Privileged communications are absolute or conditional; in the former case, the privilege is a bar to recovery; in the latter case, in order for communications to be so privileged as to be a bar in a suit for slander, it must appear that the words were spoken bona fide to protect the speaker's private interests, and not with malicious intent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 113-150; Dec. Dig. §§ 36, 50, 51.*]

Error from Superior Court, Chattahoochee County; S. P. Gilbert, Judge.

Action by Mary Nicholson against J. S. Dillard. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the petition, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

J. J. Dunham, C. C. Minter, and Hatcher & Hatcher, for plaintiff in error. Wynn & Wohlwender, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. Mary Nicholson filed her petition against James S. Dillard, in which it was alleged that the defendant did falsely and maliciously say of plaintiff to Mr. C. H. McGlaun, who had called on petitioner in behalf of petitioner's application to teach school: "That under the circumstances I cannot send to her (meaning petitioner); that her (meaning petitioner) character was not good (meaning that petitioner was not virtuous); that my daughter Claudie Dillard had heard things concerning her (meaning petitioner's) character, and that she (meaning his daughter Claudie) would not go to her (meaning petitioner) unless I made her (meaning his daughter Claudie); that I have been told things by several that pointed to bad character (meaning that petitioner was not a virtuous woman); that I have been told by young men that they (meaning the young men) had been to her (meaning petitioner's) home and had taken drinks of coca-cola, cider, or something, and that she (meaning petitioner) would give toasts that would actually make them (meaning the young men) blush (meaning that petitioner was a debauched and immoral person), and that she (meaning petitioner) and her (meaning petitioner's) sister, Susie Nicholson, lived in a home alone in Buena Vista, and that this house (meaning the home wherein petitioner lived) was a regular stopping-off place for traveling men (meaning that the home of petitioner was a place of ill repute); that if she (meaning petitioner) was taken for a teacher it will cut me out of school, as she (meaning petitioner) was mighty fast from what I have been told (thereby meaning that your petitioner was not virtuous), and I believe what I have heard to be true (meaning that he, Dillard, did not believe petitioner to be a virtuous woman)." And also that the defendant used the following language in a conversation with Mr. Wess McGlaun: "That I have a particular reason for not sending to her (meaning petitioner); that I have been told that her (meaning petitioner's) character was bad (meaning petitioner was not a virtuous woman); that I have been particular with my own girl, and I don't [care] for her (meaning his daughter) to associate with her (meaning petitioner)." Plaintiff further alleged that, by reason of the "false, malicious, and defamatory" statements made by said Dillard concerning her character, she had failed to be selected as a teacher for the school for which she applied, and she alleged as special damages the sum of $400 and as general damages the sum of $5,000.

The defendant filed both special and general demurrers to the petition. The first special demurrer was as follows: "Paragraph third of said petition is specially demurred to, on the ground that the language, to wit: 'That under the circumstances I cannot send to her; that her character is not good; that my daughter Claudie Dillard had heard things concerning her character, and that she would not go to her unless I made her; that I have been told things by several that pointed to bad character; that I have been told by young men that they had been to her home and had taken drinks of coca-cola, cider, or something, and that she would give them toasts that would actually make them blush, and she and her sister, Susie Nicholson, lived in a home in Buena Vista, and that this house was a regular stopping-off place for traveling men; that if she was taken for a teacher it will cut me out of school, as she was mighty fast from what I have been told, and I believe what I have heard to be true'—are not such words and language as would in law entitle plaintiff to a cause of action against this defendant, for the reason that such words are not in their nature slanderous, and that such words are too general to inform defendant of plaintiff's demand, and that they fail to set out in what way the said words could or did affect said plaintiff, and said words and language could not in any wise affect the plaintiff's trade, calling, or profession, and they fail to state wherein the same was or could have been affected, and that said words or language do not impute to plaintiff the commission of a crime punishable by law, or with any contagious disorder, or being guilty of an act which would exclude her from society, nor do they relate to said plaintiff's trade, office, or profession, calculated to injure her therein, nor are such words productive of special damages flowing therefrom, and no special damages are set out therein." The general demurrer was to the effect that no sufficient cause of action was set out in said petition and that no special damages were alleged. The court sustained the special demurrers to paragraphs 3 and 4 of the petition, on the ground that the words set out, independent of innuendoes, were not sufficient to set out a cause of action. No ruling was made upon the demurrer to the fifth paragraph of the plaintiff's petition. The court also sustained the general demurrer and ordered the petition dismissed.

[1] 1. On the call of the case in this court, a motion was made to dismiss the bill of exceptions, because it had not been tendered to the judge within 30 days from the rendition of the order and judgment sustaining the demurrers of the defendant and dismissing the plaintiff's petition, "in that the record shows that the judgment complained of was rendered on the 1st day of June, 1911, and the certificate of the judge shows that the bill of exceptions was tendered to him on July 8, 1911, and the certificate also shows that the judge was absent only from June 21, 1911, to July 3, 1911, and fails to show any reason why the bill of exceptions was not presented and certified sooner than the 8th day of July, 1911, or that the plaintiff in error was without fault." The bill of exceptions itself recites that "now, within 30 days from the rendition of said judgment," etc., comes the plaintiff and presents this bill of exceptions, etc. The judge also certifies: "I was out of the circuit and state from June 20 to July 3, 1911." Under the repeated rulings of this court, a writ of error will not be dismissed, where it appears from the bill of exceptions and certificate of the trial judge that it was tendered within 30 days from the date of the judgment complained of. Castleberry v. Parrish, 135 Ga. 527, 69 S. E. 817. The recital in the bill of exceptions that it was tendered within 30 days after the rendition of the judgment complained of is not negated by the statement of the judge in his certificate: "I was out of the circuit and state from June 20 to July 3, 1911."

[2] 2. This was a suit for slander, brought by Mary Nicholson against James S. Dillard in Chattahoochee superior court. The court below sustained general and special demurrers filed to the petition, and we are called upon to decide whether this judgment was error. The answer to that question depends upon whether the words spoken by the defendant are actionable per se, or whether special damages must be alleged. The plaintiff was a school-teacher and had applied for a school. She had secured the requisite number of patrons, save one, to obtain the school. That one was the defendant, James S. Dillard. To C. H. McGlaun, who had called on Dillard in behalf of the plaintiff's application for the school, the defendant is alleged to have used the following language of and concerning the plaintiff, and to have done so falsely and maliciously, to wit: "That under the circumstances I cannot send to her; that her character was not good; that my daughter Claudie Dillard had heard things concerning her character, and that she would not go to her unless I made her; that I have been told things by several that pointed to bad character; that I have been told by young men that they had been to her home and had taken drinks of coca-cola, cider, or something, and that she would give toasts that would actually make them blush, and that she and her sister, Susie Nicholson, lived in a home alone in Buena Vista, and that this house was a regular stopping-off place for traveling men; that if she was taken for a teacher it will cut me out of school, as she was mighty fast from what I have been told, and I believe what I have heard to be true." And again: "That I have a particular reason for not sending to her; that I have been told that her character was bad; that I have been particular with my own girl, and I don't [care] for her to associate with her." It appears from the record that the plaintiff did not secure the position as teacher of the school; the defendant, Dillard, refusing to support the plaintiff for the reasons given by him above.

Were the words of defendant actionable? We think they are. We hold that the language set forth in the plaintiff's petition is susceptible of the construction placed upon it by the innuendo, and is calculated to injure the plaintiff, and therefore actionable. Our law defines slander as follows: "Slander, or oral defamation, consists, first, in imputing to another a crime punishable by law; or, second, charging him with having some contagious disorder, or being guilty of some debasing act which may exclude him from society; or, third, in charges made on another in reference to his trade, office, or profession, calculated to injure him therein; or, fourth, any disparaging words productive of special damage flowing naturally therefrom. In the latter case, the special damage is essential to support the action; in the three former, damage is inferred." Civil Code 1910, § 4433. The third paragraph of the above section provides that slander shall consist "in charges made on another in reference to his trade, office, or profession, calculated to injure him therein." The demurrer admits the language was falsely spoken of the plaintiff. It was spoken in reference to her fitness as a teacher. Teaching seems to have been the plaintiff's profession. If the above language was spoken, and spoken of the plaintiff in reference to her "profession," the one question remains to be determined, namely: Was it calculated to injure her therein? We have said that the language was susceptible of the construction put upon it by the petition; and, if so, we have substantially from the petition this: That the defendant meant that the plaintiff's character was not good, meaning that the plaintiff was not virtuous; that the defendant had been told by young men that they had been to the plaintiff's home and taken drinks of coca-cola, cider, or something, and that the plaintiff would give toasts that would actually make them blush, meaning that petitioner was a debauched and immoral person; and that plaintiff and her sister, Susie Nicholson, lived in a home alone in Buena Vista, and that the house was a regular stopping place for traveling men, meaning that the house of the plaintiff was a place of ill repute; that if the plaintiff was taken for a teacher it would cut defendant out of the school, as plaintiff was mighty fast from what the defendant had been told, thereby meaning that the plaintiff was not virtuous, and that the defendant believed what he had heard to be true; that defendant had particular reason for not sending to the plaintiff; that he had been told that her character was bad, meaning that the plaintiff was not a virtuous woman; that the defendant had been particular with his own girl, and did not want her to associate with the plaintiff. This language is susceptible to the meaning placed upon it by the innuendo in plaintiff's petition. If so, was it calculated to injure the plaintiff in her profession as a school-teacher? We think the language of the defendant was calculated to injure the plaintiff.

[4] It may be stated, as a general rule, that published words, written or oral, falsely used, are actionable if they directly tend to the prejudice or injury of any one in his profession, trade or business. 25 Cyc. 326 (G); Civil Code (quoted supra); Hardy v. Williamson, 86 Ga. 551, 12 S. E. 874, 22 Am. St. Rep. 479. But the defendant insists that his language spoken of the plaintiff is not actionable, because the language quoted was privileged under our law, and hence he is protected by the bar by which privileged communications shield one coming within its provisions. The following communications are declared to be privileged: "(1) Statements made bona fide in the performance of a public duty. (2) Similar statements in the performance of a private duty, either legal or moral. (3) Statements made with the bona fide intent, on the part of the speaker, to protect his own interest in a matter where it is concerned." Civil Code 1910, § 4436. But this section should be construed in connection with the next following section (section 4437), which is as follows: "In every case of privileged communications, if the privilege is used merely as a cloak for venting private malice, and not bona fide in promotion of the object for which the privilege is granted, the party defamed has a right of action." Communications may be either absolutely or qualifiedly privileged. In the latter case it furnishes only a prima facie lawful excuse for making it. Townsend on Slander and Libel (4th Ed.) § 209; Cooley v. Galyan, 109 Tenn. 1, 70 S. W. 607, 60 L. R. A. 139, 97 Am. St. Rep. 823; Atlanta News Pub. Co. v. Medlock, 123 Ga. 714 (2), 51 S. E. 756, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1139; Sheftall v. Central Ry. Co., 123 Ga. 589, 51 S. E. 646; Henry v. Moberly, 6 Ind. App. 490, 33 N. E. 981. In the former case no remedy can be had in a civil action. Cooley v. Galyan, 109 Tenn. 1, 70 S. W. 607, 60 L. R. A. 139, 97 Am. St. Rep. 823. But in the latter case, while the communication may be privileged, it is so in a qualified sense. One may use of another language, if true, with a bona fide intent to protect his own interest in a matter where it is concerned; but in such a case he must do so at his peril, if he exceeds the limit of his privilege and uses the language, not merely to protect his interest, but to vent his private malice on the person spoken of. Whether it is so spoken is properly a question of fact for the jury trying the case to determine.

[3] At common law an action for slander could not be maintained for imputing want of chastity to a female, in the absence of an allegation of special damages; for such language at common law to be actionable per se, the words must impute some crime or misdemeanor. Note to Battles v. Tyson, 77 Neb. 563, 110 N. W. 299, in 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 577, 578; 1 Odgers on Libel and Slander (Am. Ed. 1887, from 2d Eng. Ed.) *86, *87, 88; Townsend on Slander and Libel (4th Ed. 1890) § 172, and cases cited. And this probably accounts for the decisions in some states where certain slanderous words are held not actionable; for, in the absence of statutes so declaring, the lack of chastity was not punishable at common law. At common law it was held that to charge that the plaintiff had a bastard child was not actionable, for she was not punishable in the temporal courts, nor under 18 Eliz., unless the child was rightly chargeable to the parish. 2 Salk. 694; 2 Ld. Raym. 1004. In our state, before the statute (and Code), only words imputing a crime were actionable per se. Pledger v. Hathcock, 1 Ga. 550. Words imputing the crime of fornication were held actionable per se in Richardson v. Roberts, 23 Ga. 215, 221(8). And the following words were held slanderous and actionable: "She is a girl of bad character. I believe her to be a whore." Beggary v. Craft, 31 Ga. 309, 76 Am. Dec. 687. Words alleged to have been spoken are to be taken in the sense which is most natural and obvious, and in which those to whom they are spoken will be sure to understand them. 1 Ga. 550, supra. In the case of Henry v. Moberly, 6 Ind. App. 490, 33 N. E. 981, it was held that to say of a school-teacher, "Her character and conduct were not such as would give her a right influence over her pupils, and that she knowingly claimed wages not due her, is actionable per se." "It was held actionable to call a schoolmistress a dirty slut, or with being insane, or to charge by writing a school-teacher with making a false report to the school visitors and with general untruthfulness, or with want of chastity." Townsend on Slander and Libel (4th Ed.) §

190, p. 241; Bodwell v. Swan, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 379. Authorities might be greatly multiplied in support of the ruling here made, but we deem those given sufficient to support the proposition that the language attributable to the defendant tended to injure the plaintiff in her trade or profession as a school-teacher. We think that the words alleged to have been spoken by the defendant are calculated to injure the plaintiff in her trade or profession as a school-teacher, and therefore that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrers, general and special.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

(137 Ga. 305)

HUGER v. PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN DIOCESE OF GEORGIA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 14, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CHARITIES (§ 3*)—VALIDITY OF TRUST—STATUTE OF USES.

Charitable trusts are continuing executory trusts, and not within the statute of uses.

(a) There was no error in overruling the demurrer to the petition of the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Charities, Cent. Dig. §§ 3, 4; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. CHARITIES (§ 21*)—VALIDITY—DESIGNATION OF BENEFICIARY.

A landowner executed a deed to the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Georgia, described as a corporation. It recited a consideration of $10, "as well as the desire she, the party of the first part, has for the encouragement and promotion of the interests of the Protestant Episcopal Church." The habendum clause contained the following: "To have and to hold * * * unto the said party of the second part, its successors and assigns, in trust, nevertheless, for the use and benefit of the religious congregation in the county and state first mentioned, called St. John's Protestant Episcopal Church, its successors and assigns." There was evidence tending to show that there was at that place an existing congregation known as St. John's Church, or St. John's Mission, though it was never formally organized as St. John's Church. Held, that the trust so created was not void for want of a beneficiary.

(a) Even if there was no such church in actual existence when the deed was executed, but it was only in contemplation, this would not of itself render the trust void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Charities, Cent. Dig. §§ 44-50; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

3. CHARITIES (§ 30*)—VALIDITY—TERMINATION OF TRUST.

The deed containing no reversionary clause upon condition subsequent, no reversion arose under its terms because the congregation became inactive, or there was no organized congregation at that place, for a number of years.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Charities, Cent. Dig. § 61; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

4. CHARITIES (§ 30*)—VALIDITY—TERMINATION OF TRUST.

Under a deed of the character above set forth, it could not be declared that the trust therein created had failed or become impossible of accomplishment, so as to cause a reversion to the founder or her heirs, although there had been no active or organized congregation known as St. John's Church for some 14 or 15 years before the commencement of litigation.

5. TRUSTS (§ 43*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING TRUST.

In an action by the grantee in such a deed of trust to recover the land conveyed by it from the executor of the grantor, who had taken possession thereof, it was not competent by parol evidence to substantially add a condition subsequent to the written terms of the instrument, although this was offered as being explanatory of the consideration.

6. EVIDENCE (§§ 108, 471*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—MOTIVE.

There was no error in rejecting the testimony of a witness as to what was the motive of the grantor in making the deed. This was objectionable as opinion evidence; and the motive of one party, not shown to have been disclosed to the other, was irrelevant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 202-212, 2149-2185; Dec. Dig. §§ 108, 471.*]

7. CHARITIES (§ 80*)—TERMINATION OF TRUST—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

The opinion of the executor that there were already sufficient churches of the Episcopal denomination in the city where the land was located to supply all members of that denomination, and there was no real or apparent necessity for building a church on the land in controversy, as all the probable members were already members of other churches, and there would be no congregation to support it, would not suffice to show that the trust had terminated and a reversion had taken place; and the rejection of such evidence will not cause a reversal.

(a) If there were any slight inaccuracies in any of the numerous rulings of which complaint was made, they were not such as to require a reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Charities, Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

Error from Superior Court, Glynn County; C. B. Conyers, Judge.

Action by the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Georgia, as trustee, against F. K. Huger, executor, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant executor brings error. Affirmed.

R. D. Meader, for plaintiff in error. E. S. Elliott, Crovatt & Whitfield, and R. E. Dart, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. The Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Georgia, as trustee, brought ejectment against Huger, executor, and others. The court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepted. The testatrix of the defendant executor had made a deed to the plaintiff, recited to be a corporation, as trustee. The latter claimed that there was no beneficiary in existence, and that the deed was void, but, if not, that there had been a reversion, and that the grantee was not entitled to recover possession.

[1] 1. A demurrer was urged to the petition as amended, but it was without merit. Charitable trusts have been held to be continuing executory trusts, and not within the statute of uses. Beckwith v. Rector, etc., of St. Philip's Parish, 69 Ga. 564; Beckwith v. McBride, 70 Ga. 642.

[2] 2. The deed of trust to the plaintiff recited a consideration of $10, "as well as the desire she, the said party of the first part, has for the encouragement and promotion of the interests of the Protestant Episcopal Church." The habendum clause contained the following: "To have and to hold . . . unto the said party of the second part, its successors and assigns, in trust, nevertheless, for the use and benefit of the religious congregation in the county and state first mentioned, called St. John's Protestant Episcopal Church, its successors and assigns." There was evidence to show that there was in existence a congregation known as St. John's Church, or St. John's Mission, though never formally organized as St. John's Church. This continued in active operation for some two years or more. Since then there has been no active or organized congregation or church. It will be observed that the plaintiff was not declared to be trustee for a particular organized or incorporated church, but for a religious congregation called St. John's Episcopal Church. Even if there was no such church in actual existence when the deed was made, but only in contemplation, this would not ipso facto render the trust void. County of Gordon v. Mayor, etc., of Calhoun, 128 Ga. 781, 58 S. E. 860; 2 Story, Eq. (13th Ed.) § 1169.

[3] 3. The deed contained no deed subsequent, and there was no reversionary clause in case the property should be sold or not used for church purposes. There was thus no reversion by virtue of the provisions of the deed. Thompson v. Hart, 133 Ga. 540, 66 S. E. 270; Adams v. First Baptist Church of St. Charles, 148 Mich. 140, 111 N. W. 757, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 509 and note.

[4] 4. Neither did the evidence show that a reversion had occurred, on the ground that the trust had failed or become impossible of accomplishment. Civil Code 1910, §§ 3739, 4153. As stated above, the deed recited a consideration of $10, as well as the desire the grantor "has for the encouragement and promotion of the interests of the Protestant Episcopal Church." This indicated a broader purpose than merely to build a certain edifice. There was no mention of building. The trustee was to hold for the use and benefit of a religious congregation called by a certain name, its successors and assigns. Thus the trust was not limited to a particular corporation or organized church, so as to fail or terminate if such church or corporation became inactive. It appears that the congregation or mission has not been active for some years. But a sluggish or dormant congregation is not beyond the possibility of being awakened to ecclesiastical activity; nor is it impossible that there may be a successor. If any diversion of trust property from the purposes of the trust should be sought to be made, it may perhaps be the subject of restraint by a court of equity. But it cannot be held that any reversion or resulting trust has arisen in favor of the executor of the grantor.

[5] 5-7. Certain parts of the answer were stricken on demurrer, and certain evidence was excluded. Aside from the lack of technical sufficiency in the pleading in the particular respects, the substantial defense sought to be raised by the pleadings and evidence was that the deceased grantor was the owner of a considerable tract of land, of which the lots in dispute formed a part; that she divided it into lots for sale, and believing that it would enhance the value of the property to have a church located upon it, and being herself a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church, of which her husband was also a member, and being desirous of honoring his memory by seeing a church of that denomination erected there, which should be called St. John's Protestant Episcopal Church (John being the Christian name of her husband), and being further actuated by a religious motive, in that a church erected at that place would be beneficial to the people of that immediate settlement, she made the deed in trust for St. John's Protestant Episcopal Church of Glynn County; that she was not herself able to erect the church, but believed that the plaintiff would do so, and would name it St. John's Church; that this was never done, "and it is extremely doubtful if it will ever be done, as the city of Brunswick is well supplied with churches of that denomination, and that there is no necessity for building such a church, and that the deed is therefore invalid." No fraud, accident, or mistake in drawing the deed was alleged, and no effort to reform it was made, though there was a prayer for cancellation contained in an amendment to the answer. We have already held that the deed was not void on its face. If it was sought by parol to attach a condition subsequent to such deed, this could not be done.

[6] The effort to show by a witness what was the motive of the maker of the deed, if uncommunicated to the other party, was objectionable, both because it was not competent to show the undisclosed motive of a grantor in order to destroy the grant, and also because one person cannot testify broadly what motive is in the mind of another.

[7] The opinion of the executor, as a witness, that there were already sufficient churches of the Episcopal denomination in the city of Brunswick to supply all members of that denomination, and that there was no real or apparent necessity for building a church on the land in controversy, as all the probable members were already members of other churches, and there would be no congregation to support it, was properly rejected. If it would have been admissible when accompanied by other evidence, it would not alone have sufficed to cause a reversion, and its rejection would not work a reversal. A charitable trust cannot be avoided merely because a witness thinks it unnecessary. Church progress and extension are not limited to cases of absolute necessity. The evidence offered in this case was not such as the Code declares to be admissible to ascertain in what sense the testator or grantor used obscure, doubtful, or equivocal words (Civil Code, § 4608), or in applying the doctrine of cy pres (section 4604).

What we have said above covers the substantial features of the case. Without discussing separately each point raised, even if there were any inaccuracies, none of them present sufficient ground for reversal.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

E. B. MARTIN & SONS v. BANK OF LEESBURG.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL (§ 256*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE—REQUESTS.

It is not error requiring a new trial for the court to charge the jury, in a civil case: "Now, in the outset, the burden rests with the plaintiff to establish the plaintiff's allegations. The burden is on the plaintiff to establish that to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury"—where the court has correctly given the jury in charge the general law as to the preponderance of testimony, and no request is made of the court to qualify the language objected to.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 628-641; Dec. Dig. § 256.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 256*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—NECESSITY.

Nor is the failure to charge the jury relative to the impeachment of witnesses error, in the absence of a request to so charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 628-641; Dec. Dig. § 256.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 256*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—NECESSITY.

Where the court, in the general charge to the jury, has fully and accurately given the law and covered the issues in the case, it is not error to fail to give any additional charge to the jury, especially in the absence of a request for an additional charge.

4. EVIDENCE (§ 511*)—EXPERT TESTIMONY—COMPETENCY.

Where suit was brought for money had and received by a bank, which by its answer denied receiving the deposit, the amount of which was sought to be recovered by the suit, it was not error for the court to allow a witness testifying as an expert, over objection of plaintiff's counsel, to testify: "This $900 ticket [referring to the certificate of deposit for $900 introduced by plaintiff] was evidently traced from a paper already written. It was not made at the first writing"—the contention of the defendant being that the alleged certificate of deposit was a forgery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2315; Dec. Dig. § 511.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 271*)—MEMORANDUM BY PARTY TESTIFYING—ACTION AGAINST BANK—RECOVERY OF DEPOSIT.

There was no error in ruling out the testimony referred to in the fifth division of the opinion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1068-1104; Dec. Dig. § 271.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§§ 164, 588*)—RELEVANCY—ABSENCE OF ENTRY IN RECORD.

A witness, who has examined a record for the purpose of showing the absence of a certain entry therein, is competent to testify to the absence of such entry.

(a) And the absence of an entry on the books of the bank has evidential value tending to show that no deposit was made, where the cashier of the bank has testified that deposit slips were always entered on the books of the bank on the day the deposit and slip were made.

7. NEW TRIAL (§ 42*)—DISQUALIFICATION OF JURY—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where the competency of certain jurors who participated in the verdict is attacked on the ground that they had formed and expressed an opinion on the merits of the case prejudicial to the plaintiffs, and which was unknown to the plaintiffs and their attorneys until after the verdict was rendered, it is no abuse of discretion for the court to hold said jurors competent, where the evidence on that point was conflicting.

8. NEW TRIAL (§ 71*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 979*)—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

A trial court is vested by law with a discretion in granting new trials, and where no errors of law appear, and the evidence on the questions of fact involved in the case is conflicting, the trial court must exercise his discretion in passing on the evidence under the motion for a new trial; and this court will not disturb such exercise of discretion unless it is contrary to law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 144, 145; Dec. Dig. § 71.* Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3871-3873; Dec. Dig. § 979.*]

Error from Superior Court, Lee County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action by E. B. Martin & Sons against the Bank of Leesburg. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

J. W. Walters, Sr., Shipp & Sheppard, and W. G. Martin, for plaintiffs in error. Hardeman, Jones, Callaway & Johnston and H. L. Long, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. E. B. Martin & Sons brought suit in Lee superior court against the Bank of Leesburg to recover the principal sum of $900 and interest at 7 per cent. thereon from the 20th day of October, 1909, which amount the plaintiffs claimed to have deposited with the defendant during its banking hours on the above-named date, taking its certificate of deposit therefor. They averred various demands for the money, and refusal of the defendant to pay the same; and they also sought to recover the sum of $300 of defendant, as counsel fees, because of the stubborn litigiousness of the defendant in refusing to pay the sum of $900 when often requested. The defendant, by its answer and cross-petition, admitted that it refused to pay the amount claimed by the plaintiffs, but denied that demands had been made upon it as stated, and alleged that the certificate of deposit sued on was never executed by it, or by any person by it authorized to do so, that no such deposit as alleged was made by plaintiffs with defendant, and that plaintiffs were indebted to defendant in the sum of $170.68, on account of overdrafts by plaintiffs on defendant. The jury trying the case, under the charge of the court, found a verdict for the defendant, also in favor of the defendant for $170.68, as principal, besides interest on the same at 7 per cent. from December 13, 1909. A motion for a new trial, on various grounds was overruled by the court, and the plaintiffs excepted.

[1] 1. The third ground of the amended motion for a new trial alleges error in the following charge of the court to the jury: "Now, in the outset, the burden rests with the plaintiff to establish the plaintiff's allegations. The burden is on the plaintiff to establish that to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury." This charge is objected to, on the ground that it puts a greater burden on the plaintiffs than is placed by the law. It is insisted that the law does not require the plaintiff to establish the truth of his allegations to the "reasonable satisfaction of the jury," but only by a preponderance of the evidence, and for the further reason that this charge makes the individual mind of the juror the standard, rather than "a reasonable and impartial" mind. While technically inaccurate, perhaps, when taken by itself, yet, when considered in connection with the main charge on this subject, we cannot say that the charge complained of was reversible error. In the case of Gunn v. Harris, 88 Ga. 439, 14 S. E. 593, it was held that, where the court had charged the jury that "the burden is upon the plaintiff to make out his case to your satisfaction by proper testimony before he can ask the jury to give him a verdict," the omission to charge, in the absence of a special request, the general doctrine as to the preponderance of evidence, was not error. See, also, Fusser v. Thompson, 132 Ga. 280, 64 S. E. 75, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 571.

The fourth assignment of error is substantially the same as that offered in the third ground of the motion, namely, that the judge erred in charging the jury that: "In the outset, the burden rests upon the plaintiff to establish the plaintiff's allegations, the truth of the allegations made. The burden is on the plaintiff to establish that to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury," etc. The plaintiffs in error insist that this charge places a greater burden on the plaintiff than the law authorizes, namely, to prove the contention of plaintiff to the "reasonable satisfaction of the jury," when the law only requires the plaintiff to establish his case by a preponderance of the testimony. We think that, taking the charge as a whole, the language complained of was not calculated to mislead the jury on that subject. The court had charged the jury that if they should find a conflict in the testimony, so that they could not reconcile it and make all the witnesses speak the truth, then what was known as the preponderance of evidence should control them in making their verdict, and on the question of preponderance of testimony he further charged them: "A preponderance of evidence, gentlemen, is simply the superior weight of evidence, gentlemen—is simply that superior weight of evidence that leads or inclines the mind of the jury to accept and believe one side of an issue in preference to the other. It is not required that that superior weight should be sufficient to satisfy your minds beyond a reasonable doubt, but that superior weight that leads you or inclines you to accept one side as the truth instead of the other," etc. Taken all together, we think the charge as given was a correct statement of the rule as to the preponderance of testimony. See Savannah Electric Co. v. Mullikin, 126 Ga. 724, 55 S. E. 945. Nor do we think the court's charge as to the shifting of the burden of proof was error.

[2] 2. Failure to charge the jury the law as to the impeachment of witnesses is not error, in the absence of a request so to charge. No such request appears in this case. Brown v. McBride, 129 Ga. 93 (7), 58 S. E. 702; Boynton v. State, 115 Ga. 587 (3), 41 S. E. 995.

[3] 3. No errors appear in the charge of the court, and failures to charge, as set out in the remaining grounds of the motion for a new trial, especially in view of the certificate of the trial judge, which recites that no request was made to charge on the subject referred to. Taken as a whole, the charge submitted the issues involved to the jury fully and accurately, and, if any additional charge was desired by the plaintiffs in error, a request therefor should have been made of the court.

[4] 4. It was not error for the court to allow a witness testifying as an expert, over objection of the plaintiffs' counsel, to testify: "This $900 ticket [referring to the certificate of deposit for $900 introduced by plaintiff] was evidently traced from a paper already written. It was not made at the first writing."

[5] 5. There is no merit in the contention that the court erred in ruling out the following answer of the witness M. M. Martin, while on the stand, who was presented with a memorandum book, and, referring to the book, said: "This other book presented is a little memorandum that I kept in my safe. I kept this one myself. I put this $900 entry in it the evening I sent that deposit over there." Doster v. Brown, 25 Ga. 24, 25, 71 Am. Dec. 153.

[6] 6. Movants assign error in the court allowing defendant to prove by T. F. Heminger, a witness, the following: "I did not find on the books any entry of the $900 deposited October 20th, made by E. B. Martin & Sons. There was no record on the books [meaning the books of the Bank of Leesburg] whatever of that deposit, and I found no deposit ticket of that amount to E. B. Martin & Sons." Movants contend that this testimony is incompetent, because it shows negatively a want of an entry on the books of defendant in order to prove that no deposit had been made in the bank. We do not think there is merit in this contention. One way to show the absence of an entry in a record is for some one who has examined the record to testify to the absence of such entry. Nor is it necessary, in order for one to so testify, that they have exclusive possession of the records about which they testify. Any person who has read or examined the record would be a competent witness, if not otherwise disqualified. And testimony of this kind has been held admissible by this court a number of times. Hines v. Johnston, 95 Ga. 629, 644 (3), 23 S. E. 470; Daniel v. Braswell, 113 Ga. 373, 38 S. E. 829; Jordan v. State, 127 Ga. 278 (2), 56 S. E. 422. Nor is the above ruling error as having no evidential value to the effect that the deposit had not been made, taken in connection with what the assistant cashier had testified, namely, that no deposit had been made as alleged, and the cashier's testimony that the deposit slips were always entered upon the books of the bank the same day they came in; the testimony being admissible as tending to show that the deposit had not been made as contended.

[7] 7. The fifteenth ground of the motion alleges that a new trial should be granted because B. E. Fouché and J. W. Fouché, 2 of the 12 jurors who tried this case in the court below and rendered their verdict therein, were incompetent jurors, because they, and each of them, prior to the trial and during the trial, had formed and expressed an opinion on the merits of the case prejudicial to the plaintiffs, which was unknown to the plaintiffs and their attorneys until after the verdict had been rendered. There are affidavits pro and con as to the competency of the jurors named and for the reasons set forth. As the evidence was conflicting on this point, and the trial judge decided in favor of the competency of the jurors, we cannot say that he abused his discretion in so doing.

[8] 8. One ground of error remains to be considered. It is not specifically set forth in the motion itself, nor, indeed, could it well be, as the ground of error alleged is the order of the court overruling the motion for a new trial, which arose after the motion was argued and submitted. Counsel for plaintiff in error insist in their brief, as they did in the oral argument before this court, that the order of the court overruling the motion for a new trial does not show that the trial judge has approved the verdict in this case by the exercise of the discretion vested in him by law. The order of the trial judge overruling the motion is as follows: "After consideration of the record in this case, I am of the opinion that none of the grounds of the amendment to the motion called for the grant of a new trial, and, as far as the facts are concerned, I feel that is a question I cannot interfere with in this case, but the same is one peculiarly for the jury. I have for years known the witnesses on both sides of the material facts, and should have without hesitation or question accepted any statement made by either of them to me. Therefore the motion is hereby overruled and a new trial denied."

It is insisted that the use of the language by the trial judge quoted above is evidence of the fact that he did not exercise the discretion vested in him by law. The law is plain that a judge of the superior court shall have power to correct errors and grant new trials. Civil Code 1910, §§ 6078, 6079, 6088. In passing upon motions for a new trial, a judge must exercise his discretion, and not fail to exercise it upon questions of fact simply because the jury had passed upon the same. Whether the judge erred in this case by reason of the language used depends upon what he meant when he said in his order, "As far as the facts are concerned, I feel that is a question I cannot interfere with in this case, but the same is one peculiarly for the jury." If the language quoted meant that the judge did not have the power or authority to grant a new trial, then it would be error; but if the court meant that inasmuch as the evidence was conflicting, and the jury had found the issues of fact in favor of the defendant, he would exercise his discretion in such matter by not disturbing their verdict and granting a new trial, then we hold that there was no error committed. We are inclined to take the latter view. We must presume that the trial judge knew the rule as to the necessity of exercising his discretion, and that he did exercise it; and, while the language attributed to him is susceptible of the construction placed upon it by the plaintiffs in error, we cannot assume, in the absence of positive evidence to the contrary, that the judge knowingly declined to exercise his discretion. We hold that he did exercise his discretion.

One other remark with reference to the order overruling the motion for a new trial: The question was raised here after the order had left the hands of the court, and he had no opportunity to explain, by note or otherwise, what he did mean; but, giving the language that interpretation which we think it deserves, we must conclude that there was no intention to evade the exercise of a sound legal discretion in passing on the motion for a new trial. City of Atlanta v. Brown, 73 Ga. 633.

We have read and considered the record in this case carefully, and as we discover no errors of law in any of the grounds of the motion requiring a new trial, and the evidence being amply sufficient to sustain the verdict, and the trial judge being satisfied therewith, we conclude that the judgment of the court below must be:

Affirmed. All the Justices concur.

VERDERY et al., County Com'rs, v.
WALTON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 14, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. COUNTIES (§ 132*)—LIABILITIES—FEES OF ORDINARY—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

So much of sections 5 and 7 of the act of 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 107) as provides for the auditing of the fees of the ordinary by the proper county officials, and the payment of such fees by the county, is not impliedly repealed by the act approved August 18, 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 70).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

2. COUNTIES (§ 132*)—STATUTES (§ 64*)—PARTIAL INVALIDITY OF STATUTE—LIABILITIES IMPOSED ON COUNTY—CONSTITUTIONALITY—PURPOSE OF TAXATION.

Under article 7, § 6, par. 2, of the Constitution (Civ. Code 1910, § 6562), a county tax cannot be levied for the purpose of raising money to pay pensions to Confederate soldiers and the widows of Confederate soldiers. The tax authorized for this purpose is one to be laid by the General Assembly over the whole state. If the General Assembly require of a designated official that he render the necessary service to the pensioner, respecting the making of the application and collecting and paying over the money, and fix a fee for such services, payable out of the county treasury, the provision as to payment of fees is unconstitutional and void, because the fee partakes of the character of the pension, and cannot be constitutionally paid out of taxes levied by the county. The legislative scheme of the act of 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 107), requiring payment of the ordinary's fees from the county treasury, contemplated the payment of fees for all classes of pensioners; and the legislative intent cannot be given effect by enforcing the provision only in favor of indigent pensioners on the ground that a county may constitutionally levy a tax for the care of paupers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 132; Statutes, Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Application by A. R. Walton for mandamus to E. F. Verderer and others, as County Commissioners, to require them to audit his claim for fees in services rendered to indigent pensioners. From a judgment for the applicant, defendants bring error. Reversed.

Salem Dutcher, for plaintiffs in error. E. H. Callaway, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The main point in this case is whether there existed any valid constitutional law by virtue of which the ordinary could demand payment of his fees from county funds for preparing the applications of those entitled to pensions at the time the services were rendered, for which compensation is demanded. Under the Constitution of this state as originally adopted the power of taxation over the whole state was given to supply soldiers, who lost a limb or limbs in the military service of the Confederate States, with substantial artificial limbs during life. The Constitution was subsequently amended at various times, authorizing taxes to be levied to pay pensions for such Confederate soldiers as may have been otherwise disabled or permanently injured in such service, or who may, by reason of age and poverty, or infirmity and poverty, or blindness and poverty, be unable to provide a living for themselves, and for the widows of such Confederate soldiers as may have died in the service of the Confederate States, or since, from wounds received therein, or disease contracted in the service, or by reason of age and poverty, or infirmity and poverty, or blindness and poverty, are unable to provide a living for themselves. In the various enactments to carry into effect these constitutional provisions, it was provided that blanks should be prepared and sent to the ordinary, to be filled out by applicants for pensions, and, upon proper proof being made before the ordinary of the county that the applicant was entitled to a pension, the completed application was to be forwarded to the proper authority. The ordinary was allowed a fee of $1 for each case prepared by him, which was to be paid by the applicant. It was declared to be unlawful for any other person to demand, collect, or receive any fee or commission from any pension beneficiary for any service rendered in preparing and presenting an application. The amounts appropriated for pensions were payable annually. By an act approved August 22, 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 107) pensions were made payable in quarterly installments. By the fifth section of the act it was declared that the "ordinary shall be paid by his county the sum of twenty-five cents for the name of each pensioner so entered on said roll, and for receiving and paying out the money, taking receipts, and for all services rendered each pensioner in each quarter"; and by the seventh section of the act it was made the duty of those officials having in charge the auditing of the claims and accounts of each county of this state to audit and order paid the claims of the ordinary of their county, when presented for services performed for the pensioners of their county, as required by this law, not exceeding 25 cents for each pensioner for each quarter. In the following year, by an act approved August 18, 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 70), it was required that pensioners be paid annually in one sum. The title of the act of 1908 is identical with that of 1907. The third, fourth, and sixth sections of the act of 1908 are in the same words as the corresponding sections of the act of 1907. Sections 1 and 2 of the two acts differ as to the time and mode of payment. The latter part of section 5 of the act of 1907, providing that the county shall pay the fees of the ordinary, is omitted from the act of 1908, and section 7 of the act of 1907, requiring the proper county officers to audit the claims of the ordinary for services performed for pensioners, is also omitted from the act of 1908.

[1] The question is raised whether the provision for the payment of the ordinary's fees by the county, as provided in the act of 1907, is impliedly repealed by the act of 1908. The argument advanced to support this position is that the act of 1907 was a general act dealing exhaustively with the subject of the payment of pensions, and the subsequent act of 1908 was a general act dealing with the same subject, but in a different manner in several particulars from the first act, so as to indicate a plain legislative intent that the later act was to be substituted for the former and to embrace the sole law on the subject. An act which does not purport to amend or repeal any particular law is not within the constitutional provision that no law shall be amended or repealed by mere reference to its title, but that the amending or repealing act shall distinctly describe the law to be amended or repealed, as well as the alteration to be made. Peed v. McCrary, 94 Ga. 487, 21 S. E. 232. Repeals by implication are not favored; and it is only in so far as the statute, is clearly repugnant to a former statute, or is manifestly intended to cover the subject-matter of the former, and operate as a substitute for it, that such a repeal will be held to result. Johnson v. Sou. Mutual Building & Loan Ass'n, 97 Ga. 622, 25 S. E. 358. The first of these acts not only wrought a change in the law as to the time and manner of the payment of pensions, but also imposed for the first time upon the counties a charge for the payment of the ordinary's fees for the services rendered in the collection of the pensions. The later act made no reference to the former act, and only purported to change the time and manner of the payment of pensions. Although no reference was made to the act of 1907, it is clear that the act of 1908 is to be construed in connection therewith, and to be given effect only as those matters dealt with in the later act. It did not purport to repeal the provision for the payment of ordinary's fees by the county; and, as that was an important feature in the first act, we cannot say that the Legislature intended to repeal that important provision in the law on the subject of the payment of the ordinary's fees. That which was left in the act of 1907 applied solely to the payment of the ordinary's fees. It could have been made the subject-matter of a complete and independent act. We think, therefore, that the provision with reference to the payment of the fees of the ordinary for services rendered to pensioners was not impliedly repealed by the act of 1908.

[2] May the Legislature constitutionally enact a law imposing upon a county the duty of paying the fees for services rendered by the ordinary to pensioners? The constitutional scheme of taxation contemplates a separation of the taxing power of the state from that of the county. It is declared in article 7, § 1, par. 1, of the Constitution, that "the powers of taxation over the whole state shall be exercised by the general Assembly for the following purposes only": For the support of the state government and the public institutions; for educational purposes; to pay the principal and interest on the public debt; to suppress insurrection, to repel invasion, and to defend the state in time of war; and to supply Confederate soldiers with artificial limbs, and for pensions to Confederate soldiers, and widows of Confederate soldiers. Civil Code 1910, § 6551. By article 7, § 6, par. 2, the General Assembly was prohibited from delegating to any county the right to levy a tax for any purpose, except for educational purposes, to build and repair public buildings and bridges, to maintain and support prisoners, to pay jurors and coroners, for litigation, quarantine, roads, and expenses of courts, to support paupers, and pay existing debts, pay county police, and provide for necessary sanitation. Civil Code 1910, § 6562. The General Assembly has and exercises the power of providing by state taxation for the payment of pensions to Confederate soldiers, and can confer no authority for paying pensions to soldiers and their widows out of the funds to be raised by county taxation. Elder v. Collier, 100 Ga. 342, 28 S. E. 116. The costs and fees incident to the collection of pensions, when added to the bounty appropriated for pensions, partake of the character of the pension. It amounts to an appropriation of an additional sum, whereby the pensioner is relieved of all costs in securing his pension. It is therefore clear that, as the county cannot constitutionally levy a tax to pay the pension, it cannot levy a tax to pay the costs to securing the pension, so that the state's appropriation may be net to the pensioner; and the act of 1907, which makes this a charge upon the county taxes, is unconstitutional and void.

But it is contended that, inasmuch as some of the pensioners are entitled to their bounty by reason of age and poverty, or infirmity and poverty, or blindness and poverty, rendering them unable to provide a living for themselves, it is proper for the General Assembly to classify them as paupers, and provide for the payment of the fees of the ordinary from the pauper funds of the county. The legislative scheme was to treat all pensioners alike, and to make no exception in favor of any class of pensioners; and, even if it be conceded that the Legislature would have the right to make such classification, it has not done so. To recognize such an exception to the legislative enactment would be, not only to give a partial effect to the legislative scheme, but to impute to that body an intention to create an invidious distinction by classifying indigent pensioners as paupers, when no such classification was intended. We therefore are of the opinion that the provision in the act of 1907 that the ordinary's fees in preparing and collecting pensions shall be paid by the county of the pensioner's residence is violative of the Constitution.

Applying these principles to the case in hand, which was an application for mandamus by the ordinary to require the county commissioners to audit his claim for fees in services rendered to indigent pensioners under the act of 1907, the mandamus should have been refused.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

CLARK v. WALTON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. COUNTIES (§ 132*) — LIABILITIES — STATUTORY PROVISIONS — "PAUPERS."

Confederate soldiers, referred to in the expression "indigent pensioners," as used in section 2 of an act approved August 13, 1909 (Acts 1909, p. 173), cannot be classed as "paupers," in the meaning of that term where it is employed in our statutes relating to the county poor.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, pp. 5236-5239.]

2. COUNTIES (§ 132*)—LIABILITIES—PURPOSES OF TAXATION—FEES OF ORDINARY.

Under the decision in the case of Verdery v. Walton, 73 S. E. 390, the provision in section 2 of the act referred to in the first head-note (Laws 1909, p. 173), is unconstitutional, in so far as it provides for the payment of certain fees to the ordinaries of this state out of the pauper funds of their respective counties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

3. DEMURRER SUSTAINED—NO ERROR.

The court erred in not sustaining the demurrer to the petition for mandamus; the demurrer being based upon the alleged unconstitutionality of the section of the act referred to.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Mandamus proceedings by A. R. Walton against W. A. Clark. From a judgment overruling a demurrer to the petition, defendant brings error. Reversed.

Salem Dutcher, for plaintiff in error. H. H. Callaway, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. Walton, ordinary of Richmond county, brought mandamus proceedings against Clark, county treasurer, to compel the auditing and payment, out of the pauper fund of the county, of an itemized bill of the former for his services in preparing all papers and proofs, and preparing the annual pay rolls, and for securing and paying out the pensions paid by the state to indigent pensioners of said county, at $1 per capita, for all pensioners that have heretofore been known as "indigent pensioners." A demurrer filed by the respondent was overruled, and the mandamus was absolute, to which ruling of the court the respondent excepted.

[1, 2] In the case of Verdery v. Walton, 73 S. E. 390, it was said: "May the Legislature constitutionally enact a law imposing upon a county the duty of paying the fees for services rendered by the ordinary to pensioners? The constitutional scheme of taxation contemplates a separation of the taxing power of the state from that of the county. It is declared in article 7, § 1, par. 1, of the Constitution, that 'the powers of taxation over the whole state shall be exercised by the General Assembly for the following purposes only': For the support of the state government and the public institutions; for educational purposes; to pay the principal and interest on the public debt; to suppress insurrection, to repel invasion, and to defend the state in time of war; and to supply Confederate soldiers with artificial limbs, and for pensions to Confederate soldiers and widows of Confederate soldiers. Civil Code 1910; § 6551. By article 7, § 6, par. 2, the General Assembly was prohibited from delegating to any county the right to levy a tax for any purpose, except for educational purposes, to build and repair public buildings and bridges, to maintain and support prisoners, to pay jurors and coroners, for litigation, quarantine, roads, and expenses of courts, to support paupers, and pay existing debts, pay county police, and provide for necessary sanitation. Civil Code 1910, § 6562. The General Assembly has and exercises the power of providing by state taxation for the payment of pensions to Confederate soldiers, and can confer no authority for paying pensions to soldiers and their widows out of the funds to be raised by county taxation. Elder v. Collier, 100 Ga. 342, 28 S. E. 116. The cost and fees incident to the collection of pensions, when added to the bounty appropriated for pensions, partake of the character of the pension. It amounts to an appropriation of an additional sum, whereby the pensioner is relieved of all costs in securing his pension. It is therefore clear that, as the county cannot constitutionally levy a tax to pay the pension, it cannot levy a tax to pay the costs of securing the pension, so that the state's appropriation may be net to the pensioner; and the act of 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 107), which makes this a charge upon the county taxes, is unconstitutional and void. But it is contended that, inasmuch as some of the pensioners are entitled to their bounty by reason of age and poverty, or infirmity and poverty, or blindness and poverty, rendering them unable to provide a living for themselves, it is proper for the General Assembly to classify them as paupers, and provide for the payment of the fees of the ordinary from the pauper funds of the county."

That decision is controlling in the instant case, unless indigent pensioners, as used in section 2 of an act relating to compensation for services to pensioners by ordinaries, approved August 13, 1909 (Acts 1909, p. 173), fall properly within the purview of the provision in the Constitution authorizing the General Assembly to delegate to the county authorities the right to levy a tax "to support paupers." The second section of the act referred to reads as follows: "Sec. 2. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the fees above set out for all those pensioners that have heretofore been known as indigent pensioners, shall be paid out of the pauper fund of the county in which said pensioner may reside, upon a sworn itemized bill made out by the ordinaries and presented to the treasurer or other officer having in charge the paying out of the pauper fund of each county, which treasurer or other officer shall audit said itemized bill, and, if found correct, pay the same and make record thereof as other bills or orders paid by him." Indigent pensioners include those Confederate soldiers who from age and poverty, or infirmity and poverty, or blindness and poverty, are entitled to a pension. In considering whether those pensioners embraced in the expression "indigent pensioners" fall within the purview of the constitutional provision above referred to and the statutes relating to the support of paupers and the levying of a tax for their support by the counties, it is necessary to determine the meaning of the word "pauper," as employed in the Constitution; and in doing this, as the framers of the Constitution did not attempt to limit or define the term "pauper," to gather the meaning of the word as it stood in our laws at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

Under the laws of this state of force at that time, the supervision of all paupers was vested in the ordinary of each county. Civil Code 1910, § 541 (Code 1873, § 754). That officer had authority to make all necessary contracts in relation to the county poor, and had authority to purchase a poorhouse and a farm, upon which he might require all paupers in the county to labor who were not, from old age or disease, unable to work. Civil Code 1910, §§ 542, 543 (Code 1873, §§ 755, 756). It was further provided that "no person should be entitled to the benefits of the provision for the poor who was able to maintain himself or herself by labor, or, if not, had sufficient means" to maintain himself. Civil Code 1910, § 553 (Code 1873, § 763). It was also in contemplation of the law that one desirous of sharing the provision for the county poor should make "application to be provided for as a pauper to the commissioner of the poor or the ordinary, upon which a hearing must be had." Civil Code 1910, § 552 (Code 1873, § 762). Evidently, in these sections, only those persons in any particular county who were completely destitute were included among those designated as paupers. They were the poor who were chargeable to the county in which they had their residence. And we do not think that a Confederate soldier, in order to be classed as an indigent pensioner, and to enjoy the bounty of the state as such, must necessarily be in this extreme condition of destitution, be under the supervision of the ordinary, as provided in the case of paupers, and be required to make application for maintenance as a pauper.

True, it is contemplated in our law that some of the indigent pensioners may be in such a state of destitution as would authorize their classification under the head of paupers. But what we are pointing out is that the mere fact of a Confederate soldier being rightfully on the roll of indigent pensioners would not of itself place him among the county poor entitled to support as a pauper. This is more clearly shown by a consideration of the provisions of another section of the Code relating to paupers who are chargeable to the county, under the provisions of which parent and children are bound to support each other; and if a person had a parent or a child who was able to support him, he was not chargeable to the county; and if the county did maintain him, such county might recover the expense of his maintenance from the parent or the child whose duty it was to support him. Civil Code 1910, § 554 (Code 1873, § 764). In other words, one having a parent or child able to support him is not, under our law now, or as it stood at the adoption of the Constitution, a "pauper." But it could not be contended that a Confederate soldier, who, from age and poverty, or infirmity and poverty, or blindness and poverty, is unable to provide a living for himself, would not be entitled to a place on the roll of indigent pensioners, although he had a parent or child able and willing to support him.

[8] Upon these considerations we must hold that "indigent pensioners" as a class do not come within the purview of our statutes making provision for the maintenance of paupers. And consequently, under the decision in the case of Verdery v. Walton, cited above, the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the petition for mandamus against the treasurer.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 283*)—OFFICERS—DETERMINATION OF TITLE TO OFFICE—JURISDICTION OF EQUITY.

Where an election was held by an authorized lodge or convention of a domestic private corporation for officers of said institution on Sunday, the predecessor in office of the one elected cannot resort to a court of equity in order to assert her rights to the office to which she claims to have been elected and to enjoin the successor in office from holding and receiving the salary attached to the office.

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 283*)—OFFICERS—DETERMINATION OF TITLE TO OFFICE—JURISDICTION OF EQUITY.

Where an adequate remedy is provided by law to test the title to an office claimed by each of two contestants, equity will not entertain jurisdiction of the case, in order to adjudicate the private rights of the parties.

3. INJUNCTION (§ 70*)—SUBJECT OF RELIEF—TITLE TO CORPORATE OFFICE.

Equity will not enjoin de facto officers of a private corporation from discharging the duties of those offices and receiving the salaries thereof, where a clear remedy is provided by law for testing the rights of the parties to hold those offices.

Error from Superior Court, Dougherty County; Frank Park, Judge.

Equitable petition by L. E. McKinney against Charlie McCarthy and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Pope & Bennet, for plaintiffs in error. R. J. Bacon, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. L. E. McKinney filed her equitable petition in Dougherty superior court against Charlie McCarthy and the "Supreme Circle of Benevolence of the United States of America, a corporation of said county," alleging that she was duly elected and qualified secretary of said corporation at the last meeting prior to October, 1909, and had discharged the duties of said office as such to October, 1909, was elected and qualified as treasurer of said Supreme Circle; that plaintiff is still the elected and qualified secretary, by reason of the failure of the Supreme Circle to elect a successor to plaintiff under the rules of said Supreme Circle, which provide that the Supreme Secretary and the other officers named "shall serve one year, or until their successors are elected"; that at the last meeting of the Grand Lodge of said Supreme Circle there was a failure to elect a successor to petitioner, the law of the Supreme Lodge being that the Supreme Circle shall not meet later than 11 o'clock p. m., whereas, it is alleged, one Joseph H. Watson, who was in league with said McCarthy, in order to secure the position held by plaintiff, induced the Grand Lodge to remain in session after 11 o'clock Saturday night, after the greater portion of the delegates to the Grand Lodge had gone home, and charges were preferred against petitioner, which had previously been investigated, and plaintiff was completely exonerated of said charges; that the election so brought about was illegal, because it was after 11 o'clock p. m., and on Sunday, no notice being given of said election; that it was not participated in by plaintiff, but was held by a fraction of the members of the Grand Lodge between 1 and 2 o'clock Sunday morning, and at said election said Charlie McCarthy was elected Supreme Secretary, and plaintiff Supreme Treasurer: that the office of Supreme Treasurer is as responsible as that of Supreme Secretary, but the former pays only $300 per annum, and the latter $720 per annum, and the purpose of the election of the said Charlie McCarthy was to deprive plaintiff of the right to hold said office of Supreme Secretary and draw the salary incident thereto; that plaintiff refused to act as treasurer under said election, because she insists that the elections aforesaid are illegal for the reasons given, and that she is still Supreme Secretary under her former election and tenure of office; that she is ready and willing and has offered her services as Supreme Secretary as aforesaid, and desires to continue in said office until her successor is duly elected and qualified; that said Supreme Circle is a private corporation having for its object benevolence in the way of sick benefits and burial expenses of its members.

Several amendments to said petition were allowed by the court, setting forth the duties of various officers of said Supreme Circle. The prayer of the petition was: (1) That McCarthy be enjoined from acting as Supreme Secretary, and from receiving any salary as such from the Supreme Circle. (2) That petitioner recover judgment of the Supreme Circle and said McCarthy for all salary or salaries heretofore paid by the Supreme Circle to him, "if any shall be shown to have been paid, and for any and all payments that shall or may be made to said McCarthy hereafter for services rendered in the capacity of Supreme Secretary, and of said Supreme Circle for any salary of the Supreme Secretary due or to become due to your petitioner." (3) To have the entire election declared illegal, and "the contracts made by said corporation by the selection and appointment of the officers of Supreme Secretary as aforesaid on said date, and the contract binding said Supreme Circle thereto, surrendered up and canceled as a violation of the laws of Georgia, and fraudulent and void and ultra vires, and the records of said illegal action expunged as unauthorized and illegal."

The defendant filed general demurrers to the petition as amended, which demurrers were overruled by the court, and this judgment is assigned as error.

[1] 1. We think the court erred in overruling the general demurrer in this case. The petition and amendments thereto do not set forth such a cause of action as would bring it within the jurisdiction of a court of equity. The facts are substantially as stated above. The prayers of the petition are: (1) To enjoin the defendant McCarthy from acting as Supreme Secretary and from receiving any salary from "the Supreme Circle." (2) To enjoin the corporation from interfering with the plaintiff in the pursuance of her duties as secretary. (3) That the election of the defendant and all other officers elected at the Grand Lodge at Valdosta, "and the contracts binding the Supreme Circle thereto," be declared illegal and canceled. It appears from the petition that the plaintiff had been the duly elected and qualified secretary of the "Supreme Circle of Benevolence," and acted as such until defendant was elected by those in authority at the Grand Lodge, which convened at Valdosta on October 3, 1909. The plaintiff insists that the election of McCarthy as Supreme Secretary was brought about by fraud and collusion, and occurred on Sunday, contrary to the laws of the Supreme Circle and of the state. She insists that she was elected as Supreme Secretary for one year and until her successor was duly elected and qualified, and that, as no legal election had been held, she was the duly qualified Supreme Secretary, with the right to hold and exercise the duties of said office and receive the salary for same until her successor was legally elected and qualified, but that the defendant under his pretended claim of election was holding the office and receiving the salary, to both of which plaintiff was entitled, etc. The corporation, "the Supreme Circle," was a party defendant to this suit, and, so far as the record discloses, offered no objection to McCarthy holding said office or receiving the salary attached thereto. It must be assumed, therefore, that McCarthy is at least a de facto officer, exercising the duties of the Supreme Secretary with the knowledge and consent of the corporation itself. The plaintiff filed her equitable petition in her individual capacity, to restrain McCarthy from exercising the duties of the office to which she claims to be the rightful occupant, and to prevent the corporation from paying him the salary due the Supreme Secretary rightfully entitled thereto. The suit is not filed by the plaintiff as a stockholder of the corporation for a misappropriation of the funds of the corporation, but as an individual to prevent the corporation from paying McCarthy the salary due the secretary, and to enjoin him from discharging the duties of the office. We think this does not make a proper case for a court of equity.

[2-4] We hold, if the plaintiff had the right, by election or tenure of office, to the position of secretary of the order to which she belonged, and some one else claimed a similar right to this office and the salary, that an ample remedy is provided by law for testing her claim of right to the office. She could proceed by information in the nature of quo warranto, without resorting to a court of equity. The law declares that "equity will not take cognizance of a plain legal right, when an adequate and complete remedy is provided by law," etc. Civil Code 1910, § 4538. In the case of Hussey v. Gallagher, 61 Ga. 90, this court said that "the application to restrain the officers de facto of such a corporation as this is quite rare, and equity, even if there were salaries attached to these offices, will not usually, perhaps never, interfere in such cases, but leave the contesting parties, as far as the election is concerned, to their remedy by an information in the nature of a quo warranto." If the title to the office of secretary is in question (and the pleadings put it in question), then quo warranto proceedings seem ample to determine the issue as to who was legally elected and entitled thereto. And, before the plaintiff could recover in a suit for the salary, she must first establish her right to the office. In such a case injunction cannot be invoked, but equity will leave the parties to settle the legal title to the office by information in the nature of quo warranto. Harris v. Pounds, 64 Ga. 121; 1 Thomp. Corp. (5th Ed.) § 941, and cases cited; 32 Cyc. 1426, 1427.

It was further held that it was not the province of equity to decide the right to an office. And "where an injunction to prevent an officer from acting as such is really to test the validity of his election, it will be refused." 22 Cyc. 878, 879, and citations. Nor is injunction the proper remedy for the removal of an officer, or for restoring one wrongfully removed. Id. It is true that where public officers are acting illegally, or without authority and in breach of trust, and are causing irreparable injury, they will be enjoined. 22 Cyc. 879. But no such allegation appears in the petition of the plaintiff. She simply claims the right to the office of secretary and its emoluments as an individual, which is also claimed by the defendant McCarthy, and she prays a court of equity to enjoin him from exercising the duties of the office, etc. No irreparable damage is alleged, or such other facts as would give a court of equity jurisdiction. Nor is this a suit for damages or for salary alleged to be due. It is nowhere alleged in the plaintiff's petition that the corporation is insolvent, or the damages irreparable, or that the corporation of which she is a member is misappropriating the funds of such corporation, or such other facts set out which would give jurisdiction to a court of equity. Nor is there any definite allegation in the plaintiff's petition that any salary has been paid McCarthy; and, even if there was, we fail to see how a court of equity could be invoked by one who is claiming in her individual right merely as a rival-elect secretary, to enjoin the payment of such salary. It might be otherwise if the funds of the corporation were alleged by some member of the corporation to be misappropriated by some of the officers. Then the plaintiff, if a stockholder, or some other one of the stockholders, as such, could undoubtedly apply to a court of equity for proper relief. Atlanta Real Estate Co. v. Atlanta Nat. Bank, 75 Ga. 40.

In arriving at the conclusion that an application for leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto is the proper remedy by which the rights of the plaintiff in this case to an office in a private corporation can be tested in the courts of law in this state, rather than by proceedings in a court of equity, we are not unmindful of the doubts expressed on this subject by Judge Benning in the case of Cole v. Dyer, 29 Ga. 437, nor of the language of the Code, which was adopted after the decision in 29 Ga. 437, just referred to. It may be that the section of the Code with reference to quo warranto was incorporated to meet the decision in the case of Cole v. Dyer, supra. At any rate, section 5451 of the Civil Code of 1910 provides that "the writ of quo warranto may issue to inquire into the right of any person to any public office, the duties of which he is in fact discharging, but must be granted at the suit of some person either claiming the office or interested therein." See, also, Civil Code 1910, § 5454. It will thus be seen that the section of the Code cited apparently confines the remedy of quo warranto to a person inquiring into the right of another person to any "public" office, etc., and while, as an original proposition, we might or might not have placed the construction on that section of the Code that was placed on it by this court in Hussey v. Gallagher, 61 Ga. 91, and Harris v. Pounds, 64 Ga. 121, yet, as this court in the Harris case, supra, definitely ruled that, "in a contest between two sets of trustees of a campmeeting ground, one holding an appointment under the quarterly conference of the Methodist Church, and the other under a grant from the superior court by virtue of authority claimed to be derived from the act of 1872 (Code, § 1877), and both claiming to hold the title for the use of the Methodist Church of Warren county for the campmeeting worship, and no allegation being made that either has interfered or threatened to interfere with the beneficiaries in the enjoyment of the religious worship at said camp ground, equity will not interfere by injunction, but will leave the parties to settle the legal title by information in the nature of quo warranto," we feel constrained to adhere to the ruling there made, especially as it is in accord with the weight of American authority on this subject.

The decision in 64 Ga. 121, was rendered in 1879, after the section of the Code referred to was adopted as the law of the state; and we must assume that said decision was rendered with the full knowledge of this court of its existence in the Code. And the ruling made in the case of Harris v. Pounds, supra, cites with approval the decision in the case of Hussey v. Gallagher, 61 Ga. 96, where it was held to the same effect that quo warranto was the proper remedy to test the title to a private office. Relying, therefore, upon the definite ruling made by this court in the case of Harris v. Pounds, we must likewise hold that in the present case the plaintiff's remedy is by information in the nature of quo warranto, and not by resort to a court of equity for injunction to restrain defendant from exercising the duties of Supreme Secretary and collecting the salary of same, or to enforce the other prayers in the petition.

In view of the ruling here made, it will not be necessary to decide the other question, whether the election alleged to have been held on Sunday was void, as that question can be determined on proper proceedings in the superior court.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

POTTS v. CITY OF ATLANTA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 14, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 9*)—NATURE AND EXTENT OF POWER—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under the provisions of section 5 of the act approved November 29, 1902 (Acts 1902, p. 333), the city of Atlanta has authority to exercise the right of eminent domain, and to acquire, by condemnation proceedings, lands necessary for the construction of sewers beyond the limits of the city.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

2. INTERLOCUTORY INJUNCTION—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Upon the trial of the case the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in refusing to grant the interlocutory injunction.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by Merry W. Potts against the City of Atlanta. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Walter R. Brown, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Mayson and W. D. Ellis, Jr., for defendant in error.

BECK, J. Mrs. Merry W. Potts filed an equitable petition against the city of Atlanta, seeking to enjoin the city from constructing a sewer through her property on Peachtree road, which is outside the corporate limits of the city, and by amendment she asked that the city be restrained from proceeding by condemnation to appropriate her property for sewer purposes. On the interlocutory hearing the court denied the injunction prayed for by plaintiff, and she excepted.

[1] 1. It has long been recognized that the Legislature has power to authorize a municipal corporation to acquire lands beyond the municipal limits, and for that purpose to exercise the power of eminent domain, where the proposed taking of private property is strictly for public use. What is a public use, so far as respects the exercise of eminent domain by municipalities, has in different cases given rise to controversy; but a controversy over the proposition that the taking of private property by municipalities for the construction of sewers, which have such an important bearing upon the public health, welfare, and comfort, is a public use, could hardly arise. But it is contended in the present case that the Legislature had not conferred upon the city of Atlanta the authority to appropriate private property beyond the corporate limits. Section 5 of the act approved November 29, 1902 (Acts 1902, p. 333), which act is an amendment to the charter of the city of Atlanta, contains the following provision:

"Sec. 5. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the mayor and general council of the city of Atlanta be, and they are, hereby authorized, in their discretion, to lay and construct sewers, of whatever form, fashion and material as in their judgment may be proper, safe and sanitary, without the limits of the city of Atlanta, as well as and to as full an extent as now authorized within the limits of said city; and they are further authorized and empowered, in their discretion, to prepare, construct, and operate plants, means, methods, or whatever system in their discretion is best for the disposal of sewage matter; and said plants or systems or methods may be constructed and operated without the limits of the city of Atlanta as well as within the limits of said city, in the discretion of the mayor and general council. Power and authority is vested in the mayor and general council of said city to condemn lands, leases, and all other interest in real estate, whereby possession and title to land, and as much thereof as may be necessary, may be procured by said city for the construction of sewers, as above provided, as well as plants, means or methods for the disposal of sewage matter, all as provided, without the limits of the city of Atlanta, in whatever direction and to whatever extent it may be deemed necessary and proper within the discretion of said mayor and general council."

Provision more ample and explicit could hardly have been embodied in language for the purpose of clothing the municipality with authority to lay out and construct sewers and appropriate private property beyond the city limits by condemnation. Nor can we agree with council for plaintiff in error in his contention that the power conferred upon the municipality by the section above quoted was limited to the condemnation of lands for the construction of such sewers as might be laid out and constructed by the expenditure of the proceeds arising from the issue of bonds referred to in other sections of the act. Nothing contained in section 5 of the act, or in the entire act, confines the provisions of section 5 within limits so narrow.

[2] 2. The other questions in the case require no discussion. They are merely questions of fact, dependent upon the evidence in the case. Upon the material issues the evidence was conflicting; and, that being true, they were for determination by the court below; and, his holding upon the issues of fact having been adverse to the complainant, it will not be disturbed. He exercised his sound discretion in passing upon these issues, and there is nothing in the facts of the case to show that this discretion was abused.

Error from Superior Court, Appling County; C. B. Conyers, Judge.

Proceedings to probate the will of John A. Blount. From a judgment of nonsuit, L. W. Davis brings error. Affirmed.

In the superior court a suit for the probate of the alleged nuncupative will of John A. Blount was tried on appeal from the court of ordinary. Blount had a brother, who was his sole heir at law, but was not on good terms with him. For more than a year prior to his death, L. W. Davis and his wife had lived in Blount's house and cared for him. Blount desired to bequeath all of his property to L. W. Davis, and was anxious that his will be so prepared as that it could not be set aside. He had inquired whether a written will would be better than a nuncupative will, and had been informed that it would. After such inquiry and information, he sent for Reuben H. Holton, a justice of the peace, on the 8th day of April, 1908, to write his will. The messenger was L. W. Davis, and he was requested, also, to get John Cochran and John O. Cochran, Sr., to come to Blount's residence and attest the will with Holton. The first to arrive was Holton, late in the afternoon. There being no suitable paper at hand, Holton so informed Blount, and entered upon a tablet a description of the land and other memoranda, and then told Blount, as he had no suitable paper on which to write the will, he would go home and write it, and bring it back to be signed the next morning. Blount replied, "All right." Blount was suffering from a protracted illness, but expressed himself as feeling better, and as not believing he would die "from that spell," but would be "able to attend to his business." When Holton came, after telling him that he wanted him to write his will, Blount also called in Mrs. Davis and told her to sit where she could hear him and listen, as he "worded it" for Holton to write, as she was the only witness present, "but he could get in more." According to the testimony of Mrs. Davis, Blount made his will "then and there." Holton was in the act of leaving when the two Cochran's arrived, but they were informed by Holton that the will would be executed next morning, and were requested to return in order to attest it. Blount conferred with them about the will after Holton left, and told them and others that he intended to bequeath all of his property to L. W. Davis; but his announcements were not of such character as to indicate to them a present intention to make a nuncupative will. On the contrary, they showed that he had reference to a will which Holton was to write for him. About 1 o'clock during the same night, Blount died. On the 1st day of September, 1908, Holton prepared the nuncupative will and caused the same to be sworn to by more than three subscribing witnesses, which is the same as was afterwards offered for probate. Upon the conclusion of the evidence the judge granted a nonsuit.

ATKINSON, J. [1] 1. The ruling announced in the first headnote does not require elaboration.

[2, 3] 2. There was no evidence in this case sufficient to authorize a finding that the alleged testator contemplated the making of a nuncupative will. On the contrary, the evidence demanded a finding that, while he had a testamentary inclination, there was no design that any word spoken by him should by themselves operate as a testamentary disposition of his property, but that it was his intention that the will that he desired to make should be a written will. Accordingly, without regard to the sufficiency of the evidence in other respects, there was no error in granting a nonsuit. Civil Code 1895, §

The motion came on for a hearing in its regular order upon the call of the motion docket, and no brief of evidence having been filed, and no satisfactory reason appearing why it had not been done, counsel for movant not being present

3. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES (§ 74*)—COMPENSATION—DEPUTY SHERIFFS.

Action by O. E. Knighton against W. C. Bynum. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. Terry and M. C. Edwards, for plaintiff in error. Geo. H. Perry, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. In his petition the plaintiff alleged that on January 1, 1903, the defendant, having been duly elected sheriff of Randolph county, qualified as such; that on that day the defendant entered into a contract with the plaintiff, wherein the defendant agreed to appoint the plaintiff deputy sheriff of the county for a period of time indefinite, but terminable by mutual consent of the contracting parties, during the term of office of the defendant, and that the plaintiff for services rendered as such deputy sheriff should receive one-half the entire income or revenue received by the defendant as sheriff of the county during the pendency of the contract; that pursuant to this contract the plaintiff qualified as deputy sheriff on January 2, 1903, and continued to serve as such officer under the contract until January, 1908, when by mutual consent the contract was revoked; that during the existence of the contract the sheriff has received from the fine and forfeiture fund of the county certain stated amounts, and has also received certain other revenue and income specifically described, one-half of which under the contract was to be paid to the plaintiff; and judgment is prayed for these amounts, less certain stated credits. The defendant specifically denied the various allegations of the petition, and further pleaded that at certain stated times the plaintiff and the defendant had a full and complete settlement of all matters, claims, and accounts pending between them touching the business of the office of sheriff. The court sustained a special demurrer to the plea of settlement. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, which the court refused to disturb on motion. The defendant excepts.

[1] 1. A plea of settlement is in the nature of a plea of accord and satisfaction, and an allegation that the plaintiff accepted and received matter in full satisfaction is a material one. Either the full terms of the settlement should be alleged, or it should be averred that some property, money, or other matter was accepted as a release, discharge, satisfaction, or extinguishment of the liability sought to be enforced by the action. The allegation of the plea was general that there had been a settlement. The plaintiff was entitled to a more specific statement, and the court properly sustained his special demurrer asking to be more fully informed as to the nature of the settlement.

[2] 2. Over the objection of the defendant the court allowed the plaintiff to testify that the contract between him and the defendant, when he was appointed deputy sheriff, was that the plaintiff was to receive one-half of the proceeds of the sheriff's office from all sources. The objection was that the fees of the deputy sheriff were fixed by law, and not by contract. The only fees specifically provided by law for a deputy sheriff are those fixed for his attendance upon courts and elections in counties having a population of 24,000 or more. Civil Code 1910, §§ 5998, 5999. In other cases the fees for services rendered by him are those provided for his principal. These fees, when earned, belong to his principal. A sheriff may lawfully contract with his deputy that his compensation shall be a part of the income of the office. The sheriff's emoluments are from fees for specific services. An agreement to pay a deputy out of the fees and profits of the office is not opposed to the common-law inhibition of farming out or sale of offices. Our statute (Penal Code 1910, § 285) declaring it to be illegal for any officer to sell or farm out his office is substantially a re-enactment of the old English statute of 5 & 6 Edward VI, c. 16. Under this statute the English courts held that when a principal, on appointing a deputy, takes an agreement for the payment to the principal of a gross sum, which is not to come out of the profits of the office, the contract is void; but where he reserves a part of the fees of the office, which is to come out of the profits, the contract is good, because the whole belongs to him, and he is only reserving a part of his own and giving away the balance to his deputy. Grant v. McLester, 8 Ga. 553; Mott v. Robins, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 21, 37 Am. Dec. 286; Becker v. Ten Eyck, 6 Paige (N. Y.) 68; Addington v. Sexton, 17 Wis. 327, 84 Am. Dec. 745; Godolphin v. Tudor, 2 Salk. 468.

[3] 3. There was no error in receiving a certified copy of the minutes of Randolph superior court, showing the amount of fees received by the sheriff from the fine and forfeiture fund, on the ground that the original order was the best evidence.

[4] 4. The defendant offered to show that under the contract the plaintiff was to pay one-half of the expenses, and was to receive one-half of the net proceeds of the office of sheriff, as compensation for his services. The court excluded this testimony, on the ground that the defendant had no pleadings to warrant its admission. We think the court erred in excluding the testimony. The plaintiff alleged that by the terms of the contract he was to have one-half of the entire income of the office; and as the defendant denied that contract in his plea, it was permissible to show that the contract was not as alleged, but that the plaintiff's compensation according to the contract was to be one-half of the net profits of the office. If the contract was to share the net profits of the office, then it was a part of the plaintiff's case to show what were the net profits, and this could only be done by deducting the expenses from the gross income. It would not be necessary for the defendant to plead that the compensation was payable only from net income, before offering testimony to this effect.

[5] 5. The defendant also offered to show that one of the perquisites of the office was the use of a residence, connected with the jail, provided by the county for the jailer, and that the plaintiff as deputy sheriff occupied such residence, and should account for its reasonable value as a residence in arriving at a proper settlement of their contract. The sheriff is, by virtue of his office, the jailer of the county; and it is competent for him to appoint the deputy sheriff to act as jailer. The residence provided by the county for the occupation of the jailer is no more to be regarded as a part of the sheriff's compensation than the use of the sheriff's office in the courthouse. These accommodations are furnished by the county to enable the sheriff to more efficiently discharge the duties of his office, and are not official perquisites. The evidence was properly rejected.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

1. TRIAL (§ 165*)—NONSUIT—MOTION TO REINSTATE.

2. TRIAL (§ 165*)—NONSUIT—MOTION TO REINSTATE—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by Patience Jenkins against the City of Atlanta. From an order reinstating an action after nonsuit granted, defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. L. Mayson and W. D. Ellis, Jr., for plaintiff in error. Moore & Branch, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. This case came on to be heard in the superior court of Fulton county, on a motion to reinstate the case of Patience Jenkins v. City of Atlanta, wherein a nonsuit had been granted by the presiding judge of said court. When the motion to reinstate was called for trial in the court below, the city of Atlanta, the plaintiff in error here, moved to dismiss the motion on two grounds: (1) That the motion to reinstate did not lie, where a nonsuit had been granted for lack of sufficient evidence. (2) That said motion could not be considered by said court, because no brief of evidence had been prepared, upon which the court could pass, as to whether or not this judgment was right or wrong. The motion to dismiss the motion to reinstate the case was overruled by the court, and an order granted reinstating the case, to which judgment the city of Atlanta excepted.

The motion to reinstate was as follows: "The above-stated case came on for trial on the 8th day of December, 1910, at the regular November term, 1910, of Fulton superior court, before the Honorable W. D. Ellis, judge of said court presiding, and after the evidence for the plaintiff had all been introduced the court granted a nonsuit in the case. Plaintiff insists that the granting of said nonsuit was error, and she comes now, at the term of said court at which said nonsuit was granted, and moves the court to set aside and vacate the nonsuit, and to reinstate the case on the trial calendar."

[1] 1. The first assignment of error is not well taken. In the case of Aiken v. Peck, 72 Ga. 434, this court held: "Where a nonsuit has been granted, the losing party may either bring his case to the Supreme Court by writ of error, or may, during the term of the trial, move to reinstate the case, and from a refusal of that motion, properly made, may bring the case to this court." See, also, Van Dyke v. Van Dyke, 120 Ga. 984, 48 S. E. 380; Buchanan v. James, 134 Ga. 475, 476, 68 S. E. 72.

[2] 2. The second assignment of error raises a question not so easily determined, as it has never been directly passed upon by this court, so far as we have been able to find, and must, therefore, be determined upon principle. There seems to be no statute on the subject, and heretofore the question has been one for the construction of the court. The question is whether a motion made to reinstate a case, where a nonsuit has been granted by the court upon the ground of insufficiency of evidence, should be accompanied by a brief of the evidence, upon which it can be determined whether the judgment of the court allowing or refusing the motion to reinstate was right or wrong. In the case of Wallace v. Cason, 42 Ga. 435, the court held, on a motion to reinstate a case, where the judge had granted a nonsuit upon the ground that he "was not satisfied with the argument of the legal question upon which the nonsuit was awarded," that a brief of the evidence was not necessary. In that case the nonsuit was granted solely on a legal question, and not for failure by the plaintiff to prove his case as laid. The motion to reinstate that case was heard upon the ground that the court erred in granting the nonsuit, because the plaintiff did not show that he had given notice of the killing of his horse, as required by the act of 1854. A brief of the evidence, therefore, was not necessary, and any declaration to that effect was obiter.

The right of the trial court to grant a nonsuit on motion of the defendant for failure of proof was not recognized under strict common-law practice, because the plaintiff was deemed to have the right of trial by jury on issues of fact. 6 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 933. And this rule seems to obtain in many of the states and in the federal courts. Id. But a nonsuit in this state may be granted where, at the close of the plaintiff's case, it appears that the plaintiff has failed to make out a prima facie case, or that, admitting the facts proved and all reasonable deductions therefrom, he ought not to recover. Civil Code 1910, § 5942. Should the movant, seeking to reinstate a case in which a nonsuit has been awarded by the court for insufficiency of evidence, accompany his motion with a brief of the evidence? In the case of City of Atlanta v. Miller, 125 Ga. 495 (2), 54 S. E. 538, Justice Lumpkin said: "Where a motion to reinstate a case is made, after a judgment of nonsuit based on the general insufficiency of the evidence to make out a case, the proper practice is to present a brief of the evidence along with the motion. But if the presiding judge based his judgment upon a single question of law, and enough of the evidence was set out for a clear understanding of such ruling, there was no error in entertaining the motion because it was not accompanied by a complete brief of the evidence. Certainly this will furnish no ground for a reversal, if the point was not made before the trial court."

It is true this question was not distinctly made in the case last cited, but is made here; and it seems to us that, on sound reason, a brief of the evidence should accompany the motion to reinstate. If a nonsuit has been granted by the court for insufficiency of the evidence, and the plaintiff excepts and brings the case to this court by a direct writ of error, without moving to reinstate, he is required to bring up enough evidence to give the court a clear understanding of the case. Civil Code 1910, § 6140, par. 1. And by parity of reasoning it appears as equally necessary that, when a motion to reinstate is made in the court below by the plaintiff, she should file a brief of the evidence offered on the trial, where the judgment of nonsuit was based on the insufficiency of the proof offered by the plaintiff. The motion to reinstate is an appeal to the discretion of the judge. How could that discretion be properly exercised upon the mere recollection of the trial judge as to the evidence offered on the trial of the case? And if the case is brought to this court, how can it rightly be determined whether the judge in the court below has properly exercised his discretion, unless he was presented with a brief of the evidence? Suppose one judge grants the nonsuit, but another judge hears the motion to reinstate, as was the case in 42 Ga. 435, supra, how can the second judge know whether the nonsuit was properly granted or not, unless he has a brief of the evidence upon which the nonsuit was awarded? In the case of Wallace v. Cason, supra, the nonsuit was awarded on a question of law, and not for want of sufficient testimony; and hence a brief of the evidence was not necessary to a correct determination of the question in that case.

If, however, as in this case, the court grants the motion to reinstate, and the other side excepts, can the burden of making the brief of evidence be shifted from the movant to the plaintiff in error? Can the movant appeal to the recollection of the court as to the evidence, instead of a brief of the evidence, to elucidate the question passed upon by the court? We think not. We hold that the motion should be accompanied by a brief of the evidence, as in a motion for a new trial, that the trial court first, and then this court, if appealed to, should have a brief of the evidence by which to determine whether the motion has been properly granted or denied. No brief of the evidence was offered by the movant in the court below, on which the trial judge could exercise his discretion as to whether the motion to reinstate should be granted. The trial judge in the bill of exceptions says: "It is necessary that the evidence be sent up. The statement of it is a conclusion. The evidence was reported by the official stenographer, and he is directed to write it out and file it, and the clerk is directed to send it up as a part of the record." The court appended a note to the evidence sent up by the clerk pursuant to this order as follows: "The city of Atlanta declined to attach a brief of the evidence. The plaintiff claimed not to be able to have it written out. I ordered it to be done, and I approve the foregoing 18 pages as true and correct. They contain the evidence on which the court acted; and to properly determine the case the court decided, and to do justice between the parties, the entire evidence ought to be considered. If I had the power, I would abstract the evidence—make a brief of it; but as no agreement has been made, and as this is the act of the court, I ask that the evidence be considered in its present form."

When the judge signs the bill of exceptions to a final judgment, he exhausts his power in the case. He cannot direct a brief of evidence sent up to this court, where no brief has been filed by the movant, or the plaintiff in error, as the case may be, and where no brief of evidence has been agreed upon by the movant and plaintiff in error before the brief is ordered sent to this court by the trial judge. There being no brief of evidence before the trial court, therefore, when the motion to reinstate was heard and determined, on which he could exercise his discretion in determining such motion, we think the court erred in not sustaining the motion to dismiss the motion to reinstate the case on the ground that movant had filed therewith no brief of the evidence, and the judgment of the court below is reversed. All the Justices concur.

WESTON v. BEVERLY & McCOLLUM.
(No. 3,304.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. GARNISHMENT (§ 1*)—NATURE OF PROCEEDINGS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Garnishment proceedings are purely statutory, and cannot be extended to cases not enumerated in the statute, and courts have no right to enlarge the remedy, or hold under it property not made subject to the process.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Garnishment, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

2. WORDS AND PHRASES—"SUIT."

"Suit" is the following of a person, and is not only not technically, but not even in common parlance, applied to seizures or proceedings in rem.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 6769-6778; vol. 8, p. 7809.]

3. GARNISHMENT (§§ 4, 7*)—NATURE OF PROCEEDINGS—SUIT OR JUDGMENT.

A suit or judgment on which valid garnishment proceedings are based must be a suit or judgment in personam, and not in rem.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Garnishment, Dec. Dig. §§ 4, 7.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

4. GARNISHMENT (§ 4*)—RIGHT TO GARNISHMENT—FORECLOSURE OF LABORER'S LIEN.

The foreclosure of a laborer's lien, in which there is no levy and no issue made by counter affidavit, is in no sense a suit in personam, but is a summary proceeding in rem.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Garnishment, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

Error from Superior Court, Grady County; Frank Park, Judge.

Petition by Frank Weston for certiorari to review a judgment of the justice awarding a fund deposited by a garnishee to Beverly & McCollum. To a judgment dismissing the certiorari, Weston brings error. Affirmed.

J. Q. Smith and L. H. Foster, for plaintiff in error. M. L. Ledford, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. Frank Weston foreclosed a laborer's lien against Lewis Weston and seized under levy certain lumber as the property of defendant. A claim to this lumber was filed by the Dyson Manufacturing Company, whereupon Weston dismissed his levy and sued out process of garnishment, and had summons served upon the Dyson Manufacturing Company. Subsequently Beverly & McCollum obtained a judgment against Lewis Weston in a suit on account, pending when the foreclosure proceedings were instituted, and on this judgment obtained process of garnishment and caused summons to be served on the Dyson Manufacturing Company. The garnishee admitted indebtedness, and paid the money into court for distribution, and the justice awarded it to Beverly & McCollum on their judgment, as against the laborer's lien foreclosure proceedings. Frank Weston petitioned for the writ of certiorari, and on the hearing the certiorari was dismissed by the judge of the superior court, and Weston excepted.

Only one question is raised for decision. Can garnishment proceedings issue on the foreclosure of a laborer's lien? If so, the plaintiff in error was entitled to the money paid into court by the garnishee. If not, the judgment of the justice awarding it to the common-law judgment was correct. Summons of garnishment under the statutes of this state can only issue in three classes of cases: (1) Where there is a suit pending; (2) where a judgment has been rendered by a court having jurisdiction (Civil Code 1910, §§ 5094, 5265); and (3) where a tax collector has issued execution, has it in his hands, and, being unable to find any property of the defendant, makes an entry of nulla bona thereon. Civil Code 1910, § 1154. Process of garnishment issued in any other case or upon any other ground is without authority of law. Davis v. Millen, 111 Ga. 452, 36 S. E. 808.

not enumerated in the statute, and courts cannot enlarge the remedy, and to entitle one to the benefit of the statute, he must show that his case is clearly provided for. The remedy cannot be extended to doubtful cases. Rood, Garnishment, § 13; Davis v. Millen, supra. The second and third cases where garnishment proceedings are provided for by the statutes above quoted are not applicable here.

[2, 4] Is the foreclosure of a laborer's lien a pending suit upon which garnishment process is predicable? We think not. It is in a very loose sense that a proceeding in rem can be called a suit. "Suit is the following of a person, and is not only not technically, but not even in common parlance, applied to seizures or proceedings in rem." The Little Ann, 15 Fed. Cas. 622. The foreclosure of a lien is strictly a proceeding in rem. It pursues the property, and not the person. It does not become in any sense a suit until a counter affidavit is made. Civil Code 1910, § 3366, par. 6; Sams v. Covington Buggy Co. (Ga. App., decided Dec. 19, 1911, 73 S. E. 18).

[3] To authorize a valid garnishment, the judgment or decree upon which it issues must be final, and must be in personam, and not in rem. 20 Cyc. 980, and citations. We conclude that the judgment of the justice in awarding the fund paid into court by the garnishee to the judgment in personam was right, and there was no error.

Judgment affirmed.

HANSFORD v. NATIONAL BANK OF TIFTON et al. (No. 3,338.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 232*)—"NATIONAL BANK"—POWERS.

A "national bank" is a corporation, the powers of which are defined and limited by the acts of Congress authorizing the creation of these institutions.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4661, 4662.]

2. COURTS (§ 97*)—RULES OF DECISION—FORMER DECISIONS AS CONTROLLING.

The decisions of the United States Supreme Court are ultimate and paramount authority as to the powers and liabilities of national banks.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 329-334; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

3. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 261*)—NATIONAL BANKS—ULTRA VIRES ACTS—RATIFICATION.

A national bank cannot authorize or ratify an act absolutely ultra vires, committed by its agents or officers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 991-1000; Dec. Dig. § 261.*]

4. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 262*)—NATIONAL BANK—OFFICERS.

Neither the directors nor other officers or agents of a national bank have authority to institute prosecutions for violations of the public criminal laws of the state, nor to cause requisition papers to be issued for alleged criminals. Such acts are entirely beyond the scope of the powers of a national bank, and liability does not attach against the bank for any attempt on the part of its directors, officers, or agents exercising any such powers on its behalf.

Error from City Court of Tifton; R. Ewe, Judge.

Action by J. D. Hansford against the National Bank of Tifton and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

C. C. Hall and Claude Payton, for plaintiff in error. Fulwood & Murray and Hendricks & Christian, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. Hansford sued the National Bank of Tifton for damages, alleging that the defendant procured one Bailey to swear out a warrant charging the plaintiff with the offense of carrying concealed weapons, to cause requisition papers to be issued thereon, whereupon the plaintiff was arrested and imprisoned in the state of Florida. It is alleged that the bank's officers knowingly and maliciously had this process issued, without probable cause, and for the purpose of extorting from him a sum of money. It is useless to enter upon any discussion of the question as to whether corporations may commit torts. It is well settled that they may. Hence, no doubt, there are some corporations that may commit the torts of false imprisonment and malicious prosecution. This general question is not here involved. The specific question is as to the powers of a national bank and as to its capacity to commit the particular tort alleged in the petition.

[1] National banks are corporations of limited capacity. They have no powers, except such as are given them expressly or by necessary implication by the acts of Congress passed in relation to that subject. Logan County Nat. Bank v. Townsend, 139 U. S. 67; 11 Sup. Ct. 496, 35 L. Ed. 107.

[2] 2. Whenever the power or liability of a national bank is called into question, necessarily a federal question is involved, and consequently the United States Supreme Court is the ultimate and paramount authority on the subject; and all authorities of state courts to the contrary must yield. California Nat. Bank v. Kennedy, 167 U. S. 362, 17 Sup. Ct. 831, 42 L. Ed. 198. These institutions are so far governmental agencies of the United States as that neither state statutes nor decisions can impose any liability inconsistent with the liability intended by the federal statutes as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States. An examination of the decisions of the federal courts on this subject discloses that the federal government is vigilant and jealous to protect the assets of these banks from diversion from those purposes for which these institutions are organized. The safety of these national banks and the keeping of their resources unimpaired from diversion by the acts or omissions even of their own officers and agents is a matter of federal concern.

[3] 3. If an agent or an officer of a national bank, with or without the consent of its board of directors, commits an act which entirely transcends the scope of its powers and objects of existence, the individuals participating in the act are solely responsible for its consequences, and the national bank is not. The board of directors and other officers are likewise impotent to ratify any act ultra vires in its nature, or to make the bank take any benefit therefrom. California Nat. Bank v. Kennedy, supra.

[4] 4. The act of which liability is predicated in the present case was that certain officers or agents of this national bank procured one Bailey to swear out a warrant charging Hansford with carrying concealed weapons, upon which the solicitor of the city court made application to the Governor of this state for a requisition, which was duly honored by the Governor of Florida, who issued a warrant upon which the plaintiff was arrested; it being alleged that the object of all this was illegally to extort a sum of money from the plaintiff. If the allegations be true, this was a great wrong, a wrong for which these officers and agents and all others participating in the illegal project are jointly liable as tort-feasors. But it is an affair so utterly foreign to every purpose for which a national bank is organized as to make it absolutely beyond the powers of the officers or agents of such a bank to impose a liability upon the bank for these acts. Under the ruling in the California Bank Case, supra, which is consistent with a line of authorities similar in their nature, a national bank could do no such act and could not ratify the act of others, even if receiving money which came as a result of it. No matter how far state courts may extend the liability of corporations organized under state laws, or subject solely to state jurisdiction, a determination of powers and liabilities of national banks is not to be extended by any state court, so as to make it responsible for any such transaction as the one at bar. We say this because we recognize that there are a number of state precedents by which ordinary corporations might be held liable in such a case. The court did not err in dismissing the action against the bank on general demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

FORMER DECISION CONTROLLING.

These cases are controlled by the decision this day rendered in Hansford v. National Bank of Tifton, 73 S. E. 405.

Error from City Court of Tifton; R. Eve, Judge.

Actions by W. B. Roberts against the National Bank of Tifton. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

C. C. Hall and Claude Payton, for plaintiff in error. Fulwood & Murray and Hendricks & Christian, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. While in particular facts these cases differ somewhat from the case of Hansford v. National Bank of Tifton, 73 S. E. 405, in general principle they are covered by it. In this case the prosecution was for cheating and swindling; whereas in the Hansford Case it was for carrying concealed weapons. Both of these offenses are simply violations of the penal laws of this state, with the enforcement of which national banks have no concern whatever.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 182*)—SECONDARY EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY OF ORIGINAL.

To render admissible secondary evidence of a mortgage purporting to have been made in another state, it must be shown that the lost original mortgage was executed in conformity with the law of that state. Proof that the signing of a paper in the state of Florida was attested by two witnesses, neither of whom signed officially, is insufficient to prove its legal execution as a mortgage, since the law of Florida requires a mortgage to be attested by an officer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 601-604; Dec. Dig. § 182.*]

2. EXECUTION (§ 150*)—CONTRACTS (§ 127*)—BAILEE—AGREEMENTS AS TO PROPERTY LEVIED ON—PUBLIC POLICY.

A levying officer may, at his own risk, deposit with a bailee, for safe-keeping, personal property which he has subjected to levy; and in thus depositing it he does not relinquish possession, but merely selects an agent to retain possession in his behalf. The possession of this agent is still the possession of the levying officer, and a conversion of the property by the bailee, though it consists of nothing more than his failure to deliver on demand, entitles the officer to proceed by trover. Pepper v. James, 7 Ga. App. 518, 67 S. E. 218. Any agreement of a levying officer, affecting the disposition of property which has been subjected to a levy, is contrary to public policy, and void, if it tends to defeat, or in any wise affects, the legitimate result of the legal proceeding of which the levy forms a part.

Error from City Court of Blakely; D. F. Crosland, Judge.

Action by W. F. Pepper, Constable, against D. W. James. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. R. Pottle and C. L. Glessner, for plaintiff in error. W. A. Thompson, Jno. R. L. Smith, and H. M. Calhoun, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. [1] This is the second time that this case has been before this court. See 7 Ga. App. 518, 67 S. E. 218. None of the points presented at the former hearing are involved in the present writ of error, except the relevancy or admissibility of evidence relating to a mortgage under which the plaintiff claimed a lien. When the case was here before, we held that the evidence with relation to the mortgage was inadmissible, in the absence of proof of the proper execution of the mortgage. In the trial now under review the judge excluded the testimony with reference to the mortgage; and exception is taken to that ruling. The motion to exclude this testimony was as follows: "We move to rule out the evidence in reference to the mortgage of the bank of Blakely, and the mortgage itself, on the ground that it is illegal and irrelevant." Inasmuch as it was not shown that the mortgage, which appears to have been made in the state of Florida, was executed in compliance with the laws of Florida, the court could properly have sustained the motion upon the authority of our former decision upon that point. This, for the reason, as then held, upon the authority of Calhoun v. Calhoun, 81 Ga. 91, 6 S. E. 913, "that, though a paper may have been written and signed by the grantor, it may yet never have been executed according to law."

The copy of the mortgage which appears in the bill of exception is attested by two witnesses, but neither of them purports to be such an officer as is authorized by the law of Florida to attest a mortgage; nor does the witness Waxelbaum, who saw the mortgage signed, testify that he knew either of these witnesses to be such an officer. Perkins, who he says was carried to the place where it was signed for the purpose of witnessing its execution, he had just then met for the first time, and the other witness, Mr. Brown, is shown by uncontradicted testimony to have been at the time the attorney for the mortgagee. Construing the evidence with relation to the execution of the mortgage most favorably to the defendant, the most that was shown was that one who was qualified by law to complete the execution of the mortgage as an attesting officer failed to perform that duty, and only signed his name individually.

[2] The objection to the testimony was also based upon the ground that the testimony in relation to the mortgage, and the evidence of the mortgage itself, were both irrelevant to the issue, and thus, for the first time in the case, is raised the question as to whether it is within the power of an officer, after he has levied a process of the court, to make any binding agreement with reference to the disposition of the property levied upon which would be at variance with his duty. There is some slight difference between the testimony in behalf of the plaintiff and that of the defendant as to the exact terms of the bailment under which the constable turned the property upon which he had levied into the possession of the latter. It is conceded, however, by all parties, that Pepper, as a constable, after having levied an attachment upon the property, consented for James to receive it upon deposit, and that James knew the facts. Unless an officer can make, at his discretion, a disposition of property which he has seized under the mandate of a court, different from or contrary to its usual legal course, it would be contrary to public policy to permit him to defeat the due process of the law by any agreement of his as to the possession of the property by another, no matter of what nature that agreement might be. In other words, unless Pepper, as a constable, was authorized to fix the legal rights and liabilities of Harris, the plaintiff in the attachment which he had levied, by an agreement with James that the latter should hold the property levied upon until the termination of some other litigation, and that Harris would abide its result, it would be utterly irrelevant what agreement he made in that regard, and therefore entirely immaterial, as a matter of law, whether there was conflict between the parties as to the terms of this agreement, which, if contrary to public policy, would necessarily be a nullity. We have no doubt that it was in this view of the case that the trial judge held that all the evidence in relation to the mortgage was irrelevant; and, doubtless holding also, for the same reason, that the testimony as to the terms of the agreement (the agreement being contrary to public policy) was insufficient to present any issue in the pending action of trover, he directed the verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

As we have already stated, this point was not presented when the case was here before, or it would have resulted in a termination of the litigation, for we are satisfied that the decision of the trial court in the case at bar was correct. It would not seem to require a citation of authorities to demonstrate that a levying officer, as such, has no power, by his agreement, to increase or diminish the rights of a litigant in whose behalf the processes of a court have been invoked and are being executed.

When this case was here before, in ruling upon the exception presented by the cross-bill, in which it was insisted that the levy was void for indefiniteness, we held (7 Ga. App. 521, 67 S. E. 220) that, "even if the entry of levy was void, the constable would be liable, and it would not lie in the mouth of his bailee * * * to dispute the title of his bailor, or to assert that by reason of the invalidity of the act by which the bailor came into the possession of the bailment he is released from liability to return the property deposited with him for safe-keeping. The bailee cannot justify his refusal on the ground that the bailment is illegal. Although the bailor may have had no legal authority to make it, and even though it were made for the purpose of fraudulently secreting the goods from the bailor's creditors, yet the bailee is bound to restore at the demand of his bailor, and will not be permitted to set up the illegality of the bailment as an excuse for his own default. So far does this principle obtain that although the title to the goods be in the bailee, and even though he may have received them in ignorance of his own right, having accepted the possession of them in the capacity of bailee, he is estopped from claiming them by title until he has fulfilled the obligations of the trust by returning them to his bailor."

But if authority directly upon the point is needed to establish the statement that it is contrary to public policy for a levying officer to make a bailment which by possibility could defeat the legal result of the processes he is charged to execute, the principle is established in the decisions of many of our courts of last resort that while a levy is of full force and virtue a levying officer cannot make any contract divesting himself of dominion over the property, except under such replevy or forthcoming bond as is prescribed by law. In Burrall v. Acker, 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 606, 35 Am. Dec. 532, the court say that, while it is perfectly legitimate for a levying officer to store property with a recepter or custodian, "any agreement with such person that the property shall be absolutely his upon paying the amount of the execution would be illegal and contrary to the rights of the defendant in execution; and an agreement which would place the property absolutely beyond the reach of the sheriff before a sale thereof at public auction would be equally illegal and contrary to the duty of the sheriff in reference to the plaintiff's rights." "No public officer can bargain away his power to discharge his official duty." Cole v. Parker, 7 Iowa, 167, 71 Am. Dec. 439; Harrington v. Crawford, 136 Mo. 467, 38 S. W. 80, 35 L. R. A. 477, 58 Am. St. Rep. 653; Hodsdon v.

Wilkins, 7 Greenl. (Me.) 113, 20 Am. Dec. 847. "A receptor or custodian in such case is but the servant or agent of the levying officer. He has no property in the chattels. He cannot maintain trover for them in his own name. He cannot set up a title to the property in a third person. He can only defend a trover suit against him on behalf of the officer on the ground that the property has been taken from him by act of law or, possibly, by force. Phillips v. Hall, 8 Wend. (N. Y.) 610, 24 Am. Dec. 113; Denny v. Willard, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 519, 22 Am. Dec. 391; Pettes v. Marsh, 15 Vt. 454, 10 Am. Dec. 689."

WILLIAMS-THOMPSON CO. v. WILLIAMS et al. (No. 3,269.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RELEASE (§ 12*)—LIABILITY ON NOTE—CONSIDERATION.

For the payee of a promissory note to release one of the makers, there must be a contract to that effect founded on consideration, except, of course, in certain cases, where release flows by operation of law from conduct of the payee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Release, Cent. Dig. §§ 18-20; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

2. RELEASE (§ 12*)—CONSIDERATION.

Where the payee of a joint promissory note executes and delivers to one of the makers a writing purporting to release him from all liability thereon, the writing is ineffectual for that purpose, if it is voluntarily given without legal benefit to the maker of the release or detriment to the person in whose favor it is made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Release, Cent. Dig. §§ 18-20; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

3. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 116*)—RELEASE OF SURETY—EFFECT ON COSURETIES.

"The release or compounding with one surety discharges a cosurety;" but an attempt to release one of the sureties does not have this effect, where the attempted release is unenforceable for lack of consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. §§ 269-282; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

4. COMPROMISE AND SETTLEMENT (§ 2*)—NATURE—"COMPOUND."

"To compound" is to compromise or make a composition whereby a creditor discharges his debtor on payment of a smaller sum than that actually owing. There was no compounding with the surety in the present case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Compromise and Settlement, Cent. Dig. §§ 1-4; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, p. 1372.]

5. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 437*)—PAYMENT BY ONE JOINT MAKER—DISCHARGE OF JOINT MAKERS.

Even if the rule were that the payee of a joint note would discharge all the joint makers thereof, by giving to one of them the money wherewith to pay off his ratable part of the debt, no such effect ensues where the money is given by a third person.

Error from City Court of La Grange; Frank Harwell, Judge.

Action by the Williams-Thompson Company against W. L. Williams and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson, E. R. Bradfield, Jr., and W. S. Dillon, for plaintiff in error. F. M. Longley and M. U. Mooty, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. W. L. Williams was indebted to the Williams-Thompson Company, a corporation. On January 25, 1909, in settlement of this debt he gave to the corporation a negotiable joint promissory note, signed by himself as principal and by six others (the present defendants, Williams himself not being found or served), who signed apparently as joint makers, but in fact as sureties. On the next day after the note was signed, and after the original transaction was closed, one of the sureties, named Harris, came to the officer of the corporation who had taken the note and stated that he wished to "come off" the note. This officer of the corporation, being for some reason willing to accommodate Harris, gave him a written instrument "releasing W. H. Harris from all responsibility by reason of his endorsement" of the note in question. Harris gave nothing for this release, and the corporation received nothing for executing it. Later the officer told Harris that he had no power to bind the corporation by his act, but that he would nevertheless protect him, and gave him $100 of his (the officer's) own money with which he might discharge his share of the liability, but Harris returned this money to him. The six sureties, being sued on the note, pleaded that Harris had been released and that, as the others were joint sureties with him, they were also released. Some point is made as to the authority of the particular officer to bind the corporation; but we need not go into that question, as there is another point that controls the case.

[1] 1. The release of a party to an executed contract is itself a contract, and, to be binding, must be founded on consideration. Bruton v. Wooten, 15 Ga. 570; Stamper v. Hayes, 25 Ga. 546; Molyneux v. Collier, 30 Ga. 731; Fowler v. Coker, 107 Ga. 817, 33 S. E. 661.

[2] 2. This release was without consideration. The consideration of a contract usually must consist of some benefit to the person to be bound, or of some detriment to the other party. Under this contract of release, all the benefit accrued to the taker of the instrument, and none to the maker; all the detriment accrued to the maker, and none to the taker. Hence it was without consideration. Clark, Contracts, 106. At common law a release under seal conclusively purported a consideration; but this is not now true, as respects the American states generally (Williston-Wald's Pollock on Contracts, 813), or as respects Georgia in particular (Lacey v. Hutchinson, 5 Ga. App. 865, 64 S. E. 105; Bruton v. Wooten, supra). The record does not show whether the release relied on in this case was under seal or not; but, in the light of the authorities just cited, this makes no material difference, as lack of consideration was affirmatively shown by the proof.

[3] 3. "The release or compounding with one surety discharges a cosurety." Civil Code, 1910, § 3542. If the so-called release had been valid, Harris would have been released, and so would his cosureties; but, since the release is invalid for lack of consideration, neither he nor his cosureties are released. Fowler v. Coker, supra.

[4] 4. There is nothing in the evidence on which to base the suggestion of counsel for the defendants in error that there was a release of the other sureties through the plaintiff's compounding with Harris. "To compound," according to Black's Law Dictionary, "is to compromise, to effect a composition, to obtain discharge from a debt by the payment of a smaller sum." Harris paid nothing; hence the transaction was not a compounding.

[5] 5. The $100 which the plaintiff's officer afterwards paid to Harris out of his (the officer's) own money certainly did not affect the case. Even if the giving of this money had been the company's own act, it is doubtful that it would have operated as a release of the other sureties; for when Harris had paid in this sum, though he would thereby have paid his ratable part, if all the sureties proved solvent, he would not have discharged his liability as a joint maker of the note. No legal harm would have been done his cosureties. But certainly the individual act of one of the officers of the corporation in giving his money to Harris did not affect the liability of any of the parties.

The hardship of the case is that the principal on this joint note proved unworthy of the confidence imposed on him by his friends who stood his security. The law is very technical in favor of sureties, and justly so. However, we find no legal reason on which the judgment of our able brother of the trial bench can be sustained, though we have examined the questions with great care; for our knowledge of his fairness and ability as a judge makes us canvass our conclusions carefully, lest we be wrong, when we find ourselves disagreeing with him.

Judgment reversed.

Error from City Court of Douglas; W. C. Lankford, Judge.

Action by the Mizell Live Stock Company against A. J. Banks. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Rogers & Heath, for plaintiff in error. O'Steen & Wallace, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. 1. This was a suit on a note given for the purchase price of a horse. The suit commenced by attachment and levy upon the horse. The defendant admitted the execution of the note, and that the plaintiff was the holder thereof. The defense relied upon was fraud by the plaintiff, which entitled the defendant to have the sale rescinded. The specific fraud set up by the plea was that the agent of the plaintiff who sold the horse to the defendant represented at the time that the horse was 8 years old; that the defendant was ignorant of horses, and did not know how to determine their age by inspection or examination; that when he purchased the horse from the plaintiff's agent he relied absolutely on the agent's statement as to the age of the horse, bought it, paid $50 cash, and gave to the plaintiff the note sued on; that 2 or 3 days thereafter he discovered that the horse was from 15 to 16 years of age, the discovery being made by information given to him by a person who had previously owned the horse; that upon this discovery the defendant went at once to the plaintiff, stated to him that his representation as to the horse's age was untrue, demanded a rescission of the sale on account of the fraud perpetrated upon him, tendered the horse back, and demanded the return of his $50. Pending the litigation, the horse was sold under a short order, and was bought by the plaintiff for the sum of $185. The defendant amended his plea, and asked for a judgment against the plaintiff, not only for the $50, but also for the $185 for which the horse had been sold, claiming title to the horse. The jury found a verdict for the defendant for $25, and the plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

[1, 2] Two controlling questions are made. The others are immaterial. A demurrer was filed to the plea, which was overruled, and exceptions pendente lite were preserved, on the ground that it set up no defense, but attempted to vary, alter, and contradict the terms of a written contract. The purchase-money note contained the following express warranty: "This note is for the purchase price of one sorrel mare, about eight years old; name, Hattie; weight, about 1,425 pounds. The above-described property is sold without any guaranty as to its kind or quality, and is purchased by the maker of this obligation with the understanding that no warranty shall be implied as against the seller." It is insisted that this note excluded the parol warranty that the horse was eight years old at the time it was sold. Even if this contention was true, the plea set up fraud, and demanded a rescission of the contract for the fraud. It is only in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake that a written contract, which appears to be a complete and certain agreement between the parties, will be conclusively presumed to contain all the terms and conditions of the contract, which cannot be varied or contradicted by prior or contemporaneous verbal representations or statements. Bullard v. Brewer, 118 Ga. 918, 45 S. E. 711; Fleming v. Satterfield, 4 Ga. App. 351, 61 S. E. 518. There is quite a difference between an attempt to contradict the terms of a contract by parol testimony under a defense that the contract had been breached, and an effort to have the contract rescinded because of fraud in its procurement. Pryor v. Ludden & Bates, 134 Ga. 288, 67 S. E. 654.

In this case, however, the written contract itself contained the express warranty that "the horse was about eight years old." The whole warranty should be construed together, and if there is an apparent contradiction between this express warranty as to age, and the latter part of the warranty, which would seem to exclude any warranty as to kind or quality of the horse, and thus render the warranty as a whole ambiguous, it should be so construed as to reconcile all the parts thereof and permit the whole of the warranty to stand; and, if this is impossible, it should be construed most strongly against the party who prepared it and in whose favor it was made. Construing all the parts of the warranty together, it means that, except as to the fact that the mare was about eight years old, every other express warranty as to its kind or quality was excluded, as well as all implied warranties as to the soundness of the horse, etc. Certainly we cannot exclude from this warranty the distinct statement that the horse was "about eight years old." This is a material statement; the age of the horse being an important factor as to its value. The plea, therefore, can also be construed to be an attack upon the truth of this express warranty. For both of these reasons, we think the judge very properly overruled the demurrer to the plea. The defense set up was a good one, both on the ground that it claimed a rescission of the sale because of the fraud on the part of the plaintiff specifically described, and on the ground that it alleged a specific breach of a material express warranty made in the written contract. The ruling on this point not only goes to the demurrer, but included several of the grounds in the motion for a new trial.

2. The next point relied upon by the plaintiff in error was that the defendant, at the time he purchased the horse and before he signed the note sued upon, not only had full opportunity to examine the horse, but in fact did examine her, and discovered the defect that he set up in his plea; it being contended that the age of the horse was a patent defect, discoverable by inspection, and that he was distinctly told by friends, who at his request examined the horse, that the representation as to her age was not true, but that, on the contrary, the horse was 12 or 14 years old, and that notwithstanding these facts, and with full knowledge of the falsity of the representation as to the age of the horse, the defendant nevertheless accepted the horse, made a payment of $50 thereon, and gave the note sued on for the balance of the purchase money, and this conduct of his amounted to a waiver, although the warranty as to age may have been express. It is contended that, where an express warranty is set out, the purchaser is not bound to examine the property, or to exercise any diligence to discover defects, but that if he does in fact examine the property, and discover defects before he accepts the property, and then goes ahead, makes no objection thereto, accepts it, and signs a contract, this amounts to a waiver of the defects, and he is bound by the contract; and this would be true, whether the effort was to rescind the contract for the fraud in the representation, or for damages for the breach of the express warranty. Equitable Manufacturing Co. v. Biggers, 121 Ga. 381, 49 S. E. 271; Miller v. Roberts, 9 Ga. App. 511, 71 S. E. 927. The defendant endeavored to avoid the effect of any information that he had as to the age of the horse by evidence that, while it is true he was told by the vendor that the horse was 8 years old, and was also told by a friend, who had examined the horse before the purchase, that she was from 12 to 14 years old, yet, when he told the plaintiff of this fact, he replied that it was not true, and insisted that the horse was 8 years old, and that he would guarantee such to be her age. We are inclined to think that it was a question for the jury to determine whether the defendant had the right to accept this positive statement and guaranty made by the plaintiff and rely upon it, rather than rely upon the statement made to him by his friend, especially in view of the fact that the owner of the horse, as the evidence shows, was an experienced dealer in horses.

[3] While we have discussed these questions of law made under the evidence, we are impressed with the fact that, regardless of them, in the absence of any material error of law, the verdict, which in effect declared a rescission of the sale because of this fraud, was substantially just and fair to both parties. The undisputed evidence shows that the plaintiff sold the horse to the defendant for $265, $50 cash and the balance in the note sued upon. Plaintiff levied his attachment upon the horse for the purchase money, and had it sold under a short order of sale, and bought it in for $185. This would make $235 that he got for the horse, or $30 less than the amount that the plaintiff had agreed to pay. Even if we concede that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for this $30, resolving every issue in his favor and standing upon the strict letter of the law, yet when the evidence shows that the horse was in fact at least 14 years old, and not 8, we think the plaintiff got full value for his property. The jury, in allowing the defendant $25 by way of recoupment, were probably moved to do so by the practical, common-sense view of what was right between the parties, and by the additional fact that the defendant should pay for the use of the horse for the time he had used it, and therefore only gave him back half of the cash which he had paid at the time of the sale. The verdict is manifestly substantially right and just, the trial judge approved it, and this court feels that no sufficient reason is shown why another trial should be granted. When substantial justice is reached in any case, litigation should end.

Judgment affirmed.

1. SALES (§ 347*)—ACTION FOR PRICE—DEFENSE—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

"Where machinery is brought for a particular purpose, and after its reception it proves, upon trial, not to be adapted to the purpose, but the purchaser nevertheless retains it, an action for the price cannot be defeated upon a plea of total failure of consideration, unless the evidence shows that the machinery was wholly valueless for any purpose." Hardee v. Carter, 94 Ga. 482, 19 S. E. 715.

2. SALES (§ 359*)—ACTION FOR PRICE—EVIDENCE OF FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

A plea of total failure of consideration to a note given for the purchase price of a "sausage mill, # 40 coffee mill," is not supported, unless the evidence shows that the mill was entirely worthless as a sausage mill or coffee mill; and especially is this true where the written contract fails to disclose at the time of the purchase that the mill was intended to be used solely as a sausage mill, and not as a coffee mill, and the evidence also fails to show in what particulars the mill was defective, either as a sausage mill or coffee mill, and it does appear that it was worth as a coffee mill, the amount of the purchase price, for which the note was given and on which the suit was brought.

3. SALES (§ 355*)—ACTIONS FOR PRICE—ISSUES AND PROOF—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

To support a plea of total failure of consideration to a suit on a promissory note given for the purchase price of machinery, the defendant must establish by evidence that the machinery purchased by him was entirely worthless for any purpose; and, there being no such plea, the jury would not be authorized to find a verdict for a partial failure of consideration, in the absence of any data from which a reduction could be made from the contract price, although a plea of total failure of consideration includes a plea of partial failure of consideration. Grier v. Enterprise Stone Co., 126 Ga. 17, 54 S. E. 806; Clegg-Ray Co. v. Indiana Sale & Truck Co., 125 Ga. 558, 54 S. E. 538.

Error from City Court of Tifton; R. Eve, Judge.

Action by the Stimpson Specialty Company against C. L. Parker. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The Stimpson Specialty Company brought suit against C. L. Parker on a promissory note given by him for the purchase price of a "sausage mill, #40 coffee mill." The defendant filed a plea of total failure of consideration. The contract for the purchase of the machine was in writing. It described the machinery as a "sausage mill, #40 coffee mill." The purchase price was $175—$25 cash, and the balance evidenced by a promissory note. The contract reserved title until payment of the note, and provided that the note was to be paid in installments on designated dates. The contract nowhere discloses whether the mill was to be used exclusively as a sausage mill or coffee mill, or whether it was intended to be used for both purposes. In support of the plea of total failure of consideration the defendant assumed the burden, and admitted the making of the contract and the giving of the note. In support of his defense he testified that he bought the machine to be used solely as a sausage mill; that he did not expect to use it as a coffee mill, and had not bought it for that purpose; that he endeavored to use it as a sausage mill, but was unable to do so, for when it was put in operation the "gear gave way," and he was unable to run it; that he had never run a machine of this kind before, and that it was not suited for the purpose intended; that about two weeks after the machine had been received he showed it to the agent who had sold it to him, and this agent agreed to write "to his house about it." He did not use the machine for the purpose of grinding coffee. It is not known whether it would have done that work or not. If the machine had been sold as a coffee mill for $175, it was probably worth that amount. When the machine was delivered, it had no attachments for grinding coffee, although it was actually made for the purpose of grinding coffee, and the sausage attachments were subsequently put on. Another witness for the defendant testified that he was present when the machine was first received, and that he and the defendant put it up, but had never been able to use it for grinding meat; that the rawhide gear was not sufficient to run the mill; that it was worn completely out and mashed together. There is no evidence that any specific complaint was made to the principal as to the defects in the machine, and no evidence that the defendant, on discovering the defects, or that he was unable to operate it as a sausage mill, made any tender back to the plaintiff, or offered to rescind, but that he kept the machine in his possession from the time it was received until suit was filed, which was about seven months, during which time the only complaint that he made was that he "showed it to Mr. Blanton, the agent of the plaintiff," who had sold it to him. The judge, who tried the case without the intervention of a jury, found a verdict in favor of the defendant.

Error from City Court of Floyd County; J. H. Reece, Judge.

Action by M. A. Cooper against the P. P. Most Nursery Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

M. B. Eubanks, for plaintiff in error. Geo. A. H. Harris & Sons, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Mrs. M. A. Cooper sued out an attachment against P. P. Most Nursery Company, alleging the nonresidence of the defendant as the ground of attachment. This attachment was served by the issuance and service of summons of garnishment on garnishee, residing in Floyd county, on June 7, 1910. Upon the plaintiff's filing her declaration in attachment, the defendant demurred, seeking to interpose the bar of the statute of limitations. The court sustained the demurrer, and dismissed the plaintiff's action, and thereupon the plaintiff sued out the present writ of error.

According to the allegations of the declaration, P. P. Most Nursery Company, whose name imports a corporation, is not a resident of the state of Georgia, and it is not alleged that the defendant, at any time, was ever a corporation of this state. If the defendant ever was a nonresident corporation, it must be presumed to have continued to be such, because it could only become a corporation of the state of Georgia by obtaining a charter here. The lower court allowed an amendment to the petition, setting up that at the time the cause of action accrued this nonresident corporation had as an agent residing in Floyd county one Maples, and it was sought by the amendment to relieve the bar of the statute of limitations by allegations to the effect that Maples represented that P. P. Most Nursery Company was a Georgia corporation, which was false, and the statement was made with the intent to defraud, and by the further allegation that, after the plaintiff's right of action accrued, she made every endeavor to locate Maples and the defendant, but failed to do so.

[1,2] The only question in the case is whether the amendments to the plaintiff's petition are such as would relieve from the bar of the statute of limitations a cause of action apparently almost six years old, in which the plaintiff sought to recover damages resulting from misrepresentation and deliberate breach of a contract to furnish certain specified varieties of peach trees for plaintiff's orchard. Under the allegations of the original petition the action is plainly barred, for it is alleged that the plaintiff ascertained in 1904 that she had not been furnished with the varieties of trees she had bought, and as far back as 1904 she knew she had been deceived by the agent of this nonresident corporation, and yet she took no step to recover her damages until 1910. The plaintiff attempts, by amendment, to relieve the defect in the action by allegations to the effect that she had made every effort to ascertain the residence of the defendant, but had failed, and allegations to the effect that Maples, up to the time that she discovered the fraud that had been practiced upon her, resided in Floyd county, and that Maples, at the time she purchased the fruit trees, told her that the P. P. Most Nursery Company was a Georgia corporation. It is the plaintiff's misfortune if she could not find out the defendant's whereabouts in six years, but the result of the delay cannot be affected by any of the circumstances alleged in the amendment to the plaintiff's petition. The law presumes that four years is a sufficient lapse of time for a plaintiff to ascertain all the necessary facts upon which to predicate a suit, and mere inability to do this, which is not directly chargeable to the opposite party, is ineffectual to prevent the bar of the statute of limitations. Fraud on the part of the opposite party, where it is apparent that such fraud prevented the earlier assertion of one's rights, might relieve from the bar; but according to the allegations in the present petition all the fraudulent acts and sayings of Maples, the agent of the defendant, occurred before 1904, and in 1904, when the peach trees began to bear, and the fraud, if any, was discovered, the plaintiff knew just as much of Maples' fraud, and just as much of the whereabouts of the defendant, as she did in 1910, at the end of a six-year search for Maples and for the residence of the P. P. Most Nursery Company.

The allegations of the petition, as a whole, do not tend now to distinctly negative the inference that the P. P. Most Nursery Company may be doing business in Georgia, and that they may have now, and may have had for six years preceding the suit, agents in Georgia upon whom service could have been perfected; but, as we have previously remarked, the mere fact that the plaintiff was unable for six years, after the discovery of the fraud which had been perpetrated upon her, to ascertain the whereabouts of the defendant, affords no exception to the general rule which bars a cause of action which, like the present, is required to have been prosecuted in four years. The plaintiff could not amend her declaration, so as to strike the allegation that P. P. Most Nursery Company resides out of the state of Georgia, without destroying the only ground upon which the attachment rested, and the fact that Maples had moved from Georgia to Texas, or that she was unable to locate the defendant, or any of its officers or agents, or to find any property belonging to the defendant which might be seized by attachment, presents no legal reason for relieving the action from the bar of the statute of limitations. According to the allegations of her own petition, the plaintiff discovered the breach of the contract on July 15, 1904, and had the attachment served on June 7, 1910. The demurrer was properly sustained. The fact that Maples, the defendant's agent, told the plaintiff that his principal, the P. P. Most Nursery Company, resided in Georgia, is of no consequence.

The allegation which might have relieved the bar of the statute must have been that P. P. Most Nursery Company, as a matter of fact, did reside in Georgia, and yet, if the Nursery Company merely resided at some time in the past in Georgia, being a Georgia corporation, the removal of the corporation to another state would not of itself change its legal residence. In order to become a resident of another state, a corporation must be chartered in that state, or at least its principal office must, by its charter, be declared to be in that state, and as a corporation can have no legal residence, except as determined by its charter, the incorporation of a domestic corporation in another state would create it a corporation of that state as a new corporation, entirely apart from the fact that there may have been a previous incorporation in some other state, thus rendering the previous residence of the parties, who might be incorporators or stockholders in the corporation, whether in this state or in some other, totally immaterial. The plaintiff could not have made an allegation upon this subject which would have been of any value, because the residence of a corporation is fixed by its charter, and the absence or nonresidence of a debtor, who never resided here, is no reply to the statute of limitations. 9 Enc. Dig. Ga. Rep. p. 36; Edwards v. Ross, 58 Ga. 147. Judgment affirmed.

Ordinarily only persons standing in the relation of creditors at the time of the transfer can attack a transfer of property on the ground that it was made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. If subsequent creditors desire to attack the transfer on that ground, they must show that at the time they extended credit they had no notice of the transfer, and that they were by some fraud, actual or constructive, induced to extend credit on faith of the ownership of the property. *First Nat. The time of the creation of the plaintiff's debt does not appear. If it came into existence after the time of the sale, the judgment in the plaintiff's favor must be reversed, because the charge of the court in certain particulars complained of was contrary to the principle stated in the first headnote above. If it was pre-existing at the time of the sale, then the court should not have given the following instruction: "If you should find that T. M. Parsons [the defendant in fi. fa.] ever owned the personal property levied on, and if you find that he afterwards sold it, but he remained in possession of the property, and the plaintiff in fi. fa. had no actual notice of the sale, but relied upon Parsons' possession, then you would be authorized, if you find these facts to exist, you would be authorized to find the property subject."

[2] It is to be noticed that this instruction omits all reference to the element of fraud, or intention to hinder or delay the creditor, in the absence of which the sale might be valid as against the pre-existing creditor, notwithstanding the vendor retained the physical possession or custody of the property.

(No. 3,548.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

SALES (§ 428*)—GUARANTY—CONSTRUCTION.

In a note given for the purchase money of two mules, the following guaranty was inserted: "It is expressly understood that after said delivery the said Coleman & Flanders do not warrant the health, soundness, or life of said mules, but only the title thereto, and in case of death thereof, or loss in any way, I agree to sustain the loss and to pay said note." In a suit on this note a plea alleging in effect that at the time of the sale, and when the mules were delivered, they were afflicted with an incurable disease, the character of which was not known to the defendant, but was known to plaintiff, and from which disease the mules in question died in a few days after the sale, set forth a good defense, and was not in conflict with the well-established rule that parol testimony cannot be received to vary the terms of a written contract. Pryor v. Ludden & Bates, 134 Ga. 288, 67 S. E. 654. The above guaranty protected the guarantor from any unsoundness or disease and death which might arise or occur after the sale was made and after delivery of the mules to the purchaser. It is not broad enough to protect the guarantor from any latent disease or unsoundness which existed prior to and at the time of the sale, and which was known to the seller and unknown to the purchaser.

CITIZENS' BANK OF FITZGERALD v. BENTON. (No. 3,449.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§§ 9, 61)—EMPLOYMENT OF EXPERT—DISCRETION—CONSIDERATION OF CONTRACT.

If an agent is employed in order to obtain the benefit of his expert knowledge or skill in any particular business or profession, he may be clothed with discretion as to the time, quantity, and nature of service to be rendered by himself, and in such case he is liable alone for the proper exercise of this discretion for the benefit of his principal. Where one agrees to exercise his skill as an expert in determining whether anything should be done, and, if so, what, or to decide that nothing is necessary to be done, as the case may be, this agreement is a sufficient consideration to support a contract obligating the opposite party to pay for such services, and the contract may be just as valid as if the duties to be performed were minutely specified.

3. DEMURRER.

There was no error in overruling the demurrer.

Error from City Court of Fitzgerald; E. Wall, Judge.

Action by L. O. Benton against the Citizens' Bank of Fitzgerald. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

L. Kennedy, for plaintiff in error. O. H. Elkins, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The Citizens' Bank of Fitzgerald, on March 31, 1906, by a resolution of its stockholders, appointed L. O. Benton as financial agent of the bank for a term of five years, expiring March 31, 1911. In the resolution it was stipulated that Benton was to be paid $500 a year for his services as financial agent. Benton's duties were prescribed as follows: "His duties as said agent shall be to examine and check the books, papers, and business of the bank at such times as he may see proper, either personally or by agent, to make financial connections and secure correspondents for said bank, and in general to do and perform all acts that he may deem necessary or expedient for the successful operation of said bank." Something over two years later the Citizens' Bank of Fitzgerald went into liquidation, its business being taken over by another bank, and on April 3, 1911 (the period for which the contract was made having expired), Benton brought suit for $1,500, for the three years salary which he had not received.

To this suit the defendant filed a demurrer, in which it is insisted generally that the petition does not set forth any cause of action, and also that the alleged contract upon which the suit was predicated was unilateral, and void for want of mutuality and for lack of consideration. The demurrer also raised the point that it was not alleged that the plaintiff ever performed any service after March 31, 1908, or offered to perform any service. The court overruled the demurrer, and the present writ of error is brought to test the correctness of that judgment.

The only point worthy of serious consideration, raised by the demurrer, is the inquiry as to whether the contract is so lacking in mutuality as to avoid it. In the argument of counsel for the plaintiff in error it is stressed that "mutuality of contract means that an obligation must rest on each party to do something in consideration of the act or promise of the other; that is, neither party is bound unless both are bound." And the rulings in Cooley v. Moss, 123 Ga. 710, 51 S. E. 625, Glessner v. Longley, 125 Ga. 676, 54 S. E. 753, Oliver v. Reeder, 7 Ga. App. 276, 66 S. E. 955, and other authorities setting forth the same principle, are cited. That this principle is well settled cannot be controverted. However, the real question in this case is whether the mere fact that the character and quantity of service to be rendered by Benton was discretionary with him raises such an implication, that no services whatever would be performed, as would deprive the contract of mutuality and render the agreement void.

[1] To our minds the fact that the agent's duty was defined to be that "of examining and checking the books, papers, and business of the bank at such times as he might see proper, and to do and perform other acts [or not do and perform them] as he might deem necessary and expedient for the successful operation of the bank," does not necessarily relieve him from the necessity of performing duties which the law would assume to be of value. Though the occasions when service was to be rendered and the nature of such service were left discretionary with the agent, it is not to be implied from that circumstance that the contract was nudum pactum. The fact that he was clothed with a discretion involved the duty of exercising that discretion for his principal's best interest. It is rather to be inferred that the bank relied upon the skill and expertness and financial connections of the plaintiff to determine what was necessary to be done. And if at a particular time it was not necessary that anything should be done, then, at the option of the agent, a policy of inaction was to be pursued as most profitable. The agreement under consideration is not unlike a contract for the employment of a physician or attorney at law to do whatever may be deemed necessary for the patient or client, as the case might be, during a specified time. In such a case there is, of course, a reservation that, if it should be best that nothing should be done for the patient or client (as the case might be), the very determination of that fact would be such an element of value as would supply consideration to the contract. If I employed a physician by the year, it would not be essential to his compliance with the contract that he should compel me to take medicine when it was not necessary; but it would be his express duty to direct me to abstain from medical treatment if, in his professional judgment, medicine was unnecessary.

So much as to that portion of the contract which appears to leave the time and manner of performance of Benton's duty, as financial agent, discretionary with himself. However, the court properly overruled the demurrer in any event, for the reason that one duty was unequivocally assumed by the plaintiff (though, considering the contract as a whole, even its positive statement would have been qualified by an element of discretion lodged in the financial agent). That duty was the making of financial connections and securing correspondents for the bank. And this phrase, not being qualified with any such expression as "when he may see proper," or "as he may deem expedient," would have prevented the contract from being unilateral.

We do not place our ruling, however, on this portion of the contract alone, because, while it is in the power of the defendant to show any neglect of Benton's duty, due to a failure to exercise his discretion properly, where he was charged with discretion, nevertheless it is undoubtedly true that where one agrees to exercise his skill as an expert in determining whether anything should be done, and, if so, what, or to decide that nothing is necessary to be done, as the case may be, the contract is just as valid as if the duties to be performed are minutely specified. The courts have recognized the validity of contracts by which one agrees to exercise his inventive ability for another, and yet the inventor cannot agree to produce any definite results. Emerson v. Pacific Coast Packing Co., 96 Minn. 1, 104 N. W. 573, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 448, 113 Am. St. Rep. 603; Connelly Mfg. Co. v. Wattles, 49 N. J. Eq. 92, 23 Atl. 123. See, also, American Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) vol. 20, p. 49; 26 Cyc. 1021.

[2] 2. In any contest over the performance or nonperformance of such a contract, of course, the legal maxim, "Id certum est quod certum reddi potest," would control.

So far as the objection, urged by the demurrer, that Benton did not tender to perform any service after March 31, 1908, is concerned, it is stated in the petition that the bank, without Benton's consent or approval, went out of business before that time, and, the bank itself having rendered performance on Benton's part impossible, the tender of an impossibility would have been nugatory, and is not required. There was no error in overruling the demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

NATIONAL DUCK MILLS et al. v. CATLIN & CO. (No. 3,223.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1178*) — DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—REVERSAL.

Where both general and special demurrers are filed to an answer, and the trial judge dismisses it on general demurrer, the reviewing court, in the event that it finds that the answer sets up any valid defense, though imperfectly pleaded, will reverse the judgment, with direction that the trial judge shall hear the special demurrers and cause the answer to be made more certain.

2. ACCORD AND SATISFACTION (§ 2*) — CONTRACTS DISCHARGEABLE — SEVERABLE CONTRACT.

Though the parties may have made what appears to be an entire contract, resting on mutual obligations, still if the contract is of such a nature as to give rise to separate and distinct demands, or to create a number of separate obligations and cross-obligations, and a number of distinct breaches as to these separate obligations occur, the parties may make an accord and satisfaction, or what in law amounts to an accord and satisfaction as to one or more of these demands, without affecting the others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Accord and Satisfaction, Cent. Dig. §§ 14-21; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

3. SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM (§ 21*) — ACTIONS—PLEADING—GENERAL DEMURRER.

Where the defendant in a suit upon a promissory note pleads that the note was given for advances which the plaintiff was to make to him under the terms of a contract, and that by reason of the plaintiff's refusal to continue to make advances in accordance with the terms of the contract the defendant has suffered damage, the amount of which he seeks to set off or recoup against the plaintiff's demands, the plea is properly stricken on general demurrer, where it also appears from it that all the items of damage which the defendant claims on this account were in existence and were known to him at the time he executed the note (in renewal of a previous existing note representing the same debt) and obtained an extension of time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Set-Off and Counterclaim, Cent. Dig. § 25; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

4. PLEADING (§ 142*).

A plea setting up as a cross-action that the plaintiff, being purchasing agent for the defendant, bought for him under contract a quantity of goods which contained concealed imperfections, which caused the defendant loss and damage, is properly stricken on general demurrer, where no act of infidelity or negligence on the plaintiff's part (that is, no breach of the contract of agency) is alleged.

5. PLEADING (§ 205*)—DEMURRER.

The pleas in the present case, so far as they set up neglect and breach of duty on the plaintiffs' part as sales agents of the defendants were subject to a number of special demurrers, on account of indefiniteness of allegation, but were not subject to be stricken on general demurrer.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Catlin & Co. against the National Duck Mills, a corporation, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part, with directions.

Catlin & Co. sued the National Duck Mills, a corporation, as maker, and certain others as indorsers, upon a promissory note for $12,000, dated October 14, 1909, due six months after date. The defendants admitted the execution of the note, but set up, for defense, that on August 12, 1907, the defendant corporation entered into a contract with the plaintiffs, by which it employed them as exclusive sales agents for the product of its mills, as well as purchasing agent to buy yarns for use therein; that by the terms of the contract of agency the plaintiffs were to sell the entire output of the mills, and to give, in this particular, faithful and competent service, for a commission of 5 per cent. to include all their expenses, and were also, from time to time, to make advances of money to the defendant, charging interest therefor at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum; that this contract was extended and renewed in January, 1908, so as to expire on January 1, 1909, and was again renewed for the year 1909, and that on June 2, 1909, it was broken and repudiated by the plaintiffs; that on faith of the contract the defendant had begun operation of its mills and was engaged in manufacturing duck, etc., had purchased the necessary yarns, and was carrying on its business generally, expecting the plaintiffs to carry out their contract; that in the course of the relations between these parties the defendant became indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $15,000 for advances, for which it had executed a promissory note, and that the note for $12,000, sued on, was given on October 14, 1910, in renewal of the balance due for advances; that by reason of the fact that on June 2, 1909, the plaintiffs renounced the contract and refused to advance any further money, the defendant had been damaged in the sum of $35,000. The plea set forth with more or less detail a number of different ways in which damage ensued by reason of the plaintiffs' failure to furnish the necessary money to carry on the business, all of which damage had ensued before the date when the note sued on was given. It was also pleaded that the plaintiffs, as agents for the Duck Mills, purchased for the mills a quantity of yarn containing certain imperfections known as "slip knots," which caused the product manufactured from it to be rejected by the purchasers, to the defendants loss in the sum of $1,800; also that the plaintiffs, as sales agents for the mills, negligently instructed the mills to make up goods for orders which in one case was not promptly forwarded, and in the other case not forwarded at all, so that in both cases, by a drop in the market, which came before the goods so ordered made up could be disposed of, the mills lost certain amounts of money, which are set forth. Certain other transactions, which need not be enumerated, are set forth, and damages are alleged.

For the purpose of a better understanding of the following opinion, it may be stated that the defenses are of three classes: (1) Pleas setting up damages because of the plaintiffs' failure to make advances; (2) a plea setting up damages because of the imperfections in a lot of yarn purchased for the mills by the plaintiffs as purchasing agents; (3) pleas setting up damages because of negligence on the plaintiffs' part in their conduct as sales agents of the mills. The major portion of the damages is asserted under the pleas setting up damages for failure to continue the advances. The plaintiffs filed both general and special demurrers to these pleas. The court did not pass upon the special demurrers, but passed an order sustaining the general demurrer to the entire defense, probably upon the ground insisted upon by counsel for the plaintiffs in error in this court, that the giving of the note sued on, after all these classes of defenses set up in the answer had arisen, prevented their being pleaded in set-off or recoupment, or otherwise, against the note.

Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson, for plaintiffs in error. Shepard Bryan and W. R. Tichenor, for defendants in error.

PARK, J. [1] The trial judge must be sustained, if at all, upon the theory that the defenses set up were not good as against a general demurrer. He did not pass on any special demurrers, and the reviewing court is not even informed as to the nature of the special demurrers interposed. It has no jurisdiction to attempt to review a judgment not rendered by the trial court; so, if the general demurrer was improperly sustained, the case should be remanded to the trial court, with direction that the trial court do hereafter pass upon the special demurrers, whatever they may be. Any other course would be eminently unfair to the defendants; for, upon announcement by the trial judge that one or more of the special demurrers would be sustained, the defendants would have opportunity as a matter of right, to amend. A reviewing court cannot properly undertake to cut off this statutory right of amendment, by erroneously undertaking to sustain a judgment sustaining a general demurrer, upon the theory that the defendants' pleas might properly have been stricken upon timely and meritorious special demurrers. The defendants' pleadings were unquestionably open to special demurrer, on various grounds, but the reviewing court cannot arbitrarily assume that the proper objections were raised by the special demurrers actually filed.

[2] 2. As this court is about to hold that certain of the pleas were properly stricken on general demurrer and that certain were not, it is well enough for us to point out in the beginning why the defendants would be estopped by their conduct in giving the note from setting up some of these defenses, and is not estopped from setting up others. The plaintiffs say that the contract sued on was entire, and not several, and that whenever accord and satisfaction, or what in law amounts to accord and satisfaction, took place as to the matter covered by the notes, which represented a part of the contract, the whole matter was settled and ended. In the first place, it should be noticed that the plaintiffs do not sue upon the contract, but merely sue upon the note, which the demurrer to the plea admits to have represented the defendants' liability under only one phase of the contract—that is, the defendants' liability for advances to the plaintiffs. By a close examination of the case of Armour v. Ross, 110 Ga. 403, 35 S. E. 787, it will be seen that the Supreme Court has recognized and held that there may be separable demands under a single entire contract, and that where, under such a contract, there is more than one distinct demand, an accord and satisfaction as to one of them will not conclude the rights of the parties as to the other demands. In that case, as in this, there was a single contract, but a number of obligations; the parties made an accord and satisfaction as to one of them, and, though receipt in full was given, it was held that this did not settle the cause of action arising for a breach of another obligation, although the breach had been consummated at the time the first settlement took place. The contract now before us involved, from the defendants' standpoint, three demands against the plaintiffs: (1) As to the plaintiffs' duty to advance money; (2) as to the plaintiffs' duty as sales agent; (3) as to the plaintiffs' duty as purchasing agent. The note sued on referred to that phase of the contract which relates to the advancing of money, and not to the other two. Under the Armour Case, supra, the rights of the parties under these separate obligations may be treated as if each obligation constituted a distinct contract.

[3] 3. The contract set up in the answer is, certainly as to the obligation to make advances, an entire and not a severable contract, embracing mutual covenants. Broxton v. Nelson, 103 Ga. 330, 30 S. E. 38, 68 Am. St. Rep. 97; Spalding v. Chamberlain, 130 Ga. 654, 61 S. E. 533. And all the items of damages claimed by the defendants in paragraphs 10 and 11 of the answer grew out of breaches committed from time to time by the plaintiffs of their covenants under this very contract. It follows that these items of damages are not separable from the liability for money advanced to the defendants under the terms of the contract—both claims having arisen out of the transaction had under the same feature of the contract. The defendants' defense as to these items is one of recoupment, and not set-off. So, had they been sued on the notes falling due in October, 1909, they would have been compelled to urge their claims for these damages in defense to the suit, or have been forever barred from insisting thereon. Unlike a plea of set-off, which it is the privilege, but not the bounden duty, of a defendant to interpose to a suit based on an independent transaction, the defense of recoupment will not survive a recovery upon a cross-obligation urged by a plaintiff under the same transaction. By analogy to this estoppel by judgment (imposed upon a defendant who fails to file a timely plea of recoupment) is the rule of estoppel by silence, applied in cases cited by the defendants in error, where one party to a contract, when the day has come on which the other party can call him to a settlement, fails to set up any counterclaim under the contract, and (in order to get an extension of time of payment) makes an unqualified and unconditional promise to pay such other party the full amount of his claim. In each instance (in court or out of court) one party calls on the other for a settlement, and the latter should in good faith urge then, if at all, any counterclaim which he may have, arising out of the subject-matter of settlement. Certainly he should not be allowed to mislead the other by making an unconditional promise in recognition of a liquidated liability, which he then secretly intends to repudiate at a later date, when he is called on to perform that promise.

There is a rule of law to the effect that one party to a contract does not, by recognizing and performing all of his obligations under the contract, waive, renounce, or injuriously affect his right to exact like compliance on the part of the other party, and recover damages for a breach committed by such other party, prior or subsequent in point of time; so it would seem that the defendants might have paid off in full the notes due in October, 1909, without jeopardizing their right to bring suit against the plaintiffs subsequently and recover the damages for breaches of the contract set forth in their present pleadings. But the defendants did not pay under and in compliance with their obligations of the contract alleged. On the contrary, instead of complying with their obligation under that contract to repay the money advanced when it became due, these defendants induced the plaintiffs to agree to a renewal of that contract, and to give them six months' additional time within which to pay the renewal note, without fail, when it should fall due. It is unthinkable that the plaintiffs would have consented to this novation, had the defendants in good faith put the plaintiffs on notice that they denied owing the plaintiffs one cent, that they had a counterclaim of far more than the plaintiffs' claim of $12,000 for money advanced under the same contract, and that, when the renewal note fell due, they would refuse its payment, force the plaintiffs to sue on the note, and then set up this defense.

At the time this renewal note was given, the defendants had full knowledge of these defenses now urged for the first time. So they are not in a position to set up any equitable prayer for relief, based on fraud, accident, or mistake, or upon excusable ignorance, at the time they gave their renewal note, or to set up any counterclaim they had against the plaintiffs as to this feature of the contract. The plaintiffs repudiated the contract on June 2, 1909, which gave the defendants the right to treat the contract as at an end, and immediately to set up all their claims for damages up to that time sustained. Smith v. Ga. Loan Co., 113 Ga. 975, 39 S. E. 410. The defendants could have elected to treat the contract as still subsisting, provided they held themselves in readiness to fully perform all of their covenants under the contract, including the payment of their outstanding notes for money advances made by the plaintiffs as these notes fell due. Smith v. Ga. Loan Co., supra. But (perhaps from necessity, as indicated by the pleas) the defendants did not elect to treat the contract as still of force, but closed down the manufacturing business and sold out the stock on hand to whosoever would buy. The defendants did more than this: They induced the plaintiffs to grant indulgence, upon the faith of their promise to pay the renewal note at maturity. Six months gives exceptional opportunity, by way of disposal of assets, etc., in which to better prepare to spring a defense concealed under cover of silence until the other party to the contract has changed his position so that he cannot sooner bring suit.

The defendants do not by their pleadings bring themselves within the decision in McLendon v. Wilson, 52 Ga. 41, to the effect that when, on the day of reckoning, one party gives to the other his note, with the distinct understanding and agreement that it is accepted, not in final settlement of mutual accounts, but subject to counterclaims against the payee which the maker expressly reserves the right to set up in the future, no waiver on the part of the maker can be implied, and no estoppel by conduct can be urged against him when he is sued on the note. This exception to the general rule certainly affords full opportunity to overcome by proper pleadings and competent proof the presumption of the law of waiver of counterclaims silently withheld and undisclosed on the day of settlement. We may further add that the general rule of estoppel by silent acquiescence, invoked by the defendants in error, has been of long standing, and has received repeated recognition by the highest courts of this state. Ignorance of this rule of law may occasionally lead one into error. But ignorance of law is, in and of itself alone, no sufficient excuse. Besides, one, to be injured, would ordinarily have to be likewise ignorant of the common dictates of honesty and fair dealing between men, which would of necessity deter the upright man from misleading the other party by an apparent acknowledgment of the righteousness of his claim, by promising to pay it at a future date, without any intimation of subsequent intention to repudiate his promise by setting up a counterclaim amounting to a practical denial of any indebtedness whatsoever. On the other hand, a relaxation of this general rule, based on good morals, would open wide the doors to fraud, concealment, and duplicitous conduct, calculated to deceive and mislead the other party, to his delay and injury in the prosecution of his legal rights, whatever they might be. So that the court did not err in sustaining the general demurrer to those portions of the defense which set up damages arising out of the breach of the obligation to make advances.

[4] 4. Paragraphs 12 and 16 of the answer are the ones that set up that the plaintiffs, as purchasing agents, bought for the Duck Mills a lot of yarn containing "slip knots." It is not alleged that the plaintiffs were in any wise negligent in their conduct as agents in this respect. Primarily the defendants' cause of action for the imperfections in the yarns furnished would be against the person from whom the plaintiffs purchased the yarn. The plaintiffs were not the opposite party to this contract of sale, nor to the express or implied warranties contained in the contract of sale. The only ground of liability against them would be that they were guilty of some breach of duty as purchasing agents; and no such neglect of duty is alleged. Therefore the court did not err in sustaining general demurrer to these paragraphs of the answer.

[5] 5. Paragraphs 18, 14, and 15 set up a breach of the plaintiffs' duty as sales agents, and allege an improper performance of services on their part, with consequent damage.

It is true that in a number of respects these paragraphs of the plea might be subject to special demurrer; but, as against a general demurrer, they set up a cause of action, or, as pleaded in the present case, a cause of defense. As the damages set up in these paragraphs do not relate to that obligation of the contract to which the plaintiffs' demand relates (that is, the demand for repayment of money supplied by them under their obligation to make advances), they were not included in the settlement represented by the giving of the note, and, under the doctrine in the Armour Case, supra, the defendants' right to insist upon them was not foreclosed by the giving of the note. Hence the court erred in striking these defenses on general demurrer.

The judgment is affirmed, so far as it relates to the defenses set up in paragraphs 10, 11, 12, and 16 of the answer. The judgment is reversed, so far as it relates to the defenses set up in paragraphs 13, 14, and 15 of the answer, but with the direction that the court shall still proceed to hear such special demurrers as may be filed to these paragraphs, or to the general portions of the answer upon which these paragraphs are dependent.

Judgment affirmed in part, and reversed in part, with direction.

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by the General Baptist Convention of Georgia against Cornelius Grant. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

C. H. Hall, Jr., L. D. Moore, and B. J. Fowler, for plaintiff in error. Lane & Park and R. D. Feagin, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. An action of bail trover was brought in the city court of Macon; the value of the property being alleged as $75. The plaintiff elected to take a verdict for damages, instead of a verdict for the specific property, and the jury, finding in the plaintiff's favor, gave $1 damages, whereupon the court entered up judgment for the plaintiff and against the defendant for the costs, amounting to about $40. The defendant filed a motion in the city court to vacate the judgment, so far as the feature of costs was concerned, and to retax them; the insistence being that they should have been taxed against the plaintiff, instead of against the defendant. The defendant's written motion was based specifically on two grounds: (1) That the action is a personal action for damages, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for less than $10; (2) that the plaintiff, by his election at the trial to take damages in lieu of the specific property, converted the action into a personal action. The defendant's insistence in the trial court was plainly based on the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 5984, which provides: "In actions of assault and battery, and in all other personal actions, wherein the jury upon the trial thereof shall find the damages to be less than ten dollars, the plaintiff shall recover no more costs than damages, unless the judge, at the trial thereof, shall find and certify on the record that an aggravated assault and battery was proved." The judge overruled the motion, and to this judgment the present writ of error was sued out.

Before the case was reached for argument in this court, the plaintiff in error doubtless realized that the section of the Code on which he relied did not apply to an action of trover, for the only point insisted upon here is one that is entirely new, so far as the record is concerned, namely, that under the act creating the city court of Macon (Acts 1884-85, p. 470, § 2) it is provided that, in all suits brought in that court in amounts of $100 or less, the plaintiff shall receive only justice's court costs. This court cannot consider the point thus raised. The trial court has passed on no such point. The decision we are reviewing involved the consideration of no such question. Counsel for the plaintiff in error very ingeniously argue that the greater includes the less, and that, since they sought by motion in the trial court to relieve themselves of all the costs, they ought now to be allowed to diminish their claim, and to relieve themselves of any portion thereof illegally taxed against them. Ingenious as this argument is, it is not well taken. In the lower court they planted their right to have these costs diminished on two specific grounds. The trial court acted upon these grounds, and this court cannot now allow this motion to be amended by the insertion of a new ground.

The original grounds not having been well taken, the judgment is affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 66)—JUSTIFICATION—ABUSIVE LANGUAGE.

In a prosecution for assault and battery, the accused cannot give in evidence as a justification opprobrious or abusive language written and published of him by the person upon whom he made the assault and battery. The question was concluded by the decisions of the Supreme Court in Mitchell v. State, 41 Ga. 527, and Berry v. State, 105 Ga. 683, 31 S. E. 592. In the present case this question was certified by request of counsel for plaintiff in error to the Supreme Court, in order that the decisions in the above-cited cases might be reviewed and overruled. The Supreme Court reaffirmed these decisions. Haygood v. State, 137 Ga. —, 73 S. E. 81, decided December 12, 1911.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 575, 598*)—TERMS FOR TRIAL—WAIVER OF OBJECTION.

The act of the General Assembly creating the city court of Fitzgerald (Acts 1907, p. 157) was amended by the act approved August 12, 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 175), as follows: "That the court shall hold twelve terms per year, on the fourth Monday in each month, the terms convening on the fourth Monday in August, November, February, and May to be known as quarterly terms. The jurisdiction of the court shall be the same at all terms, monthly and quarterly. * * * And criminal cases in which jury trial is not waived by defendant, shall be triable only at a quarterly term. For the purpose of disposing of the criminal business of said court, the same shall always be open without regard to terms." The plaintiff in error requested in writing the judge of the court to hold a monthly term, and at the term so held appeared in court, made a demand for a jury trial, was tried by a jury, and convicted. Held: First, the court had jurisdiction of the case at the monthly term; second, the accused, under the facts stated, waived his statutory right to be tried at the quarterly term, and consented to be tried at the monthly term. He cannot be heard, after conviction, to question the jurisdiction of the court.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 99*)—JURISDICTION—CONSENT OF PARTIES.

The court, having jurisdiction of criminal cases at both quarterly and monthly terms, was authorized, by the consent of the accused, to try his case at the monthly term, and the facts of the present case distinguish it from those decisions of the Supreme Court which hold, in effect, that, where a court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, jurisdiction cannot be conferred by consent. The express terms of the statute give the court in the present instance jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the term of the trial could be properly waived. Dean v. State, 43 Ga. 218; Osgood v. State, 63 Ga. 791; Wiggins v. Tyson, 112 Ga. 744, 38 S. E. 86; Smith v. Ferrario, 105 Ga. 51, 31 S. E. 38; State v. Sallade, 111 Ga. 700, 36 S. E. 922.

The court erred in granting a nonsuit, for the reason that it was, to say the least of it, issuable as to whether the plaintiff in error paid the note for the principal debtor, or whether he bought it and held it as a bona fide purchaser. The phrase "take up the note" does not any more strongly imply that the debt evidenced by the note in question is to be finally discharged than that the person "taking up" a note will assume the place of the original payee or holder, with the privilege in that event of being subrogated to all pre-existent rights of the former holder.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1005*)—QUESTIONS OF FACT—VERDICT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The issue as to whether the county was negligent in its maintenance of the bridge in question, as well as the inquiry as to whether it is contributory negligence on the part of the owner of a colt 3½ months old to permit so immature a specimen of the equine genus to accompany the maternal mare in public places, both present questions as to the existence and degree of negligence which are peculiarly for the determination of a jury. Consequently a verdict awarding damages to the owner of such a colt for injuries inflicted upon it by reason of its falling through a hole in a public bridge, which is supported by evidence and which has been approved by the trial judge, will not be set aside as being contrary to law.

Error from Superior Court, Greene County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Action by M. F. Walker against Greene County. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Noel P. Park, for plaintiff in error. J. G. Faust, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Walker brought a suit against Greene county for damages alleged to have been sustained by him as the owner of a colt, which it was alleged was injured by getting caught in a hole in one of the public bridges of the county. Upon the trial the evidence was undisputed that the value of the colt had been diminished by reason of the casualty, and that there was a hole in the public bridge, which had existed for such a length of time as to authorize the jury to infer that the proper county authorities had knowledge of its existence. It developed that the plaintiff was driving a mare, and that the colt, which was injured, was accompanying its mother. The defendant county pleaded that, if the colt was injured as alleged in the petition, the injury was caused by the negligence of the plaintiff, and therefore the defendant was not liable in any sum, and that, if the plaintiff had used ordinary care and diligence, the injury could have been avoided. Under the first ground of the defense, it is contended that even if knowledge of the defect in the bridge can, under the evidence, be presumed as against the county authorities, still there was proof that vehicles could cross with safety, for the reason that the hole was towards the edge of the bridge, and was not large enough for a grown horse to get its foot through, and for this reason it is contended that the bridge was in a satisfactory condition for all ordinary purposes. The decision of this court in Stamps v. Newton County, 8 Ga. App. 230 (5), 68 S. E. 947, is cited as authority to sustain the contention that the use of the bridge by the colt gave rise to an extraordinary occasion.

As to the second ground of defense, it is insisted that the owner of the colt knew that the hole was in the bridge, and that the defendant should not be held liable, because in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence the owner should either have left the colt at home, and not permitted it upon the public highway, or he should have made a special effort to see to the colt's safety while it was crossing the bridge. Without making any comparison between the case at bar and the Stamps Case, supra, it is enough for us to say that whether the presence of a colt upon a public bridge gave rise to such an extraordinary occasion as cannot be foreseen by the county authorities, and as may relieve the county from liability for damages, is a question purely for determination by a jury. It is possible that there might be instances in which the circumstances of the accident might authorize the jury to conclude that the occasion was extraordinary. The presence of a colt which had strayed away from home, and which appeared upon a bridge containing such a hole, unaccompanied by its mother, or even if accompanied by its mother, if the mare was running at large, might afford such an instance; but at last it would be a question for the jury, as in the Stamps Case (and not for the court), after a consideration of all of the surrounding circumstances. No court can arbitrarily say that under no circumstances can the owner of a colt be recompensed for injuries due and traceable to defects in a public highway, because of the fact that the colt was of no service upon the public highway, or because the presence of the colt created extraordinary occasion.

Likewise the question as to whether the owner of a colt, in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, should, in any particular instance, keep the colt at home, and not permit it to follow its mother, as is frequently the custom, is one also peculiarly of fact, and to be determined by the jury. All of the circumstances illustrating the alleged negligence of the county in this case, as well as the contributory negligence, if any, of the owner, were fully submitted for the consideration of the jury, and jurors are so much better qualified than judges to say when and where and under what circumstances a young colt can safely accompany its mother, that we are not prepared to say that there was any error in the verdict in the present case.

It is not contended that any error of law was committed by the trial judge. The only error assigned is the refusal of the motion for new trial based upon the general grounds, and, as we doubt not that the ruling of the trial judge was based upon the same considerations as those which affect us, the judgment must be affirmed.

Action by Pennington & Evans against the Douglas, Augusta & Gulf Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Wm. H. Barrett and Quincey & McDonald, for plaintiff in error. Atkinson & Born and Hendricks & Christian, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. This case came to this court at the October term, 1907, upon a writ of error, and the decision will be found in 3 Ga. App. 665, 60 S. E. 485. Afterwards the case came again on bill and cross-bill of exceptions, and the adjudication of this court thereon will be found in 6 Ga. App. 854, 65 S. E. 1084. In the writ presented by Douglas, Augusta & Gulf Railway Company v. Pennington & Evans, the judgment of the court below was reversed, because we held the action should have been dismissed for lack of service. The cross-bill was dismissed because of the dismissal of the main bill. In the latter judgment, upon motion of counsel, this court directed that, since the trial court was without jurisdiction on account of lack of service to deal with the case in any way, the order of the lower court, sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the action, should for the same reason be vacated. There is nothing in the ruling upon the cross-bill in conflict with the ruling upon the main bill. In ruling upon the main bill, we ruled that the lower court should have dismissed the action because of lack of service, and, of course, if the action should have been dismissed for lack of service, any ruling on demurrer in advance of service of the petition was nugatory and void. The sole purpose of giving the direction which was entered was to allow the plaintiffs, if they desired, to recommence their suit, "without prejudice to the parties as to the questions of law involved," and these words were so used in the formal judgment of the court.

After the remittitur of this court were returned and made the judgment of the lower court, the court ordered service to be perfected by publication, and thereafter passed other orders to that end; one extending the time in which publication might be completed, and another declaring that service had been perfected by publication. The effect of our decisions was to give the plaintiffs, if we could, an opportunity of commencing a new suit which would not be prejudiced by any prior ruling upon any of its features; but so far as the judgments of this court themselves are concerned it is very evident that they resulted in putting the case then pending entirely out of court and finally disposing of it. For this reason the court erred in holding that service had been legally perfected. No case was pending in which service could be perfected. The judgment of the city court of Douglas itself, making the judgment upon the remittitur the judgment of that court, had ordered the action dismissed.

Judgment reversed.

SALES (§ 178*)—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT—WAIVER OF DAMAGES — ACCEPTANCE OF GOODS.

A. bought from B. goods according to samples exhibited. When the goods were subsequently delivered, A. on inspection notified B. that the goods were not according to contract, and were rejected, and were held subject to B.'s order for reshipment or other disposition. B. declined to retake the goods, insisting that they were in accordance with the warranty. A., therefore, placed the goods in his storehouse, and, B. continuing his refusal to retake them, the goods being of a perishable character and liable to deteriorate in value by being kept on hand, A. sold them in the market. Held: (1) A.'s conduct did not amount to an acceptance of the goods, or a waiver of his right to recover damages for breach of the contract. (2) It was A.'s duty to use due care in preserving the rejected goods after B.'s refusal to retake them, and also to minimize the eventual damages.

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by the Dannenberg Company against Salant & Salant. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

The Dannenberg Company sued Salant & Salant, alleging that the defendants sold the plaintiff 100 dozen shirts at $3 per dozen, to be shipped from New York to Macon, and to correspond with a sample dozen shirts left with plaintiff when the contract was made; that subsequently the contract was mutually rescinded, except as to 78 dozen shirts; that when the 78 dozen shirts were received by the plaintiff it refused to accept them, because they were inferior and wholly unlike the samples; that immediately upon discerning this fact shirts like the samples were demanded of the defendants, and they refused to ship any others; that thereafter they were notified that the plaintiff refused to accept the shirts because of their inferior quality and failure to come up to samples, and that they were held subject to their order and without insurance; that the market value of the shirts, according to the sample dozen, was $4.50, instead of $3, per dozen, and the suit was for the difference in the market price and contract price. The answer admitted a sale of 100 dozen shirt and the subsequent mutual rescission, except as to the 78 dozen. It was denied that the sale was by samples, or that the 78 dozen delivered were inferior, or that there was any breach of warranty. The answer also averred that the defendants had sued the plaintiff in New York for the purchase price of the 78 dozen shirts, that the suit was pending, and that the defense thereto was based upon the same allegations as made in the plaintiffs' declaration here.

The evidence was in conflict on the issues made by the pleadings, and therefore the finding of the judge, who by consent acted without a jury, must be considered as conclusive on these issues. The evidence further showed that the shirts were shipped from New York on March 8th, and received in Macon on March 20th. On March 24th the plaintiff wrote to the defendants, complaining of the condition and quality of the shirts, that they were not up to the samples, and that they were held subject to defendants' order, without insurance. On March 29th the defendants wrote to the plaintiff: "We will have to ask you to keep the goods shipped to you, as they are certainly what was sold to you." On April 1st, plaintiff wrote to the defendants, again notifying them that the goods were held subject to their order, uninsured, and asking for shipping instructions. On April 4th the defendants wrote, positively declining to accept a return of the shirts, or to make any disposition of them. On May 14th the plaintiff began suit by attachment, and some time thereafter the defendants sued the plaintiff for the purchase price in New York. Subsequently to this correspondence and the filing of suit, the shirts were being injured by being kept in stock, "getting dusty and rat-eaten," deteriorating in value, and, in order to prevent further loss in the shirts, the plaintiffs sold as many of them as they could.

The judge, without the intervention of a jury, tried the case and found in favor of the plaintiff the sum of $117, and the defendants' motion for a new trial was overruled.

Lane & Park, for plaintiffs in error. Hardeman, Jones, Callaway & Johnston and Richard Curd, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). Assuming that the finding of the judge on the issues of fact is conclusive, one question of law is presented: Did the conduct of the Dannenberg Company in receiving the shirts, placing them in their store, and subsequently selling them to prevent further deterioration in value, for the purpose of lessening the loss, amount to an acceptance of the shirts and a waiver of its right to sue Salant & Salant for a failure to deliver in accordance with the contract? It is well settled that, where goods are sold by samples exhibited, an express warranty arises that the goods subsequently to be delivered will be of the same quality as the samples, and that upon receipt of the goods the buyer is not bound to inspect before acceptance; but if, upon receipt, he does inspect, and discovers defects before acceptance, it then becomes his duty to reject them. If, after knowledge of the defective quality, he retains the goods and deals with them as his own, such conduct will amount to an acceptance and will be a waiver of the defects so discovered. Christian v. Knight & Co., 128 Ga. 501, 57 S. E. 763; Carolina-Portland Cement Co. v. Turpin, 126 Ga. 677, 55 S. E. 925, and citations. Here the proof is that the purchaser, before acceptance, discovered the inferior quality of the shirts as compared to the samples, and immediately notified the seller of the fact, and that the shirts were held subject to the seller's order and directions as to disposition or shipment. While he placed the shirts in his store, he did not treat them as a part of his stock by selling any of them to customers. But when the seller absolutely refused to take the shirts back, or to give any directions as to disposition, and when the shirts were deteriorating in value by dust, the depredation of rats, etc., the purchaser sold them for the purpose of lessening the eventual damages. This conduct did not amount to an acceptance of the shirts, for when the purchaser at once notified the seller of their inferior condition and offered to reship them, and that they were held subject to the seller's order, he did all he could do; and when, after the refusal to rescind, the shirts were deteriorating in value, it was his duty to sell in order to diminish the damages.

It is insisted by the plaintiffs in error that the purchaser, by selling the goods, made it impossible for the seller to retake the goods, and therefore, that he cannot claim a rescission. The answer to this contention is obvious. The seller had previously absolutely refused to retake the goods, and there was nothing left for the purchaser to do, except to hold the goods as the involuntary bailee of the seller. Civil Code 1910, § 3496. If as such bailee there was a breach of duty, it should have been set up by plea. In this case the defendants' only plea was that the shirts were as warranted. There was no plea that the plaintiff had accepted the shirts, nor was there any effort to set off or recoup the value of the rejected shirts. If the seller had claimed that he was entitled to the amount for which the shirts had been sold, the claim would doubtless have been allowed. Under the pleadings and the evidence, we think the finding of the judge was correct.

Judgment affirmed.

1. GAMING (§ 11*)—CONTRACTS INVALID—INTENT OF PARTIES.

The principle of law is well settled that a contract which is valid on its face cannot be held void by showing that one of the parties understood and intended it to be a wagering contract. The evidence must show that this understanding and intention was mutual, to render a contract, otherwise legitimate, invalid on that ground. Forayth Mfg. Co. v. Castlen, 112 Ga. 205, 37 S. E. 485, 81 Am. St. Rep. 28; Stewart, Morehead & Co. v. Postal Telegraph & Cable Co., 131 Ga. 31, 61 S. E. 1045, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 692, 127 Am. St. Rep. 205; Watson v. Hazelhurst, 127 Ga. 298, 56 S. E. 459; Embry v. Jamison, 131 U. S. 336, 9 Sup. Ct. 776, 33 L. Ed. 172; Bibb v. Allen, 149 U. S. 481, 13 Sup. Ct. 950, 37 L. Ed. 819.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gaming, Cent. Dig. §§ 19-21; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

2. GAMING (§ 12*)—CONTRACTS INVALID—SALES FOR FUTURE DELIVERY.

Executory contracts for future delivery of personal property, which the vendor does not possess or own at the time, but which he expects to obtain by purchase or otherwise before or by the date when the contract is to be executed by delivery of the property, are valid, if at the time of making the contract an actual transfer and sale of the property is contemplated by the parties to the transaction. Clews v. Jamieson, 182 U. S. 461, 21 Sup. Ct. 845, 45 L. Ed. 1183.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gaming, Cent. Dig. § 22; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 244*)—ADMISSIONS—STATEMENT BY AGENT.

Letters written by the president of a corporation, apparently within the scope of his duties and pertinent to the issue under investigation, are admissible in evidence against the corporation. L. & N. R. Co. v. Tift, 100 Ga. 87, 27 S. E. 766; Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall. 644, 19 L. Ed. 1008.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

4. SUFFICIENCY OF INSTRUCTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The contentions of the defendant were fully and fairly presented in the charge, and his requests to charge, so far as pertinent and sound, were covered by the general instructions. The evidence strongly supports the verdict, and no reason whatever is shown why another trial should be had.

1. GARNISHMENT (§ 29*)—PROPERTY REACHED.

Where a creditor of a nonresident of this state sued out an attachment, and caused an ordinary garnishment to be served upon a resident of this state, and on the trial of an issue formed upon the garnishee's answer it appeared that before the summons of garnishment had been served the defendant in the attachment suit had transferred the fund which was owing to him by the garnishee to another nonresident creditor as security for a claim less in amount than that due from the garnishee to the defendant in attachment (the transfer, however, being a total, and not a partial, transfer of the fund), held, that such garnishment, unaided by any equitable pleadings, was ineffectual to reach the surplus coming to the defendant in attachment after satisfying the creditor holding the transfer as to the debt due him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Garnishment, Cent. Dig. § 47; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 213*)—LIEN—PRIORITY.

A deed of bargain and sale does not, by failure to record it, lose its priority over a creditor of the vendor subsequently obtaining lien by attachment or common-law judgment.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 370*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—AUTHENTICATION—DEED.

Lawful registration entitles a deed to admission in evidence without proof of its execution, in the absence of an affidavit of forgery, though the registration be not made until after suit is pending.

Error from Superior Court, Elbert County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Action by B. F. Smith against J. N. Worley, executor. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

A. G. Worley died testate, leaving J. N. Worley as his executor; the will being probated in November, 1907. By the will the widow took an estate for life, and after her death the estate was to be equally divided between the testator's seven children, except that G. A. Worley was to account for a difference of $150.91. The part of the estate which would have come to G. A. Worley amounted to $3,150.91. Prior to December 1, 1910, the widow died, and G. A. Worley, one of the children, on that date executed and delivered to S. G. Worley, his brother, a deed in ordinary form, in which was conveyed the grantor's "whole interest, as an heir, in and to the estate of A. G. Worley, of Elbert county, Ga., for and in consideration of the sum of $2,500." This conveyance was executed before two witnesses, and acknowledged by G. A. Worley before a justice of the peace at Miami, Fla., and was recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Elbert county on February 27, 1911. On the back of the conveyance was written: "Accepted the within deed December 7, 1910. J. N. Worley, Executor Estate of A. G. Worley." This deed was reacknowledged in due form of law before the clerk of the circuit court of Dade county, Fla., a court of record, on March 2, 1911, and was re-recorded in the clerk's office of the superior court of Elbert county, Ga., on March 10, 1911.

On January 31, 1911, the plaintiff, Smith, sued out an attachment before a justice of the peace in Elbert county against G. A. Worley, on the ground that he was a nonresident of the state, and caused it to be executed by service of summons of garnishment upon J. N. Worley, who, as has been stated above, was the executor of the estate of A. G. Worley. S. G. Worley, to whom the defendant in attachment, G. A. Worley, had conveyed his interest in the estate by the deed mentioned above, testified that the consideration of the deed was to the effect that G. A. Worley owed notes aggregating $2,500, on which he, the witness, was indorser, and which he at time of the execution of the deed agreed to pay and did pay. He admitted that there was a tacit understanding between him and G. A. Worley that, if he received from the executor more than enough to reimburse him, he would give the overplus to G. A. Worley. It further appeared that at the time this conveyance was made the estate of A. G. Worley consisted of lands, but after its execution, and before the levy of the attachment, it had been converted into money as the result of an executor's sale. The executor answered that he had no assets in his hands belonging to G. A. Worley, and the issue was raised upon a traverse of this answer. Upon the facts appearing, as has been stated, the court directed a verdict in favor of the garnishee.

Z. B. Rogers, for plaintiff in error. Worley & Nall, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. Unless the deed by which G. A. Worley conveyed his interest in his father's estate to his brother was void, or for some reason ineffectual as against the rights of the attaching creditor, the judgment of the trial court is correct, irrespective of any equitable rights that may have existed owing to the fact that the interest of the defendant in attachment may have been greater than the amount represented in the consideration of the deed by which he conveyed his interest to his brother. This is settled in principle by the case of Howard v. Porter, 99 Ga. 649, 27 S. E. 725, where it is held that, in this class of cases, garnishment, unaided by any equitable pleadings, is ineffectual to reach the surplus coming to the defendant in attachment after his transferee, though holding for security only, has been satisfied.

[2] 2. The deed as first executed was not properly attested or acknowledged. Its first record was ineffectual. The plaintiff contends, therefore, that it was void, and that it took no precedence over his rights as an attaching creditor. Our registry law, as contained in Civil Code 1910, § 3320, does not apply as to contests between deeds and liens, other than liens obtained by contract. A valid deed, though unrecorded, is superior to a subsequent judgment or attachment against the same property. Donovan v. Simmons, 96 Ga. 340, 22 S. E. 966. The proposition is too well settled in this state to require an enlargement of discussion, or a citation of authorities to the effect that a deed is not invalid for lack of registry or recordation.

[3] 3. The filing and recording of a deed upon proper attestation or acknowledgment gives it two advantages over an unrecorded deed. The one is to prevent its postponement to the rights of third persons acquiring subsequent conveyances or contract liens binding against the same property; and the other is to authorize its introduction in evidence without further proof of its execution. We have just shown that there was no need for record, so far as this plaintiff was concerned, as affecting the question of priority; but the further point is made here that the court erred in admitting this deed in evidence, since it was not properly recorded until after the suit was pending. It will be recalled, from the statement of facts prefacing this opinion, that, it having been discovered that the prior attestation and record were ineffectual, the grantee caused the deed to be properly acknowledged, and to be re-recorded shortly prior to the time of the trial. It was upon this reacknowledgment and re-recordation that the judge admitted it in evidence without further proof of its execution. The point is made that a case is to be tried according to the rights of the parties at the commencement of the suit. This is generally true, so far as relates to substantive rights of the parties, but has no reference to mere matters of evidence. The competency of evidence and the methods of making proof are determinable as of the time of the trial, and not as of the time the suit is filed. For instance, a deed less than 30 years old at the date of the filing of the suit, which becomes as much as 30 years old during the pendency of the suit and prior to the trial, may be introduced in evidence at the trial as an ancient deed, and without proof of its execution. We find no error.

HARRIS v. PAULK. (No. 3,481.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 31*)—CONTRACT TO ANSWER FOR DEBT OF ANOTHER.

The plaintiff having failed to prove his case as laid, the court did not err in awarding a nonsuit. The facts in the present case differentiate it from the case of Evans v. Griffin, 1 Ga. App. 327, 57 S. E. 921. In that case, the undertaking of the defendant to assume the obligation of the original debtor, and the absolute release of the latter by the creditor in connection with the assumption of the original debtor's debt by the defendant, created an original undertaking on the part of the latter; in the present case, as the original debtor was not released, the obligation of the defendant was merely one of suretyship, and therefore was required to be in writing.

Error from City Court of Blakely; L. M. Rambo, Judge.

Action by T. B. Harris against A. Paulk. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Glessner & Park, for plaintiff in error. B. B. Collins, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Harris sued Paulk on an action of complaint, alleging that the latter, moved by a good consideration set forth in the petition, approached him, and after certain negotiations assumed individually certain indebtedness due by one Thompson to Harris. It was further alleged that Harris agreed to release Thompson from the indebtedness due to Harris. The contract, as set up in the petition, was identical in general details with the one passed upon by this court in Evans v. Griffin, 1 Ga. App. 327, 57 S. E. 921, and the petition was not demurrable for any reason.

Upon the trial the plaintiff did not prove his case as laid. Instead of proving that Thompson was released, and that Paulk assumed Thompson's debt as an original undertaking, the testimony in behalf of the plaintiff merely tended to show that Paulk became surety for the payment of the indebtedness due by Thompson to Harris. The defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, and, though the court overruled this motion when it was first made at the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony, the court reconsidered this ruling, and later on in the course of the testimony for the defendant awarded a nonsuit.

The facts of the instant case clearly distinguish it from the case of Evans v. Griffin, supra. In that case "Evans came to Griffin and told him he had hired Jordan for the year 1906, to which Griffin replied it would be all right, but that Jordan owed him $39.42, and Evans said, 'Well, I will pay it before I move him.' At the time he moved Jordan, Evans told Griffin he had not sold his cotton, but that he would pay the amount as soon as he sold the cotton. He did not pay the same as promised; the promise was oral. The plaintiff testified that, while he had not marked the account on his books against Jordan settled, yet he no longer considered or claimed that he still retained the indebtedness against him."

In the present case, Harris testified: "I told him he would have to pay me my money if I released the negro from his agreement to work for me. But he would not agree to that, but said he would pay me half of the amount in the fall of the year, and if the negro remained on his place for the year

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

1908 he would see that I got the balance in the fall of that year. I agreed to this, and let him have the negro." Upon cross-examination he testified: "I charged the negro's account to Joe Jenkins, by 'Louis Thompson,' and I look to Joe Jenkins to pay me. * * * I did not release Joe Jenkins. I did not release the negro from his indebtedness to me, but never called on him for payment of it. I may have turned my account against this negro over to a collection agency to collect; but, if I did, I don't remember it. It is true that, after I made this contract with the defendant, I looked to all of them for payment—Joe Jenkins, Louis Thompson, and Mr. Paulk. I expected to get my money out of one of them. I did not care who paid me, so long as I got my money."

We think the court was right in construing this testimony as creating nothing more than a contract of suretyship, which, under the statute of frauds, must have been in writing to be enforceable. Even if in a sense the plaintiff proved his case in his direct testimony, yet on cross-examination, construing his testimony by the rule laid down in Evans v. Josephine Mills, 119 Ga. 448 (2), 46 S. E. 674, he disproved his right to recover. Consequently the award of a nonsuit was not error. In the case of Evans v. Griffin, the creditor accepted the substitution of the defendant in lieu of the original debtor, and absolutely released the latter. In the case at bar, as the creditor testified himself that he had neither released the original debtor nor a former surety, it cannot be said that he agreed to an assumption by Paulk of Thompson's liability as an original undertaking on Paulk's part in entire substitution for Thompson's prior liability.

CONTRACTS (§ 26*) — ACTION FOR BREACH—EVIDENCE.

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; W. M. Harrell, Judge.

Action by A. J. Patterson against the Georgia, Florida & Alabama Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

R. G. Hartsfield, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Pottle, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. This case was submitted to his honor, Judge Harrell, of the city court of Bainbridge, for his determination without the intervention of a jury, and, after a consideration of the evidence, the court rendered a judgment in favor of the defendant.

The action was one for damages which the plaintiff claimed he had suffered by reason of the breach of a contract of sale, under which he became the purchaser of a certain canning plant. The negotiations were between Patterson, the plaintiff, who resided in Greenville, Tenn., and O'Dell, who was the general manager of the defendant at Bainbridge, Ga., and were all carried on by correspondence, which is contained in the record. The plaintiff testified by interrogatories, from which it appears that the parties had never met in person. Numbers of letters were exchanged, and several telegrams. The correspondence began by a letter from O'Dell to Patterson on February 5, 1908, and continued without intermission of more than two or three days until April 5, 1908. It cannot serve any useful purpose to detail its contents. It may be said that Patterson first took an option. He did not comply with that option, and still the correspondence was continued, and the contract might have been created, even after the expiration of the option, if it was not apparent that the minds of the parties never did meet upon the same thing in the same sense. There was disagreement as to what was actually to be delivered, and much correspondence over this, without any definite understanding. There is likewise apparent all through the correspondence a determination on the part of each party to insist upon his own preference as to the method of payment. O'Dell insisted, each time that he referred to it, that payment should be made at Bainbridge, and Patterson as often insisted that O'Dell should draw on him through either bank in Greenville, and gave references as to his complete solvency.

It would be fruitless to refer to the number of minor matters in the correspondence which indicate continual contention, rather than fixed concurrence of opinion, in regard to the details of the proposed bargain. If the statement of O'Dell that the canning plant was complete could have been insisted upon by Patterson (and, of course, the delivery of a complete plant could have been demanded if the other terms of the first proposal had been complied with), still there had been no definite acceptance by Patterson of O'Dell's offer prior to the time that O'Dell notified Patterson that some of the machinery or equipment was missing, and, of course, after that time, if the parties had traded at all, O'Dell's first offer of a complete canning factory must be deemed to have been withdrawn, and is qualified by the later statement that some of the accessories of the canning factory had been stolen. As Patterson did not know what parts were missing, and continually expressed a desire for transportation to come and investigate, it could not thereafter be said that the minds of the parties had agreed, or could agree, on what was actually to be sold by the one and purchased by the other. Judgment affirmed.

CORPORATIONS (§§ 399, 408*)—EVIDENCE (§ 419*)—POWERS OF CORPORATION—REPRESENTATION BY OFFICERS—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS.

Where a gin and warehouse company holds out a person as its general manager, the title implies power to make any contracts ordinarily necessary for the conduct of its business. Authority to execute a promissory note for the purchase of an engine and boiler, and to bind the corporation for its payment, would be presumed to be within the scope of the general manager's authority. But neither the general manager nor any other officer of a corporation has power or authority to purchase its capital stock, and to bind the corporation for the payment therefor by promissory note or otherwise. Parol evidence is always admissible to show the consideration of a note, and consequently the court erred in striking the plea of the defendant, and in excluding testimony offered by it tending to show that the note in the present case was given to pay for $250 of the amount of stock subscribed by the defendant, and especially as the payment, if made, would result in the purchase of that amount of stock by the corporation itself, or the reduction of the capital stock in that amount.

Error to Corporation Court of City of Danville.

Action by the Lewis Shoe Company against Lucy E. Dudley. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The following is the declaration and bill of particulars:

"Declaration.

"E. T. Lewis, doing business as the Lewis Shoe Company, plaintiff, complains of Lucy E. Dudley, defendant, of a plea of trespass on the case, for this, to wit: That on a certain day, to wit, on the 30th day of December, 1909, and before that time, said defendant was the owner of a certain lot of land in the city of Danville, on the northern side of Main street, at or near its intersection by Union street, with a large three-story brick building thereon, commonly known as 'The Dudley Block.' That said building was and is used by defendant for letting the same to sundry tenants for certain rents charged therefor, the lower or ground floors thereof being rented, or let, to merchants for the storage and sale of sundry kinds of goods and merchandise, while the upper or second, and third stories thereof are let by defendant to sundry tenants, who use the same for offices, clubrooms, etc., with access thereto by means of stairways and halls. That plaintiff as tenant of defendant occupies one of the ground floor rooms of said building, designated as No. 440, together with the basement room thereunder, for which he pays said defendant a certain rent in monthly installments, which he uses as a shoe and hat store, and in which two rooms, on December 30, 1909, he had a large and valuable stock of shoes, hats, hosiery, and like merchandise, neatly packed in boxes, cases, and drawers, in good condition for exhibition and the sale thereof to purchasers. That in the second story of said building and immediately over the said storeroom and basement occupied by plaintiff are water-closets for the use of the tenants of the rooms and offices on said second floor, which said water-closets are furnished with water, conducted thereto in pipes connecting with a large reservoir owned by the city of Danville. That said pipes connecting with said closets, over plaintiff's said storeroom as aforesaid, were under the control of defendant, and were negligently and carelessly erected and maintained by defendant, exposed to the action of the weather, without any protection against freezing and without any device for carrying off water which might overflow from said closets, or otherwise escape from said pipes and descend upon the plaintiff's goods in the room beneath the same. That it was the duty of defendant to use due and proper care in erecting and maintaining said water pipes and to keep them in repair for the protection of plaintiff, and his property, against the freezing of the water therein and the consequent bursting and flooding of his said merchandise with water. That plaintiff had no right of control over, or of access to, said water pipes, but his protection against water which might flow therefrom depended entirely upon the due exercise of care over them by defendant, under whose control they were. That after having negligently erected said water pipes in said closets over the store occupied by plaintiff for the purpose and use aforesaid, so that they were exposed to the weather and liable to be burst by freezing of the water therein, and having failed to make any provision to protect plaintiff from water which might escape from said pipes and descend upon his merchandise, defendant negligently and carelessly failed and refused to inspect, look after, and cause the water in said pipes to be cut off. And during a certain time, to wit, during December, 1909, defendant carelessly allowed the water to remain in said pipes for several days and nights, exposed to very cold weather, without cutting the same off, or making any attempt to prevent the freezing therein of the water, the bursting of said pipes, and flooding of plaintiff's merchandise by water, so that on a certain day or night, to wit, on December 30, 1909, said pipes, after having been frozen, burst in the nighttime, in one of the said water-closets over plaintiff's storeroom, and the pressure of the water in said reservoir forced the water in great quantities through the said burst pipe, and thence, passing through the unprotected floor of said water-closet into plaintiff's storeroom, flooded his said stock of shoes, hats, hosiery, shoe boxes, cases, leather goods, etc., greatly disordering, defacing, and damaging the same. Also, by nature of the premises, plaintiff was then and there put to much expense in endeavoring to save his said stock from further damage, and to repair said damaged goods and make the same as worthy as possible; and of advertising said damaged merchandise, all of which created much disorder and confusion in his said store, and for a long time prevented the usual carrying on of his business, by reason of all of which plaintiff was greatly damaged, to wit, to the amount of $4,000.

"Therefore he brings this suit."

"Bill of Particulars.

"Bill of particulars showing location of and the particular pipe on defendant's premises, which, so far as plaintiff can discover, bursted, as alleged in the declaration, and from which the water escaped and descended on plaintiff's merchandise.

"(1) The water-closet which contained the pipes complained of is situated on the second floor of defendant's said building, immediately over the rear corner of plaintiff's said storeroom, being the nearest rear corner to Union street.

"(2) The particular pipe which was allowed to freeze and burst as alleged in the declaration was a certain pipe, to wit, a pipe called a supply pipe, in that particular department of said closets set apart and designated by defendant for the use of Dr. Julian M. Robinson."

The demurrer was on the ground that the declaration failed to state with sufficient certainty what water pipes and their location, the bursting of which is claimed to have inflicted damage upon plaintiff's goods, and also upon the ground that the allegation,

"that said pipes connecting with said closets over said storeroom as aforesaid were negligently and carelessly erected and maintained by defendant," does not state of what such negligence consisted with sufficient definiteness to advise defendant of what acts of negligence she is charged with.

R. W. Peatross and Harris & Harris, for plaintiff in error. Julian Meade, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. The defendant in error was a tenant of the plaintiff in error, occupying one of several stores in the "Dudley Block," situated on the corner of Main and Union streets, in Danville. The second and third stories of the building, which cover all the stores in the block, were occupied by numerous tenants as offices, lodgerooms, clubrooms, etc., the landlord occupying no part of the building, and retaining no portion thereof for her own use. The building was supplied throughout, for the convenience of the tenants, with water pipes, taking water to the respective apartments. The building was not supplied with heat, and was not attended to or looked after by a janitor or any other person in the employment of the landlord; the respective tenants having their own servants, and furnishing the heat for their respective apartments. A water-closet was situated on the second floor, over the store of the defendant in error, which was in the exclusive occupation and use of Dr. Robinson, one of the tenants on that floor. On the night of December 30, 1909, the pipe in this closet burst as a result of freezing and thawing, and the water overflowed the closet, ran through the floor and ceiling into the store below of the defendant in error, flooding and greatly damaging its stock of goods. Thereupon this suit was brought by the Lewis Shoe Company to recover damages for the loss sustained. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, to which judgment this writ of error was awarded.

[1] There was no error in the court's refusal to sustain the demurrer to the declaration. The material facts are distinctly alleged, leaving no need for conjecture as to any fact upon which the right of recovery was based. The declaration, together with the bill of particulars filed therewith, gave full and sufficient notice of the nature and character of the plaintiff's claim, pointing out the particular pipe which burst and its location.

In the case of Keoughtan Lodge v. Steiner & Kaufman, 106 Va. 589, 56 S. E. 569, where the building was under the superintendence and control of a janitor, who was the employé and agent of the landlord, quoting from Farnham on Waters and Water Rights, it is said: "If the injury is caused by leakage from pipes in other portions of the building than that occupied by the injured tenant, the question of the landlord's liability will depend upon his connection with the injury. He is liable for all injuries resulting from his own negligence, and an exemption clause in the lease will not include such injury."

We find a full and very helpful discussion of the duties and liabilities of landlord and tenant in the case of McCarthy v. New York County Savings Bank, 74 Me. 315, 43 Am. Rep. 591. In that case the room occupied by the tenant was furnished with a water basin the apertures of which were not sufficient to carry off all the water that was delivered by the faucet when left open. The tenant left the faucet open, and the water overflowed and injured the goods of another tenant occupying rooms on a lower story. It was held that the landlord was not liable, the court saying: "There is nothing to indicate that his (the tenant's) control of the faucet which he negligently left open overnight, thereby causing the damage alleged, was not as exclusive of any rightful exercise of authority by the landlord in regard to its use as was his possession of any part of the leased premises. The bowl supplied with water was in the room when Fiske began his tenancy under the defendants. He used it and paid the rent. He was tenant of the bank as to the bowl and its appurtenances, as of the other parts of the room, and with such rights of possession and control as pertained to the tenancy. These fixtures were leased to him, and as lessee he was the actual occupant of them." Again it is said: "That water was introduced into the building by the bank, that they caused the pipes to be laid and maintained and paid the water rates, are not facts which tend to show their direct and present control of faucets within the rooms of their tenants. They may enter, if necessary, to change or repair the pipes, but, while the room with its fixtures is in the possession of a tenant, it is he who sustains to third persons the liability of an occupant, as the landlord sustains that of owner." And, further, it is said: "The liability of the landlord does not follow from the fact that the building does not contain the latest and most improved system of water pipes. He does not insure against the negligence of his tenants, nor is he bound to construct his building so as to reduce the possibilities of damage from such negligence to an absolute minimum."

In 2 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 723, it is said: "If the landlord provides pipes and other plumbing of good quality and surrenders possession, the tenant only is responsible for the mode in which these things are used, and for any overflow caused either by neglect to turn off the water, or by such misuse of the works as deprives them of power to stop the flow of water."

In the case at bar, the uncontradicted evidence shows, in addition to what has been already stated, that the building in question was planned and erected under the supervision of a competent architect, that the plumbing work was done by an experienced plumber, and the material used the best the market afforded; that the water-closets were properly located; and that each of them, including the one used and occupied by Dr. Robinson, was provided with a stop cock on the supply pipe which ran up to each tank, and was within easy reach of any one who desired to turn off the water, and thereby prevent its escape in the event of freezing; that Dr. Robinson was the sole occupant and had the exclusive use and control, in connection with the offices rented by him, of the water-closet in which the pipe froze and burst; that the key hung in his office, where the landlord could and did get at it when repairs were to be made; that whenever the water-closet became stopped up, or in any way out of order, he notified the agents of the landlord, and they always repaired it or put it in order; that four days prior to the bursting of the pipe which did the damage complained of, when it was very cold, he tried to turn the stop cock and stop the flow of water in his tank, but it was frozen and would not turn, and that it remained frozen for four days; that he did not tell the tenant below of the frozen pipe above him and did not notify the agents of the landlord that the pipe was out of order, because it had frozen before and always melted, and he thought it would do so again.

[2] The plaintiff asked for two instructions, which were given, over the protest of the defendant, as follows:

"(1) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that it was the duty of the defendant to look after and keep in repair the water pipes in the water-closet used by Dr. J. M. Robinson in connection with the office let to him by the defendant, and that plaintiff had no right or control over said pipes, then the court instructs the jury that it was the duty of defendant to use ordinary and reasonable care in inspecting and caring for said pipes so as to prevent them from freezing, bursting, and overflowing the premises of plaintiff, situated under them.

"(2) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence in this cause that under the rental contract or agreement between defendant and Dr. Julian Robinson it was the duty of defendant, Lucy E. Dudley, to look after, care for, and keep in order the water pipes in the closet rented to and occupied by Dr. Julian Robinson, that then it was her duty to use ordinary and reasonable care to prevent said water pipes from freezing, bursting, and discharging water on the goods of the plaintiff, and the mere fact that the tenant, Dr.

Robinson, may have called attention to needed repairs to the pipes in his closet, and requested the defendant to enter and make such repairs, does not shift the responsibility or duty which she may have owed to other tenants in her building to him."

These instructions were misleading, without evidence to support them, and were well calculated to impose upon the defendant, as landlord, responsibility for duties she was under no obligation to perform. There is no evidence tending to show that it was the duty of the defendant to look after and care for the pipes in Dr. Robinson's office with a view to keeping them from freezing and bursting. On the contrary, the evidence shows that Dr. Robinson had been placed in the exclusive possession and control of the water-closet to which no one, not even the landlord, had access, except by procuring from him the only key that opened the door to the closet; that the only duty devolving upon the landlord in connection with the closet was to repair it or put it in order whenever notified that it was out of order, which she had always done promptly. The evidence on this point is uncontradicted and conclusive, and shows that the defendant's sole duty with respect to this closet was exactly the same that she assumed under her written lease with the plaintiff, which provides, as her obligation in this matter, "that she will unstop all waste pipes that may become choked by negligence or inattention on the part of those using them, and will repair all water pipes that may burst from freezing because of failure to turn the water off."

The instructions erroneously told the jury that the duty of the landlord to repair the pipes when out of order imposed upon her the duty of preventing them from getting out of order; in other words, that it was her duty to inspect and care for the pipes in Dr. Robinson's closet so as to prevent the water in them from freezing and the pipes from bursting. There is no evidence in support of this proposition. The instructions ignored the difference between the duty of the landlord in the matter of repairing and keeping pipes in order and the duty of the tenant in his use of the premises to avail himself of the precautions provided to prevent the escape of water in the event of the pipes freezing and bursting.

[3, 4] The defendant asked for 14 instructions, 10 of which were given, and objection is taken to the action of the court in refusing to give the remaining 4. In this there was no error. The 10 instructions given for the defendant fully submitted her case to the jury. The 4 rejected instructions were either fully covered by the 10 which were given, or contained an abstract proposition of law which was immaterial.

For the error pointed out in the two instructions given for the plaintiff, the judgment complained of must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial to be had not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

BETTMAN v. SKINNER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1912.)

1. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS COVERED BY OTHERS.

In an action for injuries by falling from a stepladder, the court instructed that it was the duty of defendant to provide plaintiff with a reasonably safe stepladder with which to perform his work. Held, that the omission of the qualification, that defendant's duty was "to use ordinary care" so to do, is not material where the omitted matter is fully covered by an instruction given by request of defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 263*)—NECESSITY OF EXCEPTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

Omission in instruction cannot be urged on appeal where no exception was taken on such ground.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1516-1532; Dec. Dig. § 263.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 293*)—CONFLICTING INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries to a servant by a fall from a defective stepladder, an instruction that it was the duty of defendant to provide plaintiff with a reasonably safe stepladder, and that plaintiff, in the absence of notice to the contrary, had the right to rely on the performance of that duty by the defendant. At the instance of defendant, the court instructed that the jury must believe that the stepladder was defective; that defendant knew or ought to have known of the defect; that plaintiff did not know of it or, by the exercise of ordinary care, could not have known of it, and that although the stepladder was furnished to plaintiff by defendant with knowledge that it was unsafe and by reason thereof, plaintiff sustained the jury complained of, yet they must find for defendant, if the defects were obvious or were known or by the exercise of reasonable care could have been known by plaintiff. Held, that plaintiff's instruction is not in conflict with defendant's instructions, but that the latter qualified it so as to meet defendant's view of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1148-1161; Dec. Dig. § 293.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 197*)—NECESSITY OF OBJECTIONS—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

An objection to an instruction which allowed the jury to award damages for loss of wages, doctor's bill and hospital expenses, under a declaration which claimed only general damages, cannot be urged on appeal where defendant, without objection, allowed evidence upon all these matters to be introduced, as defendant could have called for a bill of particalars, under Code 1904, § 3249, or an amendment of the declaration would have been permissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 197; * Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1428-1441.]

5. TRIAL (§ 59*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 970*)—ORDER OF INTRODUCING EVIDENCE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The order of introducing evidence is always a matter largely in the discretion of the trial court, and affords no ground for reversal where the exercise of such discretion does not operate to the prejudice of appellant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 138-142; Dec. Dig. § 59; * Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3849-3851; Dec. Dig. § 970.*]

6. DAMAGES (§ 182*)—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES—PHYSICAL INJURIES.

Where a fall from a stepladder results in compound fracture of the lower portions of both bones of one leg and the injury is permanent and suppuration resulted, and a second operation was necessary to remove fragments of bone, and it was with difficulty that amputation of the leg was avoided, and the doctor's bill and hospital expenses at the time of the trial amount to $367, a judgment for $750 was not excessive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 872-885; Dec. Dig. § 182.*]

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by John L. Skinner against M. L. Bettman, for injuries received from falling from a stepladder. Under defendant's first instruction, the jury were told that in order to find for plaintiff, they must believe from the evidence that the stepladder was defective; that defendant knew or ought to have known of the defect; that plaintiff did not know of it or by the exercise of ordinary care, could not have known of it and that the injury resulted in spite of ordinary care on the part of defendant. Under defendant's second instruction, the jury were told that although they believe from the evidence that the stepladder was furnished to plaintiff by defendant with the knowledge on the part of defendant that it was defective, and by reason thereof plaintiff sustained the injury complained of, yet they must find for defendant if they believe from the evidence that the defects were open or obvious or were such that were known or by the exercise of reasonable care, could have been known by plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

A. B. Seldner, for plaintiff in error. J. Edward Cole, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. This action, which resulted in a judgment for $750 in favor of Skinner against Bettman, arose as follows: The defendant, through his manager Williams, kept a barroom in the city of Norfolk. On the morning of June 27, 1910, the manager, who was late in opening up the saloon, finding himself short of help, gave a hurry order to the porter to hire a man to assist them. Skinner, who had never worked at the place before, was called in, and immediately on his arrival the manager told him to get out of his coat, and, having directed the porter to bring out the stepladder, hurried Skinner up the ladder, at the same time pointing out to him where he was to begin washing the windows. While Williams was giving these instructions, the plaintiff ascended the ladder to within two steps of the top, when the side pieces spread and the ladder collapsed, precipitating him to the pavement.

The ladder had been in use for many years, one of the cross-braces was missing, and it was tied with a piece of rope. The plaintiff testified that it seemed to be all right, and he knew nothing to the contrary until after he had gotten near the top and it began to spread. The fall resulted in a compound fracture of the lower portions of both bones of the left leg. The injury was serious and permanent, suppuration supervened, and a second operation was necessary to remove fragments of bone, and it was with difficulty that amputation of the leg was avoided. The doctor's bill and hospital charges at the time of the trial amounted to $457.

Three errors are assigned: (1) To the action of the court in granting instructions Nos. 1 and 2 for the plaintiff; (2) to the admission of testimony as to the wages the plaintiff was earning when injured, after the evidence had been closed; and (3) to the overruling of the defendant's motion for a new trial.

[1-3] Plaintiff's first instruction told the jury that it was the duty of the defendant to provide the plaintiff with a reasonably safe stepladder with which to perform the work assigned to him; and that the servant, in the absence of notice to the contrary, had a right to rely upon the performance of that duty by the master. The only objection raised to this instruction is that it is said to omit the qualification that if the plaintiff knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care ought to have known, of the defective condition of the ladder, he cannot recover.

This restriction would have come with more propriety from the other side, and in point of fact is fully covered by the defendant's instruction No. 2.

In the first part of the instruction, in defining the duty of the defendant, the words "to use ordinary care" should have preceded the language, "to provide the plaintiff with a reasonably safe stepladder," etc. But the omission was not made the ground of exception, nor does it constitute reversible error under the evidence in this case.

Nor is the instruction in conflict with the defendant's instructions Nos. 1 and 2. The latter are complementary merely of the former, and qualify it so as to meet the defendant's view of the evidence.

[4] The objection to the plaintiff's other instruction, that it allowed the jury to award special damages (that is to say, for loss of wages, doctor's bill, and hospital expenses) in a case where the declaration claimed only general damages for the injury suffered, is without merit. We are not prepared to admit that loss of wages, doctor's bill, and hospital expenses are such damages as need to be specially pleaded to be recoverable in this action. It would seem more reasonable to suppose that all these items of damage would necessarily and ordinarily inhere in case of an injury of the gravity of that suffered by the plaintiff. But be that as it may, the defendant, without objection, allowed the introduction of evidence upon all matters covered by this assignment, and he cannot be allowed to make that objection for the first time in this court. Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. 869, 70 L. R. A. 999; N. N. & O. P. Ry., etc., Co. v. McCormick, 106 Va. 517, 56 S. E. 281.

If a bill of particulars was desired, it could have been demanded under Va. Code 1904, § 3249; or, if the court's attention had been called to the objection at the proper time, a bar amendment of the declaration would have been permissible. Wood v. Am. Nat. Bk., 100 Va. 306, 40 S. E. 931; City of Richmond v. Wood, 109 Va. 75, 63 S. E. 449.

[5] The second assignment involves the order of the introduction of evidence. That is always a matter largely in the discretion of the trial court, and rarely affords ground for reversal. In this instance the discretion, as exercised, has in no way operated to the prejudice of the defendant. Norfolk, etc., Co. v. Norris, 101 Va. 422, 44 S. E. 719; Pocahontas Collieries Co. v. Williams, 105 Va. 711, 54 S. E. 868; Moore Lumber Corp. v. Walker, 110 Va. 775, 67 S. E. 374.

[6] The third and last assignment of error is to the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial.

The case was fairly submitted to the jury on instructions, and the evidence, upon the plaintiff's theory of the case, was amply sufficient to sustain their finding. Indeed, the damages awarded, considering the serious character of the injury and the expenses incurred by the plaintiff, were extremely moderate.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the judgment is plainly right and ought to be affirmed.

GREENSBURG NAT. BANK v. C. SYER & CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1912.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING (§§ 127, 159*)—DRAFTS—OWNERSHIP.

If a bank received a draft as a deposit to be treated as cash by the depositor, according to the intention of the bank and the depositor when it was deposited, the title thereto passed to the bank; but, if the intention was that the bank should only receive the draft for collection, title did not pass to it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 804, 810, 547-553; Dec. Dig. §§ 127, 159.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 263*)—OBJECTION IN TRIAL COURT—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction not excepted to below is the law of the case, though erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1516-1532; Dec. Dig. § 263.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 235*)—ADMISSIONS—DRAWER OF DRAFT.

After the drawer of a draft has parted with the title thereto to his bank, no subsequent admissions or conduct of his can prejudice the bank's rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 873-875; Dec. Dig. § 235.*]

4. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 154*)—DEPOSIT OF DRAFT—TITLE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show that a draft with bill of lading attached was deposited by the drawer in his bank for collection, and not so as to pass title thereto to the bank.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Action, aided by attachment, by C. Syer & Co. against J. M. Hornung, in which the Greensburg National Bank intervenes as claimant of the attached funds. Judgment for plaintiff against the original defendant directed to be paid out of the fund, and the bank brings error. Affirmed.

Loyall, Taylor & White, for plaintiff in error. Jeffries, Wolcott, Wolcott & Lankford, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. Syer & Co., of Norfolk, purchased of J. M. Hornung, of Greensburg, Ind., a car load of flour. When the flour was shipped, Hornung attached the bill of lading to a draft on Syer & Co. for $1,062, and deposited the draft in the Greensburg National Bank of Greensburg, Ind. Upon arrival of the flour at Norfolk, Syer & Co. claimed that it was of inferior quality and refused to pay the draft which had been presented to them by the Citizens' Bank of Norfolk, through which the draft had come from the Greensburg National Bank. Syer & Co. notified Hornung of their dissatisfaction with the flour, and thereupon Hornung wired Syer & Co. to draw on him for the amount of the depreciation in the value of the flour. Syer & Co. did not take up the draft, but drew on Hornung for the depreciation, which draft Hornung refused to pay, and upon his refusal Syer & Co. went to the Citizens' Bank of Norfolk, took up the draft for $1,062, and immediately brought suit against Hornung for the amount of the depreciation in the flour and attached the money in the hands of the Citizens' Bank of Norfolk as the property of Hornung.

The Greensburg National Bank was allowed to intervene as claimant of the fund held by the Citizens' Bank, and thereupon moved to quash the attachment on the ground that the fund was not the property of Hornung, but belonged to the Greensburg National Bank, and that the attachment was issued upon false suggestion. The matter was submitted to a jury, who found that the money in the bank was the property of Hornung and subject to the attachment of Syer & Co.; a judgment was entered in favor of Syer & Co. against Hornung for $420, the amount of the depreciation in the flour, which was directed to be paid by the Citizens' Bank out of the fund which had been attached in its hands; and thereupon the Greensburg National Bank obtained a writ of error from this court.

Defendants in error urge several formal objections to the course of procedure in the trial court, which, in the view we take of the case, need not be here considered.

The draft deposited by Hornung in the Greensburg National Bank was listed on the following deposit slip:

| Draft, C. Syer & Co..... | 1062 | 00 |

Certain entries in Hornung's passbook were introduced in evidence, consisting of several items of cash during the month of August, 1909, then an entry on the 14th, "Syer & Co. $1,062.00," followed several entries of cash during the same month.

The plaintiff proved by a witness, the vice president of the Seaboard Bank of Norfolk; that he had been engaged in the banking business for a number of years and was acquainted with the customs and usages among bankers throughout the country as to the manner of handling drafts for their customers; that it was the general usage and custom to permit a customer to deposit a draft with the bank for collection, and pass the amount thereof to the credit of the customer, and to permit the customer to check upon the amount so credited, the recognized understanding being that, when the draft is received by the bank for collection, it may be charged back to the customer's account at any time if not paid; that this is recognized merely as a favor from the bank to the customer, at the option of the bank, dependent largely upon the confidence the bank has in the customer, and the extent of his dealings with the bank. On cross-examination this witness testified, further, that it was the custom of banks to purchase drafts as well as to take them for collection; that, from an inspection of the draft in this case, the deposit slip, and bank book, it was evident that the draft was discounted by the bank and that J. M. Hornung received cash for the same; that the draft shows on its face that it was deposited in the Greensburg National Bank as cash, and not for collection; that the indorsements on the back of the draft show it was handled by the banks whose stamps appear thereon for collection; and that the bank book shows that the bank had not been reimbursed by J. M. Hornung, or by the collection of the draft.

It further appears in the evidence on behalf of the Greensburg National Bank that it received from Hornung a draft with bill of lading on Syer & Co. for $1,062 for credit to Hornung; that the draft was presented with the passbook of John M. Hornung, and the sum of $1,062, was credited on Hornung's passbook, and the account of Hornung on the general ledger was credited with a like amount; that, in saying that Hornung was credited with that amount, the witness meant that for that amount the Greensburg National Bank became the debtor of Hornung and that he became the creditor; that the draft was forwarded by the Greensburg National Bank with instructions to collect and place the proceeds to its credit; that the amount of the draft was charged on its general ledger to an account as "due from other banks"; that it was the custom of banks, when drafts were received from strangers, or when presented by customers for collection only, to forward the drafts to the proper point for collection, and the proceeds when received were credited to the proper party, and in that case the draft would not become the property of the bank, but it would be acting as agent for the payee of the draft; that in such case in its indorsement on the draft there would appear the words, "for collection"; that the credit which was given Hornung for the draft in dispute had never been canceled or charged off on his account; that at the time the draft in question was received by the Greensburg Bank Hornung's account was overdrawn $91.68; that after the deposit of that draft there was a balance to his credit of $970.32; that Hornung had no authority or right from the Greensburg National Bank to instruct the Citizens' National Bank at Norfolk, or C. Syer & Co., or any one, to reduce the amount of the draft in question in the payment thereof; that, when the draft was received by the Greensburg National Bank, it was the intention of the bank to purchase the draft for the sum stated therein and credit the account of John M. Hornung the same as if it had been that amount of actual money. The testimony of another witness introduced by the bank is substantially to the same effect.

[1] After the testimony was closed, the court gave to the jury the following instruction: "The court instructs the jury that the question as to whether or not the title to the draft deposited by Hornung with the Greensburg National Bank passed to the bank or remained in Hornung is one of the facts to be determined by the jury, under all the facts and circumstances of this case as proven by the evidence. If the jury believes from the evidence that the Greensburg National Bank received the draft as a deposit to be treated as cash, and that such was the intention of said bank and Hornung at the time said draft was deposited, then title to the draft passed to the bank and the jury should find in its favor; but if the jury believes from the evidence that it was the intention of the bank and Hornung, at the time of the deposit of the draft, that said draft should not be received as cash, but only by the bank as an agent for collection, then the title to the draft did not pass to the bank, and the jury should find for the plaintiff. Checks or drafts deposited or credited, if intended to be for collection only, do not become the property of the bank, even if the depositor has been allowed to check against the deposit before the paper is collected."

[2] This instruction was not objected to by either party to the controversy. It is, we believe, a correct statement of the law, and, in any event, there being no exception to it, it is the law of this case.

Defendants in error rely upon the following propositions, which are shown in evidence, as being sufficient to maintain the verdict and judgment complained of: That the transaction was in line with the regular custom among banks in crediting such collections for the accommodation of their regular depositors; that Hornung was an old depositor of the bank of six or seven years standing; that the draft was not discounted, but the whole amount thereof was placed to Hornung's credit; that it was deposited as paper, and not as cash; that it was treated and dealt with by Hornung and his attorneys, in his correspondence with Syer, as his property and under his control; that the attorneys who appeared for Hornung in dealing with Syer & Co. also appeared for the bank in the taking of depositions; that, instead of requiring protest and notice of dishonor to be given or waived so as to hold the maker and indorsers liable in case of dishonor, the bank directed that no protest should be made, showing that it did not look to the maker for recourse as such under the laws governing the transfer of negotiable instruments; but that the draft was regarded as being still Hornung's paper, which, under the custom and usage shown to exist, could be charged back to him at any time.

The jury, as we have seen, found a verdict for the plaintiff; the court entered judgment upon that verdict; there was no exception to the law, as stated to the jury by the court; and the case is before us upon a demurrer to the evidence. Our only province, therefore, is to consider whether or not there be sufficient testimony to sustain the verdict of the jury.

In Lynchburg Milling Co. v. National Exchange Bank, 109 Va. 639, 64 S. E. 980, the plaintiff in error, who was the plaintiff in the court below, brought an action of assumpsit against White & Rumsey Grain Company of Chicago, and issued an attachment upon the effects of the defendant in the possession of the National Exchange Bank. The bank answered, denying the suggestion, but stated by way of explanation that it had received from and on account of the Continental National Bank of Chicago a draft drawn by the defendant, the White & Rumsey Grain Company, on the plaintiff, the Lynchburg Milling Company, in favor of the Chicago bank for $533.35 for collection, to which draft a bill of lading was attached for a car load of oats shipped by the defendant to the plaintiff; that the draft was paid by the plaintiff to respondent, and the amount placed to the credit of the Chicago bank, but the fund was not remitted because of the pendency of the attachment. And the question considered was to whom the money attached belonged—whether to the White & Rumsey Grain Company, or to the Chicago bank. It was held in that case to be the property of the latter, and that the attachment had been sued out upon false suggestion. A circumstance relied upon by plaintiff in error in that case was that the drawer waived protest and notice; but this court was of opinion that the circumstance was not inconsistent with the Chicago bank's bona fide ownership of the draft. The court did not hold that it was not a pertinent fact to be considered along with other circumstances in determining the question of ownership.

In the case of St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Johnston, 133 U. S. 566, 10 Sup. Ct. 390, 33 L. Ed. 683, the court said, speaking of deposit of a draft in bank, that: "If there be no bargain that the property should be changed, the relation resembles that of principal and agent. Mere liberty to draw does not make out such a bargain." And in the same case it was said that the fact that the draft was entered at its full value indicated that it was not discounted but credited for convenience and in anticipation of its payment.

In Baillie v. Augusta Savings Bank, 95 Ga. 277, 21 S. E. 717, 51 Am. St. Rep. 74, Chief Justice Simmons, speaking for the Supreme Court of Georgia, said: "In the absence of anything indicating a different understanding, a bank which in the ordinary course of business receives from a depositor a check upon another bank, and credits it on his deposit book, not as cash, but as a check, will not be held to be an absolute purchaser of the check. If a bank does not wish to assume the relation of a debtor for the paper to the depositor, this intention may be manifested in a very explicit manner by crediting the paper as paper."

[3] It is insisted by counsel for plaintiff in error that no importance should be attached to the correspondence between Hornung and his attorneys and Syer & Co. with respect to this draft after Syer & Co. had refused payment, upon the ground that before this correspondence took place Hornung had parted with all interest in the draft, the title to which had passed to the Greensburg National Bank, and that Hornung no longer had any interest in or control over it.

The trouble with this objection is that it assumes the truth of the very fact which is the subject of inquiry—the ownership of the draft in question. The introduction of the evidence was not objected to. It would have been proper, if the court had been requested so to do, for it to have stated to the jury that Hornung's admissions or conduct with respect to this draft could not prejudice the Greensburg National Bank after Hornung had parted with his entire interest in it; but no such request was made, and no such limitation imposed, and the jury, under the circumstances, might very well have thought that Hornung would not have authorized Syer & Co. to reduce the draft by the amount of the depreciation unless he had some control over the subject.

[4] Looking to the whole case as it was presented to the jury, the custom among bankers, the relation of Hornung to the Greensburg National Bank as a depositor of many years standing, that the draft was not discounted, that the whole amount thereof was placed to Hornung's credit, that it was deposited as paper and not as cash, that it was treated and dealt with by Hornung and his attorneys as his property in their correspondence with Syer & Co., and that protest was waived, it presents a case in which this court cannot say that the verdict of the jury, rendered upon proper instructions and approved by the trial court, was without evidence to sustain it, and therefore the judgment complained of is affirmed.

BUTLER BROS.-HOFF CO., Inc., v. VIRGINIAN RY. CO., Inc.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1912.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 170*)—CONSTRUCTION BY PARTIES.

In construing a contract, the court may look to the construction which the parties themselves have placed upon it in its execution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 753; Dec. Dig. § 170.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 170*)—CONSTRUCTION—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT BY PARTIES—ACQUIESCENCE.

A railroad construction contract provided compensation ranging from 27 cents per cubic yard for "earth," to $3 per cubic yard for "excavation in water," which the contract defined as foundation pits under water and the deepening of channels in running water. The railroad's engineer, on whose estimates and certificates of the work done the contractor was paid, at no time during the work classified any of it as excavation in water, nor the contractor ever claimed that any part of this work should be so classified, but during the work he concluded that it was excavation in water and intended upon completion to assert a claim for compensation on that classification, although no notice of this determination was given to the railway. Held, in the contractor's action for such further compensation, that the meaning of the term as used in the contract was doubtful, and the court would resort to the construction given to the contract by the parties, but that the contractor's undisclosed conclusion would not be considered, and that, as the contractor by his acquiescence had placed the same construction on the contract as the railway's engineer, that construction would prevail, so that there could be no recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 753; Dec. Dig. § 170.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1099*)—REVIEW—FINDINGS—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

When the evidence in a contractor's action against a railroad for extra labor and materials rendered necessary in repairing a trestle, which fell because of defective plans furnished by the railroad, was conflicting and the contractor had the burden of proof, the Supreme Court of Appeals could not say that the trial court's refusal to allow therefor was error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3970-3978; Dec. Dig. § 1099.*]

4. INTEREST (§ 50*)—COMPUTATION AND TIME—SUSPENSION BY TENDER.

Where plaintiff obtained a decree for money with interest from the date when it was due, payable on the execution of a release from him, and defendant was willing to pay to the plaintiff the amount decreed on plaintiff's execution of the release, and moved to be released from payment of interest thereafter, without prejudice to his right to assign cross-errors on appeal, but did not actually tender the amount of the decree either to the plaintiff or to the court, and the plaintiff did not waive an actual tender, the motion was properly overruled, since upon payment into court the court could have protected defendant by ordering the execution of the release.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. § 114; Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

5. DAMAGES (§ 68*)—INTEREST—DELAY IN ISSUING CERTIFICATE.

Where a contract for railroad construction provided that, upon the completion and acceptance of the work, the railroad's engineer should issue a certificate of acceptance, upon which the entire balance due the contractor should be due within 20 days, and the engineer was notified of the completion and requested to issue the certificate, but delayed until nearly two months after the completion, the contractor, to whom a large sum was due, was entitled to interest thereon from the completion of the contract.

Appeal from Circuit Court of Campbell County.

Bill by the Butler Bros.-Hoff Company, Incorporated, against the Virginian Railway Company, Incorporated. From the decree, complainant appeals. Affirmed.

Braxton & Eggleston and J. T. Coleman, for appellant. H. T. Hall, E. W. Knight, and A. A. Phlegar, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. The principal controversy in this case is as to the amount of compensation which the appellant is entitled to receive for making a cut in the construction of the appellee's line of road, under a contract entered into between the appellant contractor and the railway company on the 9th of December, 1905, for the construction of about 6½ miles of the latter's roadbed. Upon that section of the road there is a cut known as "Terryville Cut." It is about 3,000 feet long and some 80 feet deep at its summit. There is no very material difference between the parties as to the number of yards of earth and stone removed in making the cut, but the principal controversy is over the classification of the material removed.

The contract or agreement between the parties is long, covering more than 20 pages of the printed record, and containing 34 sections.

Section 23 provides what compensation the contractor is to receive for its work, and, so far as is material to the work in the cut, is as follows:

"The contractor agrees to receive as full compensation for all material used and labor performed in the work and for completing the same in all respects according to the aforesaid mentioned plans and specifications and the requirements of the chief engineer under them, the prices enumerated below.

| | |
|---|-------------|
| "Classified Excavation. | |
| Earth per cu. yard..... | .27 (cents) |
| Loose rock per cu. yard..... | .40 (cents) |
| Solid rock per cu. yard..... | .85 (cents) |
| Excavation in water, per cu. yard | $.3.00" |

In the general specifications for grading and masonry, which are expressly made a part of the agreement between the parties, all "excavation" is designated as "classified" or "unclassified," and what is meant by the terms "earth," "loose rock," "solid rock," and "excavation in water" is defined or divided as follows:

"(a) Earth includes clay, sand, gravel, loam, decomposed rock and slate, stones and boulders containing less than one (1) cubic foot, and all other materials, excepting those described below.

"(b) Loose Rock.—Includes all boulders and detached masses of rock measuring over one (1) cubic foot in bulk and less than one (1) cubic yard; also all slate, shale, soft friable sandstone and soapstone, and other rock, which in the judgment of the engineer, may be removed without continuous blasting, although blasting may occasionally be resorted to.

"(c) Solid rock will include all rock found in ledges, or masses of more than one (1) cubic yard which, in the judgment of the engineer, can only be removed by blasting. In rock excavations the 'bottom' must in all cases be taken down truly to subgrade; and, when so ordered by the engineer, ditches must be formed at foot of slopes.

"(d) Excavation in water will apply to foundation pits under water, which, through no fault of the contractor, cannot, in the opinion of the engineer, be ditched or drained, but require pumping, and the deepening of channels in running water; it must cover all classes of material and must include drainage, bailing, pumping and all materials and labor connected with such excavations; also the necessary benching and dressing of rock in foundations.

"Unclassified excavation includes all classes of material of every nature whatsoever, with the sole exception of 'excavation in water,' as described above."

The contention of the appellant is that the excavation in Terryville Cut, or a large portion of it, was "excavation in water," as defined in the contract, and that it was entitled to pay therefor as such. The railway company insists that under the contract the work in Terryville Cut was not, nor was any part of it, "excavation in water" under the contract, and that, if it were, the appellant has waived, and is estopped from setting up, such claim.

The first question, therefore, to be considered is, What is meant by "excavation in water," as used in the agreement and as defined in the specifications for grading?

The term "excavation in water," as is clear from the language quoted above, does not apply to all excavation in water, but only to two kinds, viz.: First, "to foundation pits under water," under certain circumstances; and, second, to "the deepening of channels in running water." It is not claimed by the appellant that its work in the cut was work in a foundation pit, but its contention is that it was work done in deepening a channel in running water.

That term, or the words thereof, if used in their primary or ordinary and popular sense, refer, as it seems to us, to work in making deeper the bed of a running stream, such as a creek or river, rather than to work in water in the construction of a railroad cut which collects therein from seepage, wet weather springs, or otherwise, during the progress of the work in opening or making the cut. At least it is not clear that the term was intended to include the latter kind of work. There is nothing in the agreement to show that the term or words were used in any other than in their ordinary and popular sense. This being so, viewing the language used in the most favorable light that it can be considered for the appellant, the most that can be said is that the meaning of the term is not clear, but doubtful.

[1] In construing a contract where there is a doubt as to its proper meaning, the court may look to the construction which the parties themselves have placed upon it in its execution, in order to ascertain its meaning.

[2] It appears that the work on the cut was commenced in April, 1906, and was completed in September, 1907. At no time during that whole period was the work done in the cut, or any part of it, treated or classified as "excavation in water" by the railway company or its engineers; nor was any claim made by the appellant to the railway company during that period that any part of the work in the cut was "excavation in water," or that there was any error or mistake made in the monthly estimates (some seventeen or eighteen in number) in not so classifying any part of the work done in the cut.

By section 80 of the agreement between the parties it is provided: "So long as the work herein contracted for is prosecuted agreeably to the provisions of this contract, and with such progress as may be satisfactory to the chief engineer, the said chief engineer will, on or about the first day of every month, make an approximate estimate of the proportionate value of the work done thereon and of acceptable material furnished and delivered upon the company's property at the site of the work, up to and inclusive of the last day of the previous month, based upon the price or prices hereinbefore specified; and the amount of said estimate certified to as being correct and in accordance with the terms of this contract after deducting ten (10) per cent. and all previous payments, shall be due and payable to the contractor at the office of the treasurer of the company, on or about the 20th day of the current month."

These estimates, as will be observed from the language of the section, were to be based upon the price or prices to be paid according to the provisions of the contract. It was a matter of the greatest consequence to both parties that the work should be properly classified in the monthly estimates, since they were the basis upon which payments were to be and were made from month to month, and it was to the interest of both parties that errors, if any, in classification, should be promptly corrected, as the prices for the different kinds of excavation varied from 27 cents per cubic yard for "earth," to $3 per cubic yard for "excavation in water," and because of the difficulties that would arise in making corrections after conditions in the cut had changed. The importance of correcting errors, whether in monthly statements or in other statements which the railway company directed its division engineers to furnish from time to time to contractors as to the work done by them, was fully recognized by the appellant, for in one of its letters written in March, 1906, in acknowledging the receipt of a circular requiring statements to be made by the division engineers, it says: "As a matter of equity, of course, we feel that we should be advised what the engineers allow us, so that we may take exception to same if we find they are incorrect at the time and the whole matter is fresh in everybody's mind." In June, 1906, the appellant wrote to the chief engineer of the company that "We desire to call your attention to the matter of wet excavation in Block D-2 of the Tidewater Ry. (now the Virginian Railway) for which we have the contract. We have not been allowed the proper amount of wet excavation. Especially would we call your attention to culvert located at station 1507x. The engineers' estimate is 60 yards; our estimate is 273 yards. The discrepancy you will notice is quite glaring."

On several other occasions during the progress of the work on the cut the appellant called the attention of the railway company or its engineers to errors as to the amount of wet excavation allowed on other parts of its work. In April, 1907, when the work in the cut was far on its way to completion, and long after the conditions had arisen which entitled the appellant, as it claims now, to have the work in the cut classified as wet excavation, it wrote that "our estimates have not for months furnished money enough to meet even the pay roll—to say nothing of supplies and materials. The cause lies largely in classification. In 'Terryville Cut' the rock we could see and bid on is called largely loose rock. The average of extreme hard and extreme soft would produce a hard rock. We hope you will rectify this in this month's estimate." In other parts of the letter complaint is made that wet excavation at other places of its work was not fully estimated. While the appellant complains that the rock in the cut is being classified as "loose rock" when it should be classified as solid, there is no suggestion that there is any error in failing to classify any of the work done as "excavation in water."

It clearly appears from the record that the railway company always placed the same construction upon the contract as to what was meant by wet excavation, and that the appellant, by its acts and conduct, placed the same construction upon it during the whole time the work in the cut was being done, and that it never in its dealings with the railway company suggested even, much less claimed, the construction it now contends for until some time after the work was completed and after a final estimate was asked for.

But the appellant insists, notwithstanding its acts and conduct in placing the same construction upon the contract as did the railway company, that during the progress of the work it came to the conclusion on account of the gradual development of the water difficulties in the cut that the work therein, at least after that time, was excavation in water, and that it intended, as it believed it had the right to do, upon the completion of the work, to insist upon compensation for it as excavation in water.

The record shows that during the progress of the work the question of what was its proper classification was considered by the officials of the appellant company and its subcontractors, and the conclusion reached that the work in the cut was excavation in water; but it further appears that no notice of this conclusion, nor of the appellant's determination to assert a claim for a different classification when the work was completed, was given the railway company. On the contrary, the appellant deliberately determined not to give the railway company any notice of such conclusion and intention, but to postpone making any objection to such classification until after the work in the cut was completed, for fear, as it claimed, that, if it did so, the railway company might take the work away from the appellant under certain provisions of the contract, and have it done at prices that would be hurtful to the appellant. In other words, the appellant determined not to make objection to the classification of the work in the cut when in justice and fair dealing it ought to have done so, but to postpone the claim for a different classification until the work had been completed, when it would be too late for the railway company to exercise those rights under the contract which the appellant feared it might exercise if it (the appellant) made known its claim for a different classification earlier.

Whatever may have been the construction placed upon the contract by the appellant in secret and unknown to the railway company, it cannot be considered in determining either the practical construction placed upon it by the parties or the acquiescence of the appellant in the construction placed upon it by the railway company. N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Mills, 91 Va. 632, 22 S. E. 556. It is clear, therefore, that during the entire time the work in the cut was being done, the appellant, by its acts and conduct, placed the same construction upon the contract as to the matter now under consideration as did the railway company.

In Kidwell v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 52 Va. 676, it was held that a railroad contractor for the construction of a bridge, having received the monthly estimates based upon a particular construction of the contracts without objection during the progress of the work, was held to have acquiesced in that construction. In that case, Judge Moncure, speaking for the court, after stating the facts and circumstances showing the conduct of the parties during the progress of the work (and which were at least as favorable to the contractor's contention in that case as are the facts and circumstances of this case to the appellant's contention), said: "Under all these circumstances, I am of opinion that, whatever may be the true construction of the contracts, the appellant acquiesced in the construction placed upon them by the appellees, and is concluded by such acquiescence from claiming a higher compensation for the masonry than the prices stipulated for in the contracts and allowed in the final estimates."

In Knopf v. R. F. & P. R. R. Co., 85 Va. 769, 8 S. E. 787, it was held that the practical construction put by the parties upon the terms of their own contract was not only to be regarded, but, where there is any doubt, it must prevail, even over the literal meaning of the contract; citing among other authorities District of Columbia v. Gallaher, 124 U. S. 505, 510, 8 Sup. Ct. 585, 588 (31 L. Ed. 526), in which it was held "that the practical construction which the parties put upon the terms of their contract, and according to which the work was done, must prevail over the literal meaning of the contract according to which the defendant seeks to obtain a deduction in the contract price."

In Knick v. Knick, 75 Va. 12, 20, it was said by Judge Burks that, "when the meaning of an instrument is clear, an erroneous construction of it by the parties to it will not control its effect; yet, where there is doubt as to the proper meaning of it, the construction which the parties have put upon it is said to be entitled to great consideration. Bank of Old Dominion v. McVeigh, 73 Va. 530, 541, citing Railroad Co. v. Trimble, 10 Wall. 367, 377 [19 L. Ed. 948]."

In Trigg Co. v. Bucyrus Co., 104 Va. 79, 86, 51 S. E. 174, 176, it was said: "If the terms of the contract were ambiguous and its proper construction doubtful, it could be subjected to another test which is always entitled to great weight under such circumstances; and that is the construction which the parties have, by their acts, placed upon it."

The president of the court, in delivering its opinion in Northrop & Wickham v. Richmond, 105 Va. 335, 339, 53 S. E. 962, 963, said: "It is the duty of courts to get at the true intent of the parties to the contract, and it is a recognized and accepted canon that, where the construction is doubtful, it is proper to look to the construction which the parties themselves have placed upon the contract. What more natural, indeed, than that the courts, in order to ascertain the intention of the parties, should seek for light in the construction which the parties themselves have placed upon the language which they have seen fit to employ." In that case it was held that where the proper construction of the language of a contract is doubtful, and the parties themselves have in practice adopted a particular construction, the courts will adopt that construction.

We are of opinion that the practical construction placed upon the terms of the contract as to the classification of the work in the cut during the entire period in which the work was being done should prevail over the construction now insisted on by the appellant by which it seeks to obtain a new classification and a largely increased compensation for its work.

The action of the trial court in not allowing the appellant compensation for two items, aggregating $572.42, for extra material and labor on Turnip creek trestle, is assigned as error. The contention of the appellant is that these two items of extra labor and material were rendered necessary by the defective plans of the railway company's engineers, in consequence of which the work, built in accordance with those plans, gave way, and had to be strengthened by the additional work and material for which these items were charged.

The railway company denies its liability upon two grounds: One, that the cause of the trestle's giving way was the improper use made of it by the contractor after it was constructed; and the other, that under section 18 of the contract the contractor assumed all loss resulting from the giving way of the trestle during the progress of the work.

Whether or not this latter contention be well founded need not be considered; for, if the appellant was not under the contract bound to bear the loss complained of, it does not satisfactorily appear that the trestle gave way on account of any defect in the plans furnished by the railway company.

[3] The evidence is conflicting as to whether the trestle gave way because constructed in accordance with defective plans furnished by the railway company's engineers, or from the improper use made of the trestle by the appellant after it was constructed. As the burden was upon the appellant to show that it was entitled to the items claimed, we cannot say that the trial court plainly erred in refusing to allow them as proper charges against the railway company.

Another error assigned is to the action of the circuit court in not allowing an item of some $15,000, the difference in the value of the work done upon the whole of the appellant's section of road, as estimated by its supervising engineer (excluding wet excavation in Terryville Cut), and the value of the whole work as shown by the final estimate of the chief engineer of the railway company. These different results as to the value of the work done seem to have followed largely from the difference in the data upon which they respectively based their calculations. It could serve no good purpose to discuss in detail the methods of measurement relied on by each as furnishing the correct data. It will be sufficient to say that, while there is a conflict in the evidence as to the correctness of the data used by each, the weight of evidence is clearly in favor of that upon which the chief engineer based his calculations and made his final estimate, an estimate the correctness of which upon the data used by him is clearly established.

We are of opinion that independent of any question as to the conclusiveness of the final estimate of the chief engineer under the provisions of the contract, the final estimate by him is fully sustained by the evidence, and that the trial court did not err in not allowing the item in question.

[4] The railway company assigns as cross-error the action of the circuit court in allowing interest from the 20th of October, 1907, on the amount adjudged to be due the appellant and decreed in its favor.

By section 31 of the contract it is provided, among other things, that upon the final completion and acceptance of the work to be done the chief engineer of the railway company shall issue a certificate over his signature that the whole work provided for in the contract has been completed and has been accepted by him under the provisions of the contract, whereupon the entire balance found to be due the contractor shall be payable within 20 days after the date of said final certificate, provided, however, that, if the railway company should require it before making payment of said final balance, the contractor shall execute a release to the railway company from all claims or demands whatsoever growing out of the contract.

The court by its decree of the January term, 1910, ascertaining the amount due the contractor from the Railway Company, provided that such sum should bear interest from the 20th day of October, 1907, until paid, and that principal and interest should be paid in 20 days from the date of the decree upon the delivery of the release required to the railway company by the contractor. The contractor having failed to deliver the release required, the following proceedings were had at the May term following:

"The parties consent that the motions hereinafter mentioned may be heard and determined by the judge of this court in vacation, to the same effect as if they had been made and passed upon at the last regular term of this court.

"And thereupon the defendant submitted a motion in writing (which is now filed) that the court so amend the decree entered in this cause at January term, 1910, as to provide that the amount decreed in favor of the plaintiff shall not bear interest from the date of entry of the said decree until the plaintiff files with the papers in this cause the release required by the said decree to be delivered by the said plaintiff to the defendant, and that, upon the filing of such release, the amount so decreed in favor of the plaintiff shall bear interest as provided in said decree until the defendant pays the amount of said decree to the plaintiff, which motion the court doth overrule.

"And thereupon the defendant's counsel, stating in open court that the defendant was willing to pay to the plaintiff the amount decreed in its favor by the decree of January term, 1910, with interest thereon to this date upon the execution by the plaintiff of the release provided for by the said decree, but the said offer to be without prejudice to the defendant's right to assign cross-error in case an appeal is taken from the said decree by the plaintiff, and thereupon moved the court to release it, the said defendant from the payment of any interest that may accrue after this date on the amount decreed to the plaintiff by the said decree of January term, 1910, until the said release is executed and filed with the papers in this cause, and the court having considered said motion, and the defendant's counsel stating that he does not now actually tender the amount of the said decree either to the plaintiff or to the court, and the plaintiff not waiving actual tender, the court doth overrule the defendant's second motion."

We see no error in the action of the court in overruling either of these motions. If the railway company wished to stop the running of interest on the sum decreed against it, it could have paid the money into court, and the court would have required the release to be executed by the contractor before it could receive the money, and thus have fully protected the railway company.

[6] Nor do we think that the court erred in its original decree providing for interest on the sum decreed before the chief engineer had issued his certificate that the work had been completed and accepted. The work was completed on the 27th of September, 1907. The railway company was at once notified of that fact, and afterwards urgently requested to issue the required certificate; but it was not issued until the 23d of December, 1907. The delay in issuing the final certificate is not satisfactorily explained or accounted for. A large sum was admittedly due the contractor, and it ought not to be made to bear the loss resulting from the unreasonable delay of the chief engineer in issuing the certificate required.

Upon the whole case, the court is of opinion that the decrees complained of should be affirmed.

Affirmed.

POCAHONTAS CONSOL. COLLIERIES CO.,
Inc., v. COMMONWEALTH et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1912.)

1. LICENSES (§ 1*)—RECORDATION OF CONVEYANCES—TAXATION.

A tax on the recordation of a deed of trust is a tax on the privilege of taking, on the terms prescribed by statute, the benefits of the registration laws, and not a tax on property, which is measured in its assessment and collection in the mode prescribed by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

2. LICENSES (§ 7*)—PRIVILEGE TAX.

A tax on a civil privilege is fixed as to amount by the classification of the persons or subjects required to pay the tax, and the Legislature may impose such a tax and fix the amount thereof and classify the subjects on which the tax is imposed so long as the classification is reasonable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-15; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

3. LICENSES (§ 7*)—PROPERTY TAX—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS—"TAX."

Const. 1902, art. 168 (Code 1904, p. cclxii), providing that taxes on property shall be uniform on the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the territory levying the tax, applies only to a direct tax on property, and not to license taxes which do not admit of a tax strictly equal and uniform.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-15; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 6867-6888, 7813.]

4. LICENSES (§ 7*)—PRIVILEGE TAXES—STATUTES—CLASSIFICATION.

A statute, imposing a tax on the recordation of deeds of trust, assessed and paid on the amount secured thereby, and providing that on deeds of trust on the works of a railroad or other internal improvement company, partly within and partly outside the state, the tax shall be on such part of the consideration as the number of miles of line of the company in the state bears to the whole number of miles of the line of the company conveyed by the deed, places internal improvement companies, whose lines are partly within and partly without the state, in one class, and places all other grantors in trust deeds in another class, and the classification is reasonable, and, where the tax is uniform on the same class, the statute is valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-15; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

5. LICENSES (§ 29*)—PRIVILEGE TAXES—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Under a statute imposing a tax on the recordation of deeds of trust to be assessed and based on the amount of bonds secured thereby, the tax on a deed of trust executed by a mining corporation on property partly within and partly outside the state to secure bonds is properly assessed on the full amount of the bonds secured without deduction for the property outside of the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. § 63; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

6. LICENSES (§ 29*)—PRIVILEGE TAXES—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Under the statute imposing a tax on the recording of deeds of trust based on the amount secured thereby, a tax on a deed of trust to secure bonds is properly assessed on the full amount of the bonds to be issued, and is not required to be limited to the amount of the bonds actually issued and negotiated at the time of the recordation of the deed.

Appeal from Circuit Court of City of Richmond.

Action by the Pocahontas Consolidated Collieries Company, Incorporated, against the Commonwealth and another for the refunding of a part of a tax paid under protest. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry & Graham, for appellant. The Attorney General, for appellees.

CARDWELL, J. The Pocahontas Consolidated Collieries Company, Incorporated, filed its petition in the circuit court of the city of Richmond, to have refunded to it $13,295.64, being a part of a tax of $20,000 which the petitioner claims to have been erroneously demanded by, and which it paid to, the clerk of the circuit court of Tazewell county involuntarily and under protest.

The facts are as follows: The Pocahontas Collieries Company and the Pocahontas Collieries Co., Incorporated, corporations under the laws of the state of Virginia, on the 10th day of June, 1907, by joint agreement between the said companies, became merged and consolidated into one company under the name of the Pocahontas Consolidated Collieries Company, Incorporated. By the terms of the merger agreement, all of the property of both companies was conveyed to and vested in the new company, and it was therein provided that the new company should create a mortgage upon all of its real estate, including mineral and mining rights, etc., to secure an issue of $20,000,000 of 5 per cent. gold bonds, of convenient denominations, payable in 40 to 50 years from July 1, 1907, and redeemable at the option of the corporation, in whole or in part, at 105 per cent. and accrued interest, on any interest day, upon the call of the trustee named in the mortgage.

Pursuant to said agreement of merger, the consolidated company executed a mortgage or deed of trust, bearing date the 1st day of July, 1907, conveying all of its property, rights, etc., to the New York Trust Company, as trustee, to secure the payment of an issue of bonds to the aggregate amount of $20,000,000; the form of bond to be executed and issued under the deed being set out in the deed itself, and containing the declaration: "This bond is one of a series of bonds amounting in the aggregate of their principal to twenty million dollars ($20,000,000), or 4,109,729 pounds sterling, 15 shillings, 8½ pence, or 103,626,943 francs, or 84,033.45 marks, all of which bonds are issued and to be issued under and equally secured by a deed of trust, dated the first day of July, 1907, duly executed by the company to the New York Trust Company, as trustee, conveying all of its real estate, whether held as leaseholds or in fee, and the improvements and fixtures thereon, including machinery and tools, and said company's franchises, now owned or hereafter acquired, as therein described, to all which provisions of which deed of trust this bond is subject."

The deed of trust expressly provides, also, that all of the bonds therein mentioned are to be secured by the lien thereby created, and conveys the property, "in trust, nevertheless, for the equal pro rata benefit and security of all and every the persons, firms and corporations who may be or become the holders of the said bonds issued or to be issued and secured by and under this deed of trust, without preference, priority or distinction as to lien or otherwise, of any one over another by reason of priority in the time of issuing or negotiating the same, so that each and all of the said bonds issued and to be issued, as aforesaid, shall have the same right, lien and privilege under and by this deed of trust, and shall be equally secured thereby, with like effect as if they had all been made, executed, delivered and negotiated simultaneously on the date of the execution hereof."

Said deed, after being properly executed, was presented to the clerk of the circuit court of Tazewell county for recordation under the registry laws of the state, when the clerk ascertained and fixed the tax thereon at the sum of $20,000, that being the amount prescribed by the statute on the full amount of $20,000,000 face value of the bonds issued or to be issued under and secured by the deed. Objection was made to the amount of the tax so ascertained and fixed, and the parties in interest communicated both with the auditor of public accounts and the Attorney General of the state, as to the correctness of the tax required by the clerk, and upon being informed by these state officers that the ruling of the clerk as to the amount of the tax was correct, they afterwards, on the 9th of September, 1907, delivered the deed to the clerk for recordation and paid to him the said amount of $20,000, which the clerk paid into the treasury of the state in the mode prescribed by law. Upon the payments of the amount of the tax to the clerk, the grantor took from him a receipt setting forth at much length the grounds of protest against being required to pay the said amount of tax. Subsequently demand was made upon the auditor of public accounts for the refunding to the grantor in said deed of trust the sum of $13,295.64, a portion of the $20,000 tax paid into the treasury through the clerk, and the right to have the amount demanded refunded being denied by the auditor, this proceeding was instituted under the provisions of section 765 of the Code of 1904.

Upon the hearing of the cause upon the petition and exhibits therewith filed, the demurrer and answer of the auditor thereto, etc., the circuit court entered the order from which this appeal is taken, denying the prayer of the petition and dismissing the same.

We do not deem it necessary to decide whether or not the tax in question was in contemplation of law voluntarily paid by the appellant, or under protest, for if the tax, as held by the circuit court, was legally assessed and demanded, appellant is not entitled to have it or any part therefore refunded.

Nor do we understand appellant as contending that the state was without power or authority to impose a tax upon the recordation or registry in the several clerk's offices in the state of deeds of trust or other instruments securing the payment of money, and to fix the amount of the tax and how and when to be paid, but that its contention is: (1) That in requiring the payment of a tax upon a deed of trust securing bonds issued or to be issued under it, based upon the amount of the entire issue of bonds secured by the deed, instead of upon the amount of the issue of bonds presently to be made, section 168 of the Constitution of the state has been violated; and (2) that inasmuch as about two-thirds of the property of appellant conveyed in its deed of trust is located in West Virginia, and only about one-third in this state, to impose a tax fixed upon the entire issue of bonds secured by the deed, presently and thereafter to be issued, amounts pro tanto to a tax upon that part of the property conveyed which lies outside of this state and violates both section 168 of our Constitution (Code 1904, p. cclxii) and the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

[1] In the first place, this is not a tax upon property either within or out of the state, but a tax upon a civil privilege; that is, for the privilege of availing, upon the terms prescribed by statute, of the benefits and advantages of the registration laws of the state. Therefore the numerous authorities cited and ably presented and argued by the learned counsel for appellant in support of the contention, that the assessment and collection of the tax in question violated the said provision of the Constitution of the United States, have no sort of bearing upon the issue in this case.

While we have no decision by this court directly holding that a tax on the recordation of a deed is not a tax on property, in an analogous case (Byre v. Jacobs, Sheriff, 55 Va. 422, 73 Am. Dec. 367), the court held that a collateral inheritance tax upon the succession or transmission of property is a tax upon a civil right or privilege, and not a tax on property.

Whether the tax on the recordation of a deed conveying property to the United States was a tax on property that could not be enforced against the United States, or a tax upon a mere civil right which could be so enforced, was a question presented to Hon. A. H. Garland, the then Attorney General of the United States, in October, 1887, and he advised that the tax was not upon property, but upon a civil right, and directed the payment of the tax. Opinions of Attorney General of U. S., vol. 18, p. 491.

The foregoing are all the authorities to which we have been cited, or that we have been able to find, having any bearing upon the question which we are now considering, and doubtless the dearth of authority, especially in this state, is due to the fact that the contentions of appellant with respect to this question have never before been seriously urged upon the court.

[2] A tax on property is measured in its assessment and collection in the mode prescribed by statute, while a tax upon a license or civil privilege is imposed and fixed, as to amount, by classification of the persons or subjects required to pay the tax; and the powers of the Legislature to impose the latter tax, to fix the amount thereof, and to classify the subjects upon which the tax is imposed, are well-nigh unlimited, so long as the classification is reasonable.

"The power of the state to distinguish, select, and classify objects of taxation has a wide range of discretion. Classification must be reasonable, but there is no precise application of the rule of reasonableness, and there cannot be an exact exclusion or inclusion of persons and things." 1 Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) p. 79, and note.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Nicol v. Ames, 173 U. S. 509, 19 Sup. Ct. 522 (43 L. Ed. 786-794), said: "The question always is, when a classification is made, whether there is any reasonable ground for it, or whether it is only and simply arbitrary, based upon no real distinction and entirely unnatural. * * * If the classification be proper and legal, then there is the requisite uniformity in that respect."

[3] The constitutional provision in this state relative to taxation is as follows:

"Sec. 168. All property, except as herein after provided, shall be taxed; all taxes, whether state, local or municipal, shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and shall be levied and collected under general laws."

This court held, in Bradley v. Richmond, 110 Va. 521, 66 S. E. 872, that the foregoing provisions in the Constitution requiring equality and uniformity of taxation apply only to a direct tax on property, and not to license taxes, which do not admit of a tax strictly equal and uniform; and very clearly the privilege of recording deeds, wills, and other written instruments, and thereby securing the benefits and advantages of the registration laws of the state, like the privilege of conducting a business, is necessarily to be considered a proper subject of taxation with the only constitutional limitation upon the power of the Legislature to impose the tax that it shall be uniform upon the subjects of each class. Slaughter v. Com., 54 Va. 774; Eyre v. Jacobs, supra; Miller v. Com., 68 Va. 110.

[4] The statute under which the tax complained of in this case was demanded and paid, so far as applicable, is as follows: "And on deeds of trust or mortgages, the tax shall be assessed and paid upon the amount of bonds or other obligations secured thereby." And provided further that "on deeds of trust or mortgages upon the works and property of a railroad or other internal improvement company, lying partly in this state and partly in another state, the tax shall be upon such proportion of the consideration as the number of miles of the line of such company in this bears to the whole number of miles of the line of such company conveyed by such deed."

Here we have a classification made which puts internal improvement companies whose line is partly in Virginia and partly in some other state in one class, and all other grantors in trust deeds or mortgages in the other class. The rate of taxation is the same in all cases, and the tax is uniform upon the same class of subjects. That the Legislature intended to make the classification so plainly appearing in the statute is too clear to admit of discussion, and that the classification for the purposes of taxation is valid seems equally as clearly settled by the decisions of this court; in fact, it seems that appellant does not deny the right of the Legislature to make such classification, but denies that the classification has been made. As we have seen, the classification clearly appears upon the face of the statute, supra, and that similar classification of persons and subjects for the purposes of taxation have been held by this court valid and proper. See Bradley v. Richmond, supra; Insurance Co. v. Winchester, 110 Va. 451, 66 S. E. 84; Woodall v. Lynchburg, 100 Va. 318, 40 S. E. 915; Ould v. Richmond, 64 Va. 464, 14 Am. Rep. 139; Eyre v. Jacobs, supra.

[5] The reasonableness of the assignment in the statute of railroads and other internal improvement companies to a special class for the purpose of taxing the recordation of their deeds and mortgages, given as security for the payment of indebtedness, and all other grantors in such conveyances to another class, is made very plainly to appear when we consider along with others the fact that it is made by statute a matter of public record the number of miles of railroad, or of a telephone or telegraph line, and the value of each mile thereof for taxable purposes, lying within this state which is owned by a grantor in a deed of trust or mortgage and conveyed thereby; while there would be no way of ascertaining even approximately the value or location of the property, rights, etc., of a mining corporation such as the appellant company, conveyed by it to secure the payment of its indebtedness.

[6] It is, however, urged upon us by the learned counsel for appellant that only $6,000,000 of the bonds secured by the deed in question were to be presently issued, and the remaining $14,000,000 were only to be issued and negotiated for the purchase of property and certain specified purchases of the company at a future time; and therefore the tax required on the recordation of the deed should have been computed only upon the $6,000,000 of bonds to be immediately issued.

Not only is there no language employed in the statute which could be so construed as to afford a foundation for such a contention, but the deed prescribed the form of the bond to be issued, and it was upon its face to be stated: "This bond is one of a series of bonds amounting in the aggregate of their principal to $20,000,000," etc.; and the conveyance of the property, etc., of the company was expressly in trust "for the equal pro rata benefit and security of all and every the persons, firms and corporations who may be or become holders of the said bonds, issued or to be issued," etc. So that each and every bond in the series aggregating the $20,000,000 was, within the contemplation of the statute secured by the deed; and therefore the tax properly to be assessed and received by the clerk as a condition precedent to the admission of the deed to record was the amount prescribed by the statute upon the aggregate amount of the bonds secured by the deed, to wit, $20,000,000, making the tax thereon $20,000, as the clerk demanded and received.

If the view of the statute taken by appellant be correct, and the clerk had demanded and received a tax measured by the bonds secured but only presently to be issued, and the remaining $14,000,000 secured by the deed or any part thereof were thereafter issued, how and when would the tax on the deed with respect to the bonds issued subsequent to its recordation be collected, and by whom? Certainly there is no provision in the statute for the assessment or collection of such a tax and no hand appointed to receive it, even if a voluntary payment thereof were offered. On the contrary, the statute imposes imperatively upon the clerk to whom the deed is presented for recordation the duty to assess and collect a tax thereon, and as a condition precedent to the admission of the deed to record, fixed only by the amount of bonds or other obligations secured thereby.

We are of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court complained of is right, and it is therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

ADAMS EXPRESS CO. v. SCOTT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1912.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 218*)—CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

A common carrier is not an insurer of animals from injuries arising from their vicious nature and propensities, and which could not have been prevented by the exercise of foresight, vigilance, and care, so that an express company was entitled to limit its liability in that respect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 674-696, 927-949; Dec. Dig. § 218.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 213*)—CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—LIABILITY FOR INJURIES.

No recovery can be had for injury caused by delay in shipment of an animal by an express company, where such delay was caused by the refusal of the owner to accept freight movement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 213.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 215*)—CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—LIABILITY FOR INJURIES.

No recovery can be had for injuries to a horse delivered for shipment, caused by the horse hitting his feet, legs, and body against the sides and back of the stall upon becoming excited and frightened by the usual and ordinary movements and noise of the train.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 215.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 228*)—CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—LIABILITY FOR INJURY.

In an action for injuries to a horse delivered for shipment, evidence held to show that the injury was caused by the inherent vice of the animal, and by the culpable negligence of the agents of the shipper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 228.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Accomack County.

Action by John L. Scott against the Adams Express Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

W. R. Meredith and John S. Parsons, for plaintiff in error. Westcott & Turlington, Mapp & Mapp, and O. F. Mears, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. The plaintiff in error, Adams Express Company, brings this writ of error to review a judgment for $1,213.70, recovered against it by the defendant in error, John L. Scott.

The litigation arose out of a written contract between the company and Daugherty, agent for the plaintiff, for the transportation of a race stallion, Signet Prince, from Tasley, a station on the New York, Philadelphia & Norfolk Railroad, in Accomack county, Va., to Pocomoke City, in the state of Maryland, a distance of 27 miles. Ten race horses and traps were included in the shipment, all of which with the exception of Signet Prince reached their destination in safety.

The contract, among other provisions, stipulated that the company should not be liable for the conduct or acts of the animals to themselves or to each other, "such as biting, kicking, goring or smothering, nor for loss or damage arising from the condition of the animals themselves or which results from their nature or propensities, which risks are assumed by the shipper." The shipper, moreover, released the company from liability "for delay, injuries to or loss of said animals," unless caused by the negligence of its agents or employés. Also, upon the arrival of the animals at destination, the shipper agreed forthwith to receive them, paying the charges due thereon; in default whereof the company, as agent of the shipper, might have the animals put in a suitable place, at his cost and risk. When the animals were accompanied by the owner or an attendant in his employ, as in the instant case, it was his duty to load and unload them at his own risk; the company furnishing necessary laborers to assist in the work, and to take care of them in transit, such caretakers to be transported upon the same car with the animals free of charge.

[1] That it is permissible for an express company to stipulate with the shipper for such limitations upon its liability in a contract for the carriage of live stock is well settled.

In 1 Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 336, distinguishing between the liability of a carrier with respect to the transportation of live animals and ordinary goods, the learned author observes: "The liability of the common carrier of animals, it is said, is essentially different from that of the carrier of merchandise or of inanimate property. While common carriers are insurers of inanimate goods against all loss and damage, except such as is inevitable or caused by public enemies, they are not insurers of animals against injuries arising from their nature and propensities, and which could not be prevented by foresight, vigilance, and care. In the transportation of live stock, in the absence of negligence, the carrier is relieved from responsibility for such injuries as occur from or in consequence of the vitality of the freight. He does not absolutely warrant live freight against the consequences of its vitality. Animals may injure or destroy themselves or each other, they may die from fright or starvation, or they may die from heat or cold. In all cases, therefore, where injuries occur by reason of the inherent vices or natural propensities of the animals themselves, the carrier is relieved from responsibility, if he can show that he has provided all suitable means of transportation, and exercised that degree of care which the nature of the property requires"—citing opinions of Pollock, C. B., and Martin, B., in Pardington v. Railway Co., 1 H. & N. 396;

Erle, J., in McManus v. Railway, 4 H. & N. 347; Parke, B., in Carr v. Railway, 7 Exch. 711.

The rule is thus stated in Boehl v. Railway Co., 44 Minn. 191, 46 N. W. 333: "Carriers of live stock are liable as common carriers for damages or injuries thereto arising during the transportation, except such as, without the fault or negligence of the carrier, result from the vitality of the freight; that is to say, the nature and propensity of animals to injure themselves or each other, their unruliness, fright, viciousness, kicking, or goring, etc. The carrier is relieved from liability from such causes, if he has provided suitable means of transportation, and exercised that degree of care which the nature of the property requires, or has not otherwise contributed to the injury. Of course, the carrier is relieved from special care and oversight of the animals when the owner or agent accompanies them for that purpose." Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Reeves, 97 Va. 288, 33 S. E. 606; N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Sutherland, 105 Va. 545, 54 S. E. 465.

These rules are said to obtain, even where there is no special contract limiting the carrier's liability in respect to injuries resulting to animals from such causes.

Bearing in mind, then, these fundamental principles, let us briefly consider the alleged grounds of negligence and the evidence relied on to sustain the recovery.

[2] First. It is alleged that the injuries sustained by Signet Prince were due to unnecessary delay in transportation. There is no evidence whatever to connect the animal's injuries with the alleged delay. Besides, it plainly appears that the delay was due to the refusal of Daugherty to accept freight movement. When told that his car load of horses would be attached to an extra freight, used in transporting other horses, which was to leave about 10 o'clock a. m., he refused to allow his horses to be carried by that train, and demanded express shipment. Accordingly, in deference to his wishes, his car was taken up by the first express train that passed Tasley, and left that station about noon.

[3] Second. It is said that during the delay at Tasley the company suffered the car "to be switched around, backward and forward, on the railroad track and switches, and jarred, jerked, and kicked up to and against other cars"; and, consequently, the horse became greatly excited and frightened, and hit his feet, legs, and body against the sides and back of the stall, and against a radiator installed therein, and was injured, etc.

It was shown that the movements of the car at Tasley, complained of in this specification, were all necessary movements in the ordinary course of railroading.

Third. This allegation of negligence is germane to the second, namely, that the horse was frightened and injured by the puffing of smoke and noise from passing engines. These acts were done, not wantonly, but in the customary manner, and were unavoidable in the operation of trains.

Fourth, and lastly, it is charged that the company negligently failed to provide and maintain a safe car, stall, and appliances for the shipment of the animal. Under this specification, it is also alleged that the company negligently suffered a radiator to be in the stall in which Signet Prince was placed, which was uncovered, and against which he hit his feet and legs, and injured himself.

The car in question was a Pennsylvania express car, in which Daugherty had shipped a load of horses from Cape Charles to Tasley a few days previously. The car had, at that time, been stalled in accordance with his wishes, and at his special request was again furnished to him by the company for the shipment to Pocomoke City.

As observed, the shipment consisted of 10 horses, and they were accompanied by 9 attendants. The car contained 14 stalls. The agreement required the shipper to load and unload the stock, the company furnishing necessary assistance, and Signet Prince was either the first or second horse loaded, so that there were 12 or 13 stalls besides the one containing the radiator, in any one of which he might have been safely bestowed. It was also shown that a radiator is a permanent fixture and necessary part of the outfit of a car used in shipping high-grade horses in cold weather. But in this instance the shipper could have obviated all risk of injury to the animal from that source simply by placing him in, or removing him to, another stall (and three vacant stalls still remained after accommodating all the other horses), or by covering the radiator with a horse blanket. Signet Prince was, however, made fast in the stall with the radiator by ropes on either side of his head, tied to an iron bar above, extending across the car. He became frightened, presumably from passing engines, before the car left Tasley, and in his efforts to escape sustained some injury by kicking and plunging. He kicked down a mail box from the side of the car, and broke from their fastenings several half-inch iron bars that protected the car window. His fright continued, and before the train reached its destination (just how long before does not appear) he forced the radiator from the side of the car, and broke the regulator wheel from the valve, leaving exposed a half-inch copper tube of considerable length, and was finally discovered astride of the radiator, with the valve tube embedded in the inner side of his left thigh. The injuries thus inflicted were of a serious and permanent character. The attendants made no effort to release the animal from his perilous position, and the shipper refused to unload or receive him at Pocomoke City. The company thereupon placed him in the care of a suitable person, where he remained from August 8 to November 18, 1908, when he was delivered to the plaintiff, on payment of charges for his care and keep.

There was also an effort to prove that the company negligently refused to unload the horse at Tasley and other stations after his car fright became manifest, or to side-track the car at Parksley; but the evidence on that subject was wholly unsatisfactory and insufficient. Indeed, Daugherty, the shipper and agent of the owner, seemed possessed of the erroneous idea that he was under no obligation whatever to care for the safety of the horse, but could stand idly by and suffer the animal to destroy himself, and hold the express company liable for the loss.

[4] There are a number of other assignments of error in the petition for a writ of error, but the court is of opinion that the failure of the shipper to make out a case of actionable negligence against the express company is controlling; and it is therefore unnecessary to notice subordinate assignments. The injury to Signet Prince was due to no fault of the defendant, but was traceable rather to the inherent vice or propensity of the animal itself, coupled with the culpable negligence of the agents of the shipper to whom its safety had been confided.

For these reasons, the judgment must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial.

Reversed.

Where a commissioner who judicially sold land has died since the sale, and the amount of land sold has come into controversy, complainant's agent who conducted the negotiation with the commissioner is competent as a witness.

6. WITNESSES (§ 140*)—COMPETENCY—INTEREST OF PARTIES.

One who is not a party, and has no present interest in a suit, is competent to testify, even though he was once interested in the land which is the subject-matter of the litigation.

7. JUDGMENT (§ 324*)—SETTING ASIDE—MISTAKE.

In an action to correct a mistake in a decree which misdescribed land judicially sold, evidence held to show the mistake, and that there has been no such delay in discovering it, and bringing suit to remedy as to bar complainant.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Amelia County.

Bill by George C. Jefferson and others against D. Gregory and another. From a decree dismissing the bill, complainants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

McGuire, Riely & Bryan and J. G. Jefferson, Jr., for appellants. R. G. Southall, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. This is an appeal from a decree dismissing a bill filed by the appellants in the circuit court of Amelia county to correct a mistake in a deed and a plat as to the dimensions of a small parcel of land or town lot lying in Amelia county sold under decrees entered in the consolidated causes of the Union Bank of Richmond, etc., against John B. Harvie, and the same plaintiff against Lewis E. Harvie, etc., pending in the chancery court of the city of Richmond, to restrain the appellees from interfering with the appellants' possession of the said lot, and to quiet their title.

[1] The circuit court dismissed the bill upon the ground, as stated in its decree, that the appellants had failed to establish the case alleged. But if the action of the court can be sustained upon that or either of the other grounds relied on by the appellees, viz., that the court was without jurisdiction, or that the bill did not state a case entitling the appellants to the relief sought, the decree appealed from must be affirmed.

[2] Upon the case made, the circuit court had jurisdiction. The land as to which the alleged mistake was made lies in Amelia county, and the appellees are residents thereof. It appears that at the time (1908) the alleged mistake was discovered the consolidated causes in which the sale of the land was made had been stricken from the docket, and that it was then too late to apply for relief in those causes.

It is well settled in this state, and in many if not most jurisdictions, that relief from mistakes in judgments, decrees, or other court proceedings may in an otherwise proper case be had if the mistake is not judicial but one of fact. Anderson v. Woodford, etc., 35 Va. 316, 323, 329; Rust v. Ware, 47 Va. 50, 52 Am. Dec. 100; Byrne v. Edmonds, 64 Va. 200; Fore v. Foster, 86 Va. 104, 9 S. E. 497; Epes v. Williams, 89 Va. 794, 17 S. E. 235; Prince's Adm'r v. McLemore, 108 Va. 269, 61 S. E. 802.

[3] There is no valid objection to proceeding by original bill to obtain relief from such a mistake in a court (having jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter) other than that in which the mistake was made when it cannot be corrected in that cause, since such mistake is not corrected by reviewing the judgment or decree of that court, but by restraining the parties who may take advantage of it from doing so, or by compelling them to execute proper papers for the purpose of correcting it. Barnesley v. Powell, 1 Ves., Sr., 284; Byrne v. Edmonds, supra; Loss v. Obrey, 22 N. J. Eq. 52.

[4] The court also properly overruled the demurrer to the bill. Its allegations are sufficient, if proved, to entitle the appellants to relief from the alleged mistake. The fact that the bill also prays to have the cloud upon the appellants' title removed does not render it demurrable, even if it be conceded, as counsel of the appellees insists, that it is not distinctly charged in the bill that the appellants were in possession of the land in controversy when the suit was brought. While the general rule is that the holder of the legal title to land cannot maintain a bill to remove a cloud from his title unless he is in possession (Otey v. Stuart, 91 Va. 714, 22 S. E. 513; Austin v. Minor, 107 Va. 101, 57 S. E. 609), this rule does not and ought not to apply where the primary relief sought is upon another and well-established ground of equity jurisdiction, and the removal of the cloud is sought only as an incident to that relief. See Booth, etc., v. Wiley, 102 Ill. 84, 113, 114; Swick v. Rease, 62 W. Va. 557, 59 S. E. 510, 511; Shipman v. Furniss, 69 Ala. 555, 44 Am. Rep. 528, 531.

The next question to be considered is whether or not the mistake alleged has been clearly proved, as it is conceded and well settled it must be in cases of this character.

It appears that at the suit of his creditors the lands of the estate of Lewis E. Harvie, deceased, including those situated in Amelia county, were by decrees entered in the said consolidated causes pending in the chancery court of the city of Richmond ordered to be sold. The two special commissioners directed to make the sale reported that after due advertising they had offered the several parcels of land in that county for sale at public outcry, and, having failed thus to sell all of the lands, they had made sales privately of certain portions of them not sold at public auction. Among the private sales they reported that they had sold lot No. 1 (the lot in controversy in this case), containing "about one-fourth of an acre," to George C. Jefferson, and lot No. 2 (which adjoins), containing "one acre," to J. B. Bland. These lots are described as lots Nos. 1 and 2 as shown on plat of land at Chula depot, which was made by the surveyor of the county at the instance of the commissioners to sell. The commissioners stated that they regarded the sales reported (public and private) as good ones, and recommended their confirmation. They were confirmed, and subsequently conveyances were made to Jefferson and Bland for the said lots, respectively, in which they were described as lots Nos. 1 and 2 as shown by the plat of the lands situated at Chula depot. Immediately after his purchase, Jefferson or his agents took possession of the land, sold and conveyed to him as lot No. 1, to the full extent of its boundaries as now claimed by the appellants.

There are located upon lot No. 1, as taken possession of and claimed by Jefferson, a storehouse and shop. The lot contains about one-fourth of an acre, as described in the report of sale and the deed of the commissioner. By recent survey made in accordance with the calls in the plat referred to in the report of sale and the commissioners' deed, the shop is not within the boundaries of the lot, and it contains only about one-sixth of an acre. To correct this alleged mistake this suit was instituted.

The facts relied on by the appellants to show the mistake, briefly stated, are as follows: W. O. Harvie, who represented Jefferson in his negotiations with Haskins, one of the special commissioners, for the purchase of the said property, testifies that said negotiations were solely between him, as the agent of Jefferson, and Haskins, special commissioner of sale; that both of them were familiar with the property purchased by Jefferson; that the land negotiated for and purchased by him for Jefferson had located upon it the said shop as well as the storehouse; that the object of the purchase was to conduct a business on the land for which the use of both buildings was necessary; that the purchase was not by a plat, but that the plat was subsequently made, and that he never saw it until this controversy arose; that after the purchase the witness was present when Mr. Childress, the surveyor who made the plat of the lands at Chula depot surveyed the land purchased by him, and that he ran the lines and fixed its boundaries as they are now claimed and held by the appellants; that immediately after his purchase Jefferson took possession of the whole premises, including the shop; and that he and those who claim under him have since held continuous and exclusive possession of the same until just before this suit was instituted.

[5, 6] The competency of this witness to testify as to what passed between him and Haskins, special commissioner, in negotiating the purchase and sale of the property, is objected to by the appellees, upon the ground that Haskins was dead, and the witness was not only a party to the original transaction by reason of his conducting the negotiations as the agent of Jefferson, but was also deeply interested in the purchase of the property.

It clearly appears that in negotiating the purchase for Jefferson the witness was merely his agent, and in no legal sense one of the "original parties" to the contract. The witness is not a party to this suit, and, if he ever had any pecuniary interest in the purchase, it is clear that he had no such interest in it or in this controversy when he testified. He was clearly a competent witness. Goodell's Ex'rs v. Gibbons, 91 Va. 608, 610, 22 S. E. 504; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Oliver, 95 Va. 445, 448, 28 S. E. 594, and cases cited; Reynolds v. Calloway, 72 Va. 439, 440; Moorman v. Arthur, 90 Va. 455, 18 S. E. 869.

[7] It is proved beyond a reasonable doubt that when the county surveyor, Childress, laid off or surveyed the lots at Chula depot, the boundary lines of lot No. 1 included the land upon which the said shop is situated, and that its boundaries were run and staked off as claimed by the appellants. There were three persons present at that time besides the surveyor, and all three of them so testify positively, and the surveyor does not recollect whether or not the shop was on the lot as surveyed by him. One of those witnesses is Bland, the purchaser of lot No. 2. He testifies that he was present at said survey; that, as the lots were surveyed, the shop was on the Jefferson lot, and not on his lot No. 2, which adjoins it; that after his purchase he built a fence around his property between Jefferson and himself, except back of the old shop which had double doors; that he built his fence by the surveyor's stakes, and that this line was recognized as the true line between him and Jefferson; that he never claimed the shop; and that he leased it from Jefferson during a portion of the time he was the owner of lot No. 2.

It further clearly appears that Jefferson repaired the shop, had both it and the storehouse insured, leased the shop to different persons, and that no one during a period of nearly 19 years ever questioned his ownership of the shop and the land upon which it is built, except appellee Gregory, and the evidence is overwhelming that he did not make any adverse claim to it until just before the institution of this suit, when it was first ascertained by a survey made preparatory to a sale of the property by the appellants that the description of the lot as contained in the plat of the Chula depot lands and in the deed from Haskins, commissioner, to Jefferson, was not a correct description of the lot as actually run by the surveyor making the survey and plat, and as occupied and held by Jefferson and those who claim under him.

It further clearly appears that lots Nos. 1 and 2, as thus actually surveyed and held, contain almost the exact area which they are described as containing in the report of sale and conveyances to the original purchasers, while, according to the said plat of the Chula lands, lot No. 1 contains much less (nearly one-third), and lot No. 2 more, than they were described as containing when sold and conveyed.

While there is some slight conflict in the evidence, the court is of opinion, after a careful consideration of all the facts and circumstances disclosed by the record, that the alleged mistake is clearly proved, that there has been no such delay in discovering the mistake or bringing suit to remedy it as deprives the appellants of the right to the relief sought.

The decree of the circuit court dismissing the appellants' bill must, therefore, be reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the circuit court to require the appellee Gregory, or one of its commissioners, to execute a proper deed releasing and conveying to the appellants all interest claimed by said Gregory, under his deed to lot No. 2, in lot No. 1, as described and bounded in plat "B" filed as an exhibit with the appellants' bill, and to perpetually enjoin him (Gregory) and his agents from trespassing upon or interfering with the appellants' possession of said lot.

Reversed.

VIRGINIA BREWING CO. v. COMMON-WEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1912.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 96*)—LIQUOR DEALER'S TAX—RECOVERY—INVOLUNTARY PAYMENT.

Under Code 1904, § 567, which provides that any person aggrieved by an assessment of taxes may apply to the courts for redress, the tax must have been involuntarily paid under protest; and where, on the refusal of a brewing company's application for a license to establish a distributing house, with advice of the court that the license could not be issued without the payment of a wholesale malt liquor dealer's tax, and that the conduct of the business, without such a payment, would render the company and its agents liable to criminal prosecution, the company paid the tax without a seizure of its property, or the adjudging of a penalty against it, there was no such compulsion as is necessary to justify the recovery.

Error to Corporation Court of Lynchburg.

Action by the Virginia Brewing Company against the Commonwealth. From a judgment dismissing the petition, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Harper & Goodman, for plaintiff in error.
Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

KEITH, P. The Virginia Brewing Company filed its petition in the corporation court of the city of Lynchburg to have refunded to it a tax with which it claims to have been erroneously assessed, and which it paid involuntarily and under protest. The commonwealth's attorney for the city of Lynchburg appeared and made defense to the petition, and the case was heard upon facts agreed between the attorneys for the petitioner and the commonwealth, and thereupon the corporation court dismissed the petition, a bill of exceptions was taken to the ruling, and the case is before us upon a writ of error.

The agreed facts are as follows: That the Virginia Brewing Company is a corporation engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling malt liquors in the state of Virginia; that for the years 1910 and 1911 it was assessed and paid to the state of Virginia, in the city of Roanoke, where its manufactory is located, a license tax for the privilege of manufacturing malt liquors and selling the products of its brewing in quantities of two dozen pints or more at any place within the state of Virginia; that on the 22d day of April, 1911, it applied to the corporation court of the city of Lynchburg for a license giving it the privilege to establish a distributing house for selling the products of its brewing in quantities of two dozen pints or more through an agency, said agency and business to be conducted in Lynchburg, Va.; that it presented to the court proof of the payment to the state of Virginia, at Roanoke, Va., of the tax for the privilege of manufacturing and selling its products, as aforesaid; that upon consideration of said application the court declined to grant the license applied for, and advised the said applicant, through its counsel, that in the opinion of the court, such business could only be legally conducted in the city of Lynchburg upon the payment of an additional wholesale malt liquor dealer's license tax to the state of Virginia, and that the conduct of such business, without the payment of such additional tax, would render the company and its agents liable to criminal prosecution, with its attendant fines and penalties; that thereupon the said Virginia Brewing Company was assessed with and involuntarily paid, under protest, to the state of Virginia, at the city of Lynchburg, the sum of $500 as a license tax for the privilege of conducting a wholesale liquor dealer's business in the said city of Lynchburg, and upon due application to the corporation court, and upon proof of all facts essential to the granting of such license, the corporation court of the city of Lynchburg, at the May term, 1911, did grant to the said Virginia Brewing Company a wholesale malt liquor dealer's license for the conduct of said business in said city; that it was not the desire or intent of said Virginia Brewing Company to conduct a wholesale malt liquor dealer's business, but to establish and maintain a storage and distributing warehouse in the city of Lynchburg for the sale thereof of its products; and that it was assessed with and involuntarily paid under protest the license tax, and accepted the said privilege only because of the advice of the corporation court of the city of Lynchburg that the establishment and maintenance of said storage or distributing warehouse in the said city for the sale of its products thereat, without the payment of said wholesale malt liquor dealer's license, would render the said company and its agents liable to criminal prosecution, with its attendant fines and penalties, and to avoid the liability of such criminal prosecution.

In the agreed facts, it is stated that the tax was paid involuntarily, and yet the facts themselves show that it was in all respects a voluntary payment. The brewing company, of its own motion, applied for a license giving it the privilege of establishing a distributing house in the city of Lynchburg for selling the products of its brewing in quantities of two dozen pints or more; the corporation court advised the petitioner that this could only be done by granting to it a wholesale malt liquor dealer's license for the conduct of its business in the city. It did not require the brewing company to take out the license; its property was not seized; no penalty had been adjudicated against it; and there was no element of that compulsion which the law contemplates when it says that a tax involuntarily paid, under protest, may be recovered. Certainly there was no erroneous assessment under section 567 of the Code of 1904. The brewing company took out a wholesale malt liquor dealer's license, for which it was required by law to pay $500, and it did so of its own free will.

In Burroughs on Taxation, at page 443, it is said that: "Where the party, of his own motion, procures his license and pays the tax, if the tax be afterwards judicially decided to be illegal, he cannot recover. Such payment is not under compulsion, although the pursuit of the occupation, without the payment of the license tax, would subject the party to fine and imprisonment."

The same author says, at page 266: "It is a well-settled principle of law that a voluntary payment of money under a mistake of law lays no foundation for an action to recover back the money so paid."

The compulsion contemplated by law exists where the party called upon must pay, or suffer his property or person to be taken.

As was said by Judge Campbell, in Atwell v. Zeluff, 28 Mich. 118: "Where an officer demands a sum of money under a warrant directing him to enforce it, the party of whom he demands it may fairly assume that if he seeks to act under process at all he will make it effectual. The demand is equivalent to the service of a writ on the person. Any payment is to be regarded as involuntary which is made under a claim involving the use of force, and he cannot be held to expect that the officer will desist after once making demand. The exhibition of the warrant directing forcible proceedings, and the receipt of money thereon, will be in such case equivalent to actual compulsion."

The principles thus stated in Burroughs are fully sustained by the adjudicated cases.

In Town Council of Cahaba v. Burnett, 34 Ala. 400, it was held that a payment of money to the clerk of a town council, as the price of a license for retailing spirituous liquors, under an ordinance afterwards declared void by the Supreme Court, cannot be considered to have been made under compulsion, because the ordinance imposed a fine and imprisonment as the penalty for retailing without license, and consequently the money cannot be recovered by action.

In Taylor v. Board of Health, 31 Pa. 73, 72 Am. Dec. 724, it was held that payment of a tax is not compulsory, because made under a threat, express or implied, that legal remedies for it will be resorted to. Cook v. City of Boston, 9 Allen (Mass.) 393.

"Where a person, with full knowledge of the facts, voluntarily pays a demand unjustly made upon him, though attempted or threatened to be enforced by proceedings, it will not be considered as paid by compulsion, and the party thus paying is not entitled to recover back the money paid, though he may have protested against the unfounded claim at the time of payment made. Where money has been paid under a mistake of the facts, or under circumstances of fraud or extortion, or as a necessary means to obtain the possession of goods wrongfully withheld from the party paying the money, an action may be maintained for the money wrongfully exacted. But such action is not maintainable in the naked case of a party making payment of a demand, rather than resort to litigation, and under the supposition that the claim, which subsequently turned out to be unauthorized by law, was enforceable against him or his property." Lester v. Baltimore, 29 Md. 415, 96 Am. Dec. 542.

The payment in the case in judgment was made with full knowledge of all the facts—unwillingly, it is true—but not under such compulsion as the law contemplates; and the judgment of the corporation court must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

BOARD OF SUP'RS OF NORFOLK COUNTY et al. v. DUKE et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1912.)

1. STATUTES (§ 90*)—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 61*)—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 12*)—DIVISION OF GOVERNMENTAL POWER—EXERCISE OF LEGISLATIVE POWER—EXERCISE BY JUDICIARY—INCORPORATION OF TOWN.

Const. 1902, § 5, and article 3 (Code 1904, pp. ccix, ccxvii), required the legislative, executive, and judicial departments to be separate; and section 117 (page cccxxviii) provides that general laws for the organization and government of cities and towns shall be enacted by the General Assembly, and no special act shall be passed in relation thereto, except in the manner provided by article 4, and then only by a two-thirds vote. Laws 1908, c. 308, provides that whenever a petition, signed by 20 electors of an unincorporated town or a thickly settled community, shall be presented to the circuit court of the county, stating the boundaries, population, etc., and the court shall be satisfied that it will be to the best interest of the inhabitants of the said town, that the prayer of the petition is reasonable, that the general good of the community will be promoted, that the number of inhabitants exceeds 200, and does not exceed 5,000, and that the area embraced therein is not excessive, it shall decree that the town be incorporated. Held, that section 117 required the Legislature to provide by general laws for the creation of municipal corporations, and it could not be said that Laws 1908 delegated legislative powers to the circuit court, contrary to the Constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Dec. Dig. § 90; Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 61; Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 14*)—CONSTRUCTION.

The language of the Constitution should be construed according to the ordinary meaning of the words used therein, not being ambiguous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

3. WORDS AND PHRASES—"ORGANIZE."

"To organize" means to arrange or constitute in parts; each having a special function or relation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, pp. 5053, 5054.]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 7*)—ORGANIZATION—REASONABLENESS.

Laws 1908, c. 808, authorizes the circuit court of a county, on petition of the electors of any thickly settled community to have it incorporated as a town; if the court be satisfied that the petition is reasonable, and that the general good of the community will be thereby promoted, to order the town to be incorporated. The community sought to be organized as a town is a part of a continuous settlement which is divided by a railway, and the two parts of the settlement are contiguous and homogeneous in population and interest, and some of the streets pass through both towns. Held, that it was not reasonable, or for the best interest of the community, that the part of the community in question be incorporated as a town.

Error to Circuit Court, Norfolk County.

Petition by John T. Duke and others against the Board of Supervisors of Norfolk County and others to have territory incorporated as a town. Order granting the petition, and defendants bring error. Reversed, and petition dismissed.

Sale, Mann & Tyler, J. W. Hopper, and T. J. Wool, for plaintiffs in error. Jno. N. Sebrell, Jr., for defendants in error.

KEITH, P. Certain persons, claiming to be electors, filed their petition in the circuit court of Norfolk county, in which they state that a certain thickly settled community, known as "Pinners Point," in the county of Norfolk, described by metes and bounds in the petition, containing 1,250 inhabitants, being of opinion that it was to their interest to be incorporated, and that the general good of the community would thereby be promoted, asked the court to incorporate them as a town, under the name of "Pinners," by virtue of an act approved March 14, 1908, entitled "An act to provide for the incorporation by the courts of towns of more than 200 and less than 5,000 inhabitants, and conferring upon said towns, when incorporated, certain powers of taxation," to be found in the Acts of 1908, at page 552.

Upon their motion, the board of supervisors of Norfolk county and certain individuals were made parties to this petition, and filed their demurrer in writing, which was overruled, and thereupon they filed their answer, to which the petitioners replied generally; and the court having heard the evidence entered an order in accordance with the prayer of the petition, to which order a writ of error was awarded, and the case is before us for review.

By the terms of the act referred to, it is provided that the case shall be heard in the appellate court "without reference to the principles of demurrer to evidence, the evidence to be considered as on appeal in chancery cases."

Certain formal objections were taken in the circuit court by the respondents, and are insisted upon here, which, in the view we shall take of this case, need not be determined. We shall assume that the number of electors contemplated, duly qualified as provided by law, united in the petition to the circuit court; that the description of the territory proposed to be embraced in the incorporation is correctly given; that due publication was made in accordance with the statute; and, in fine, that all matters of form were complied with.

[1] The first question which we shall consider arises upon the demurrer. It is insisted that the act of Assembly of the 14th of March, 1908, is unconstitutional, because it violates section 5, art. 1, of the Constitution of 1902 (Code 1904, p. ccix), the first paragraph of which declares that the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the state shall be separate and distinct, and article 8 (page ccxvii), which declares that, "Except as hereinafter provided, the legislative, executive, and judicial departments shall be separate and distinct so that neither exercise the powers properly belonging to either of the others, nor any person exercise the power of more than one of them at the same time."

By section 117 of article 8 of the Constitution (page ccxxviii), it is provided that: "General laws for the organization and government of cities and towns shall be enacted by the General Assembly, and no special act shall be passed in relation thereto, except in the manner provided in article 4 of this Constitution, and then only by a recorded vote of two-thirds of the members elected to each house."

Plaintiffs in error contend that the act in question delegates to the circuit courts legislative functions, in deciding (1) whether the proposed incorporation is for the interest of the inhabitants of the proposed town; (2) whether the general good of the community will be promoted by incorporation; (3) whether or not the prayer of the petitioners is reasonable; (4) that it permits the courts to alter the boundaries named in the petition, and to fix others; and (5) that it vests absolutely in the court the discretion to dispose of the matter as to it may seem best.

This general subject was before this court in Henrico County v. City of Richmond, 106 Va. 282, 55 S. E. 683, 117 Am. St. Rep. 1001. That, it is true was a case involving the constitutionality of an act authorizing the annexation of territory to an existing municipal corporation.

By section 126 of the Constitution (page ccxlii), it is declared that: "The General Assembly shall provide by general laws for the extension and contraction from time to time of the corporate limits of cities and towns, and no special act for such purpose shall be valid."

When the Legislature came to deal with the duty imposed by that section, it passed an act which is to be found in the Code of 1904 as section 1014a. It imposes upon the courts substantially the same duties that they are required to exercise under the act called in question in the controversy before us.

The constitutionality of section 1014a was vigorously attacked upon arguments almost identical with those under consideration, and enforced by substantially the same line of authorities, though the industry of counsel in the case before us has added to the number. It was urged upon us in Henrico County v. City of Richmond that there was a commingling of legislative and judicial functions in the act, which rendered it null and void. It was pointed out that it was for the courts to determine the necessity for and expediency of annexation, and whether the terms and conditions set forth in the ordinance were reasonable and fair, and whether fair and just provisions were made for the future management and improvement of the annexed territory; that if the court or judge should be satisfied with the necessity for or expediency of such annexation, and that such conditions and provisions were reasonable and fair, an order should be entered providing for the annexation of the territory, but if of opinion that the annexation was unnecessary or inexpedient, then the motion for annexation should be dismissed; that it provided that if the court or judge should be of opinion that the annexation of only a part of the territory was necessary or expedient, or that the ordinance did not contain fair and reasonable terms, or that more territory should be annexed than was embraced within the metes and bounds originally set forth, it should enter a proper order, embodying what it deemed reasonable and fair terms upon which the annexation should be had, and how much of the territory should be annexed, and direct the annexation of such territory in conformity with the terms and conditions so prescribed. It was made the duty of the court to draw the lines of annexation, so as to have a reasonably compact body of land, and to see that no land should be taken into the city which was not adapted to city improvements, unless necessarily embraced in said compact body, and other provisions of a like character, all of which were claimed to be in their essence legislative functions; that the attempt to confer the exercise of such powers upon courts was in plain violation of those provisions of the Constitution intended to secure the complete separation of executive, judicial, and legislative departments, so that neither exercise the powers properly belonging to either of the others, nor any person exercise the power of more than one of them at the same time.

The opinion of the court deals with all of these subjects, and, after a full consideration reached the conclusion, as set forth in the syllabus, that: "An act of Assembly, providing for the extension of the corporate limits of cities and towns, and which confers upon the circuit courts of the counties in which the territory lies the power to ascertain and determine the boundaries to be embraced, and the necessity for and the expediency of extending the corporate limits of cities and towns, is not unconstitutional, on the ground of conferring legislative powers on such courts. Nearly or quite all of the questions of necessity and expediency submitted to the courts for their determination are questions of fact, and are to be ascertained judicially, and the limited legislative power conferred, if any, is not in violation of the Constitution. Governments could not exist if the inhibition on the intermingling of such powers in one person or body, were strictly, literally, and unyieldingly applied in every situation. The manifest purpose of the Legislature was to make a case to be tried in court, in which all the parties concerned are brought before the court and given an opportunity to be heard."

That case has been accepted as law, and has been acted upon in numerous instances, and is not now to be disturbed, except for the gravest and most convincing reasons. We shall not undertake to add anything to the reasoning of the court, and shall present but one authority in addition to those there considered.

In Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. 3, 6 L. Ed. 253, Chief Justice Marshall, dealing with a kindred subject, uses language which strongly confirms the result reached by this court. Said he: "The difference between the departments undoubtedly is that the Legislature makes, the executive executes, and the judiciary construes, the law; but the maker of the law may commit something to the discretion of the other departments, and the precise boundary of this power is a subject of delicate and difficult inquiry, into which a court will not enter unnecessarily."

In passing section 1014a, the Legislature was obeying the mandate of the Constitution, which requires it "to provide by general laws for the extension and contraction from time to time of the corporate limits of cities and towns, and no special act for such purpose shall be valid." In passing the law under consideration, it was acting in obedience to section 117 of the Constitution, which provides that "general laws for the organization and government of cities and towns shall be enacted by the General Assembly and no special act shall be passed in relation thereto, except in the manner provided in article 4 of this Constitution, and then only by a recorded vote of two-thirds of the members elected to each house."

Admitting the correctness of the decision in Henrico County v. City of Richmond, its binding force as authority can only be avoided by differentiating the creation of a municipal corporation from the annexation of additional territory to an existing corporation. It may be conceded that the creation of a municipal corporation is in its essence a legislative act, and the true question is whether or not it was competent for the Legislature to delegate such a power to the courts.

[2, 3] The Constitution requires the General Assembly—does not merely permit, but commands that body—to enact general laws for the organization and government of cities and towns. This language is to be construed in accordance with the ordinary meaning of the words used. “To organize” means to arrange or constitute in parts, each having a special function, act, office or relation; it means something more in the connection in which it is used than to put into working order agencies already established, for that duty is more properly embraced under the word “government”; it is required to pass laws, both to organize and to govern; and it is plain to us that the language is sufficient, not only to permit, but to require, the Legislature to make provision for the creation and regulation, for the organization, and for the government of, municipal corporations. Certainly it cannot be said that the act passed in pursuance of the mandate here given is so plainly in excess of authority that the courts would be justified in holding it to be null and void, as in contravention of the constitutional provisions to which we have referred. It is not necessary to reiterate or to cite authorities in support of the proposition that, while courts possess power to declare acts of the General Assembly unconstitutional, they will not do so unless there is clear violation of some explicit provision of the Constitution.

We are of opinion that the same process of reasoning which, in the case of Henrico County v. City of Richmond, led to the conclusion that the act for the annexation of territory was valid leads inevitably to the same result in dealing with the act of March 14, 1908.

[4] It is assigned as error that the court found that the prayer of the petition was reasonable, when the evidence does not sustain that conclusion, and that it erred, because, while the act authorizes the incorporation of a “thickly settled community,” it does not justify the carving out of a part of a thickly settled community and its incorporation. We will consider these two together.

We have carefully considered the evidence in this case and the maps which are made a part of the record, from which it plainly appears that there is a continuous settlement fronting upon “Western Branch”; that through this settlement there passes what is known as the “Belt Line” railway. That portion of the settlement to the west of the railway is known as “Finner’s”; that to the east is “Port Norfolk.” They are contiguous to each other, and appear to be homogeneous in population and in real interests, though there may be diversity of opinion between them. They are separated only by the tracks of a railway that is made one of the boundaries set out in the petition for the incorporation of “Pinner’s.” Some of the streets pass through Pinner’s and Port Norfolk without interruption; and we cannot think it reasonable, or to the best interests of that community, that they should be divided into parts, and considered and treated as two separate communities, when in truth they constitute but one continuous, contiguous, and homogeneous settlement. As the act requires that the town incorporated shall contain not less than 200 inhabitants, it is conceivable that such a community might be almost indefinitely subdivided and erected into municipal corporations, if a faction in one of the subdivisions chanced to obtain control. We do not believe that the act contemplates anything of the kind; and when it provides for the incorporation of a thickly settled community, it does not mean that that community shall be subdivided in accordance with the caprice and whim of a limited portion of the people constituting the entire community. Great and unnecessary burdens might be imposed, and great wrong and injury accomplished, under such a construction.

We are of opinion that the evidence does not justify the finding of the circuit court that the prayer of the petition is reasonable, and that the general good of the community will be promoted by the incorporation of the town of Pinner’s. The order appealed from is therefore reversed, and the petition is dismissed, with costs to the parties substantially prevailing.

ARMINIUS CHEMICAL CO. et al. v. LANDRUM et al.

1. JUDGMENT (§ 251*) — APPLICABILITY TO PLEADINGS.

Plaintiffs’ amended declaration sought to recover for injury to land by an alleged nuisance committed and maintained by defendants prior to the commencement of the action, consisting of the pollution of a water course by which plaintiffs’ lands were subject to a deposit of iron pyrites and sulphurous substances from defendants’ mines. Defendants’ plea charged that any nuisance was permanent in character, and that all damages therefrom must be recovered in one action, and concluded with an averment that plaintiffs ought not to maintain a claim for temporary damages. Another plea raised the same question, and concluded that the cause of action pleaded did not accrue within five years before suit. The replication to both pleas was general. The jury found defendants guilty of the trespass alleged in the declaration and that plaintiffs had been damaged to the extent of $800. Held, that such verdict constituted an adverse finding on defendants' pleas and that a judgment for plaintiffs on such verdict was not objectionable as in conflict with the declaration and replication.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 437; Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 76*)—POLLUTION OF STREAM—DAMAGES—MITIGATION—GENERAL BENEFITS.

In an action against upper riparian mine owners for the pollution of a stream by the waste from their mines which flowed down on and injured plaintiffs' lands, evidence of general benefits accruing to plaintiffs' lands, in common with all the land in the vicinity arising from the fact that operation of defendants' mines caused an increase in the population, was inadmissible in mitigation of damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 64; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1040*)—HARMLESS ERROR—REJECTION OF SPECIAL PLEA—GENERAL ISSUE.

Defendants in trespass were not prejudiced by the rejection of a special plea alleging that the injuries complained of in the declaration were but the result of the natural, lawful, and reasonable use of their property by the defendants without malice or negligence, all the evidence admissible under such plea being equally admissible under the plea of not guilty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4094; Dec. Dig. § 1040.*]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 64*)—POLLUTION—RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS—RIGHTS.

All riparian proprietors on the same stream have the same right to the use and enjoyment of its waters, the rights of each being qualified by the right of the others to have the stream substantially preserved in its size and flow, and to be protected against any material pollution of its waters.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 55-57; Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 67*)—RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS—POLLUTION—MINE-OWNERS.

The fact that defendants owned mines located on the stream on which plaintiffs were lower riparian proprietors, and that such mines were so situated that in their operation the pollution of the stream was a necessary consequence, did not prevent plaintiffs from recovering damages to their lower riparian land by such pollution, since the necessities of one man's business cannot be made the standard by which to measure another's right in a thing belonging to both.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 58; Dec. Dig. § 67.* Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 245, 246.]

6. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 69*)—USE OF PROPERTY—INJURY TO OTHERS.

The private business of one man or class of men, however important its successful operation may be to the public or to the development of the country, does not give him or them the right to destroy or materially injure the property of another in a thing in which they have a common right, under the constitutional provision that private property cannot be taken or damaged for public use without compensation, and for the same reason cannot be damaged for private purposes without rendering the person causing the damages liable therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 171-179; Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 77*)—POLLUTION—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for damages to a lower riparian proprietor by the pollution of a water course, whether plaintiffs had been guilty of contributory negligence in failing to take certain fallen trees out of the stream so as to minimize the overflow thereof, held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

8. EVIDENCE (§ 542*)—EXPERTS—COMPETENCY.

Where a witness was a scientific and practical engineer of long experience and a member of the American Society of Mining Engineers, had been a city engineer, and had had experience in filtering and cleansing water for drinking purposes, it was not reversible error for the court to permit him to testify on the question, whether it was possible to operate certain iron pyrite mines without polluting the waters of a creek, though he did not claim to be a mining engineer and had had no experience in filtering or purifying waters from mines.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2355; Dec. Dig. § 542.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1048*)—HARMLESS ERROR—COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES.

Where upper riparian proprietors in the operation of mines had no right at all to pollute the waters of a creek to the injury of a lower riparian proprietor, they were not prejudiced by a ruling permitting an alleged incompetent witness to testify that the mines could be operated without polluting the stream.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1048.*]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 215*)—INSTRUCTIONS—RIGHT TO ALLEGE ERROR—NECESSITY OF OBJECTIONS.

Where in an action against several upper riparian proprietors for polluting the stream to the damage of lower proprietors, defendants did not except to an instruction that if it was possible to determine from the evidence what specific amount of damage had been caused by any one of the defendants, the jury should assess such defendant the amount for which it was responsible, but if it was impossible to determine in what proportion the defendants had contributed to injuries, then each who had contributed in any degree was responsible for the whole injury, though his act alone might not have caused the entire damage, and though without fault on his part the damages would have resulted from the acts of the other defendants, could not object for the first time on appeal on the ground that each defendant having acted independently, each was liable only for the damage done by its acts and not for the result of the acts of others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1309-1314; Dec. Dig. § 215.*]

11. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1001*)—EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

A judgment will not be reversed because the verdict is contrary to the evidence or without evidence to support it, except in a case of plain deviation from or palpable insufficiency of evidence and not in a doubtful case merely because the court, if sitting as a jury, would have given a different verdict.

Error to Circuit Court, Louisa County.

Trespass by E. Landrum and others against the Virginia Carolina Chemical Company and others. From a judgment against defendants, the Sulphur Mining & Railroad Company and the Arminius Chemical Company, they bring error. Affirmed.

F. W. Sims, Gordon & Gordon, and Jas. R. Caton, for plaintiffs in error. W. C. Bibb and Harmon & Walsh, for defendants in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This is an action of trespass on the case brought by the defendants in error against the plaintiffs in error and two other corporations to recover damages for the pollution of the waters of Contrary creek, which flows through the lands of the plaintiffs, and for injuries to their lands caused by the deposit thereon of the washings of "iron pyrites" taken from the mines of the defendants.

Upon the trial of the cause the following verdict was found, and judgment entered, viz.: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiffs on the issues joined on the special pleas Nos. 1 and 2 against the Sulphur Mining & Railroad Co. and the Arminius Chemical Co. and fix the damages at the sum of eight hundred dollars, and we further find for the defendants to the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co. and the Virginia Carolina Chemical Co. F. P. Smith, Foreman."

"And thereupon the defendants the Sulphur Mining & Railroad Company and the Arminius Chemical Company moved the court in arrest of judgment, to set aside the verdict of the jury, and for a new trial, because the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence; the damages assessed are excessive and unsupported by the evidence, and for misdirection of the jury, which motion the court overruled, to which rulings of the court the said defendants excepted. Whereupon it is considered by the court that the plaintiffs recover of the said defendants to the Sulphur Mining & Railroad Company and the Arminius Chemical Company the sum of $800, with legal interest thereon from this day until paid, and their costs in this behalf expended."

To that judgment upon the petition of the Arminius Chemical Company and the Sulphur Mining & Railroad Company this writ of error was awarded.

[1] The first assignment of error, made alone by the Arminius Chemical Company, is that "there is error apparent on the face of the record, in that the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the court are in conflict with the allegations of the plaintiffs' declaration and with their replication."

The defendants pleaded the general issue and offered three special pleas, all of which were objected to, but the court overruled the objections to special pleas Nos. 1 and 2, and permitted them to be filed, and to each of these the plaintiff replied generally.

For the purposes of this assignment of error it may be conceded that the amended declaration only states a case entitling the plaintiffs to damages resulting to them from the alleged nuisance prior to the institution of the action, as claimed by the petitioner. Special plea No. 1 avers that the nuisance complained of is permanent in its character and that all the damages resulting therefrom to the plaintiffs must be recovered in one action, and concludes with the averment "that the plaintiffs ought not to have or maintain their claim for temporary damages only in the declaration mentioned, but should sue for and recover all the damages they have suffered and will sustain, if any, by reason of the said injuries in one action." Special plea No. 2 contains the same averments as special plea No. 1, except its conclusion. No. 1 concludes as above mentioned, and No. 2 concludes as follows: "And the said defendants say that the several supposed causes of action in the declaration mentioned did not, nor did any of them, accrue to the said plaintiffs at any time within five years next before the institution of this suit." The general replications to these pleas put the averments of each in issue.

The effect of the finding of the jury, as we understand it, is that the petitioning defendants were guilty of the trespass alleged in the declaration—that the averments of neither of the special pleas Nos. 1 and 2 were true, and that the plaintiffs were damaged to the extent of $800. The verdict of the jury was not, therefore, in favor of the petitioners upon special plea No. 1, as it insists, but against it. The judgment of the court is in strict accordance with the verdict of the jury.

[2] The next error assigned is to the action of the court in refusing to permit E. J. Haley and a number of other witnesses to testify, in mitigation of damages, "that all of the lands lying in the vicinity of the defendants' mines, including those of the plaintiffs, have been greatly enhanced in value as an incident of the operation of said mines; that the population in such vicinity had been increased twenty to one by reason of their operations, and as a consequence all lands close enough to furnish homes for the men working at the mines had risen in value since the year 1899 to a marked extent, possibly to as great an extent as the sum of the injury complained of."

It appears from the bill of exceptions taken to the action of the court and also from the assignment of error that the object of the evidence was not to prove any special benefit to the plaintiffs' lands by reason of the nuisance, but the general benefits which had resulted to all the lands lying in the vicinity of the mines of the defendants, including that of the plaintiffs.

Without considering the question, whether or not special benefits resulting to a landowner from a mining or manufacturing plant operated in such manner as to become a nuisance and injure the lands of such owner can be proved to mitigate the damages resulting from the wrongful act, it is clear, we think, that general benefits, like an increase in the market value of land, which may result or come to all the lands in the vicinity of such mining or manufacturing plant by reason of its establishment and operation, cannot be shown to mitigate the landowner's damages which result from the improper manner in which the plant is operated. These general benefits are mere incidents or accidents arising out of the existence of the mining or manufacturing plant. They give the owner of the plant no claim against the landowner. Their value cannot be treated by the plant owner as the purchase price, in whole or in part, of a right to so use or operate his plant as to injure the landowner, nor as a set-off against damages resulting from a wrongful act. See 1 Sutherland on Damages (3d Ed.) §§ 158, 1056; Francis v. Schoelkopf, 53 N. Y. 152; Marcy v. Fries, 18 Kan. 353, 355, 356; opinion by Judge (afterwards Justice) Brewer in Gerish v. New Market, etc., Co., 30 N. H. 478, 485; James River, etc., Co. v. Turner, 36 Va. 313, 339-341.

[3] The next assignment of error is to the action of the court in rejecting special plea No. 3, and in refusing to give instruction No. 9, asked for by the defendants.

The defense sought to be set up by that plea was that the injuries complained of in the plaintiffs' declaration were but the result of the natural, lawful, and reasonable use of their property by the defendants without malice or negligence, and this being so they were not liable in damages for the alleged injuries.

By instruction No. 9 the court was asked to tell the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the averments of that plea were true, they must find for the defendants.

If it were conceded that the plea set up a good defense to the plaintiffs' demand, no prejudice to the defendants resulted from the rejection of the plea; for under the plea of not guilty in an action of trespass on the case in tort, the defendant has the right to give in evidence any matter which justifies or excuses the act or acts complained of in the plaintiffs' declaration. See Stephens on Pl. 157; 4 Min. Inst. 646; 1 Chitty on Pl.; 1 Barton's Law Pr. (2d Ed.) 503, 504; Ridge- ley v. Town of West Fairmount, 46 W. Va. 445, 33 S. E. 235.

In their statement of their grounds of defense required and filed under the plea of not guilty, the same defense was relied on by the defendants as was set up in special plea No. 3, and they were permitted to introduce evidence tending to sustain it.

It appears from the uncontradicted evidence in the case that the plaintiffs are the owners of about 250 acres of land, through which flows Contrary creek. A portion of the tract is bottom land, subject to overflow in times of high water. The two defendants who have appealed in this case are upper riparian occupants, each in possession of a large tract of land upon which it operates large mines producing iron pyrites, and upon which it has erected washers to separate the ore from the slate or rock in which it is imbedded as it comes from the mines. The rock is crushed and then washed in water by some device which permits the valuable ore to settle and the refuse to pass off in the water. This refuse finds its way to the creek and in time of high water quantities of it are deposited on the plaintiffs' land. The refuse is in part iron pyrites. It contains, it seems, iron and sulphur, which upon being exposed to the air gives off sulphuric acid. This acid or noxious substance kills vegetation and injuriously affects the fertility of the soil. About 30 acres of the lowland of the plaintiffs are covered with said deposit, which has killed all, or nearly all, of the vegetation growing upon it, including trees, and rendered it almost, if not entirely, valueless for farming purposes.

The evidence further tends to show that the land covered by the deposit at times becomes soft and boggy, so that it is difficult if not impossible for stock to cross it from one part of the farm, which the creek divides into about equal parts, to the other; that the waters of the stream are unfit for use by domestic animals; that at times they will not drink it; and that the residue of the land has, by the acts of the defendants, been rendered much less valuable as a farm.

[4] Unless the said defendants had superior rights to the ordinary riparian proprietor, it is clear that the injuries complained of were not damnum absque injuria, and instruction No. 9 was properly refused; for the general principle of law is that all riparian proprietors upon the same stream have the same right to the use and enjoyment of its waters—the right of no one is absolute—but is qualified by the right of the others to have the stream substantially preserved in its size, flow, and purity, and to be protected against any material pollution of its waters. This is the common right of all. The use of one must not, therefore, be inconsistent with the rights of the others. Trevett v. Prison Association, 98 Va. 332, 36 S. E. 373, 50 L. R. A. 564, 81 Am. St. Rep. 727;

Shoffner v. Sutherland, 111 Va. 298, 68 S. E. 996; Shearman & Redfield on Neg. §§ 733, 734.

[5] The contention of the defendants is that the general rule as to the rights of riparian owners does not apply in the case of mineowners, whose mines are so situated that in their operations the pollution of the stream is an inseparable and necessary consequence from the only use for which their property is valuable; in other words, if the pollution of the stream was the necessary consequence of the only method in which the said defendants could operate their mines, then the injury done to the plaintiffs was reasonable and lawful, and damnum absque injuria.

The case principally relied on to sustain this contention is that of Penn. Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 113 Pa. 126, 6 Atl. 453, 57 Am. Rep. 445, in which it was held that the use and enjoyment of a stream of pure water for domestic purposes by the lower riparian owners who had purchased their lands, built their houses and laid out their grounds before the opening of the mine, the acidulated waters from which rendered the stream entirely useless for domestic purposes, must ex necessitate give way to the interests of the community in order to permit the development of the resources of the country and to make possible the prosecution of the lawful business of mining coal. That case had been before the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania twice before, when the decision was in favor of the lower riparian owner. On the third appeal the decision relied on was made by a divided court—four judges to three. The conclusion reached on the last appeal is not in accord with principles which have for centuries applied in determining the common interests and rights of riparian proprietors, and the case has received but little approval outside of the jurisdiction in which the ruling was made. That decision, as it seems to us, is based upon two grounds, neither of which is sound, viz.: That the rights of one riparian owner are to be determined by the necessities of another and by the importance of the latter's business to the community or public.

"The necessities of one man's business cannot," as has been well said, "be the standard by which to measure another's rights in a thing which belongs to both." Wheatley v. Chrisman, 24 Pa. 298, 64 Am. Dec. 637; Strobel v. Kerr Salt Co., 164 N. Y. 303, 58 N. E. 142, 51 L. R. A. 687, 79 Am. St. Rep. 643; Beach v. Sterling Iron Co., 54 N. J. Eq. 65, 33 Atl. 288.

[6] Neither can the private business of one man or class of men, however important its successful operation may be to the public or to the development of the country, give such person or class of persons the right to destroy or materially injure the property of another in a thing in which they have common rights. If, under our Constitution and laws, private property cannot be taken or damaged for public uses without just compensation, a fortiori it cannot be done for private purposes. See Townsend v. Norfolk Ry. Co., 105 Va. 49, 52 S. E. 970, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 87, 115 Am. St. Rep. 842; Shoffner v. Sutherland, supra, 111 Va. 301, 68 S. E. 996.

In Young v. Banking Distillery Co. (1893), 1 App. Cas. 691, 701, 702, Lord Shand, in commenting on the Sanderson Case, after stating what it decided, said: "The case had been twice previously before the court, and on both occasions the judgment was given against the mineowners. On the third occasion, which occurred in consequence of a third trial to assess damages, the jury found a very large sum due to the lower owner, but the verdict was quashed and the whole case reconsidered with reference to the legal rights of the parties, and with the results I have stated. In a court of seven judges there were three who dissented from the judgment, including the chief justice of the state. This circumstance and the grounds of the judgment seem to me to be sufficient to deprive the case of any real weight." After stating the grounds upon which the decision was placed, he continues: "The case has no application to the present because the decision was based upon special circumstances as to the great relative value of the minerals as compared with the surface in the district; and because in any view the decision seems to me to have been making law rather than interpreting the law so as to give effect to sound, just, and well-recognized principles as to the common interest and rights of upper and lower proprietors in the running water of a stream."

In the same case (page 699), Lord McNaughton, in commenting upon the Sanderson Case, said: "Then the appellant urged (precisely as the defendant here) that working coal was the natural and proper use of their mineral property. They said they could not continue to work unless they were permitted to discharge the water which accumulates in their mine. They added that this water course is the natural and proper channel to carry off the surplus water of the district. All that may be very true, but in this country, at any rate, it is not permissible in such case for a man to use his own property so as to injure the property of his neighbor."

In the case of Strobel v. Kerr Salt Co., 164 N. Y. 303, 58 N. E. 142, 51 L. R. A. 687, 79 Am. St. Rep. 643, it was held that the doctrine of the Sanderson Case was not the law of the state of New York, and in commenting upon it the Court of Appeals of that state said: "We have never adopted that rule in this state, and no public necessity exists therefor, even if it would ever warrant the courts in relaxing rules for protection of property of small value in the interest of some business required to develop the resources of the state and in which much capital had embarked, giving employment to a great number of people. There is nothing about the case now before us to take it out of the general rules governing the rights of riparian owners. Those rules are well established in this state, and, so far as material to the case before us, are, in the absence of modification by grant or prescription, as follows: A riparian owner is entitled to a reasonable use of the water flowing by his premises in a natural stream as an incident to his ownership of the soil and to have it transmitted to without sensible alteration in quality or unreasonable diminution in quantity. While he does not own the running water he has right to a reasonable use of it as it passes by his land. As all other owners upon the same stream have the same right, the right of no one is absolute, but is qualified by the right of the others to have the stream substantially preserved in its natural size, flow, and purity, and to protection against material diversion or pollution. This is the common right of all. The use by each must, therefore, be consistent with the rights of the others, and the maxim, sic utere tuo, observed by all. The lower riparian owners are entitled to a fair participation in the use of the water, and their rights cannot be cut down by necessity or convenience of the defendant's business. "The necessities of one man's business cannot be the standard of another's rights in a thing which belongs to both." Wheatley v. Chrisman, 24 Pa. 298, 64 Am. Dec. 657.

In Beach, etc., v. Sterling Iron Co., 54 N. J. Eq. 65, 83 Atl. 286, the Supreme Court of New Jersey said: "Several matters are urged in defense to this case: First, but faintly, that the doctrine finally established by a bare majority of a divided court in Pennsylvania, in Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 113 Pa. 126, 6 Atl. 453, 57 Am. St. Rep. 445, should be adopted here. * * * The doctrine of that case is shown * * * to be inharmonious with a long line of previous decisions in Pennsylvania, and has not been, so far as we can learn, followed in any other state—certainly not in this state. It was repudiated in Ohio, whose mining interests are quite large, in the recent and well-considered case of Columbus, etc., Coal, etc., Co. v. Tucker, 48 Ohio St. 41, 26 N. E. 630, 12 L. R. A. 577, 29 Am. St. Rep. 528. * * * It was not suggested on the argument that the doctrine ever had the least foothold in this state."

In Columbus, etc., Co. v. Tucker, 48 Ohio St. 41, 26 N. E. 630, 12 L. R. A. 577, 29 Am. St. Rep. 528, in which the Supreme Court of the state of Ohio disapproved of the doctrine of the Sanderson Case, it was said: "The further claim of the company that it has the right to make the deposits in the places complained of, because it was necessary to the successful conduct of its own business to so place them, seems to us wanting in substance. The effect is to measure the rights of the plaintiff in his lands and in the waters of Monday creek by the convenience or necessity of the company's business. An owner of land in Ohio is not subject to any such narrow and arbitrary rule.

In discussing the Sanderson Case the Supreme Court of Alabama, in Drake v. Lady Ensley Coal Co., 102 Ala. 501, 14 South. 749, 24 L. R. A. 64, 48 Am. St. Rep. 77, after referring to some of the later decisions of the court which decided the Sanderson Case, said: "The case in 113 Pa., 6 Atl., is not overruled, but is commented upon, and the distinction is drawn that in the latter case (113 Pa., 6 Atl.), the ore was being mined by the owner of the soil and in the two later cases, the coke was not mined on the land upon which it was manufactured. It seems to us that if in the case where the coal was mined on the land of the owner he was exempt from damages, upon the ground that the individual or minor interest must yield to the greater and paramount interest of the public, it would make but little difference where the coke was mined. The manufacturing of the coke from the ore was what contributed to the paramount and public interest. On the other hand, if the owner is to be exempted from liability because the ore was mined on his own land and not because of the public benefit then the doctrine of 'sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas' would be abolished and the rights of lower riparian proprietors, almost universally recognized and protected, would be destroyed. * * *

Under the provisions of the Constitution, private property cannot be taken for public uses or for corporations without just compensation made to the owner except by his consent. The courts—and it was never intended to be otherwise understood—are not the 'masons' to 'chisel' away vested rights of property of private individuals, however humble and obscure the owner, for the benefit of the public or great corporations." See, also, Tennessee Coal, etc., Co. v. Hamilton, 100 Ala. 252, 14 South. 167, 46 Am. St. Rep. 48.

In Day v. Louisville Coal & Coke Co., 60 W. Va. 27, 53 S. E. 776, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 167, the principles of the Sanderson Case were invoked, and it was contended that the injury complained of was damnum absque injuria because consequent upon and necessary to the transaction of the defendant company's lawful business. In reply to that contention the Court of Appeals of West Virginia said: "This case involves principles, very important everywhere, but especially important in this state at present and in the future; but those principles are old and have been called into requisition through many, many years in actions for the pollution of streams, and casting into them hurtful things, and depositing them upon lands of riparian owners on the stream below. The defendant contends that, as it was using its property in carrying on a lawful business very useful to the public, it is exempt from liability, as it was only exercising its rights. We are told by the able brief of the defendant's counsel that the affirmance of this judgment will be vastly hurtful and disastrous to the mining and coke interests of West Virginia, and have a tendency to detract from the value of our land, and hinder the development of the great wealth of coal and iron in the bowels of our mountains, and will be subversive of great public policy, which demands the development of our wealth therein and tends to the weal of the whole people of the state; and that a few individuals injured thereby must be without redress. We cannot accede to this broad proposition. The established maxim of centuries is sic utere tuo ut alienum non ledas (so use your own property that you do not injure another). That rule is almost equal to the Golden Rule in importance, and must never be lost sight of in the daily doings and transactions of organized society. A man has land upon a stream. He is its sole lord. No one has a right to injure that land. It is protected by the Constitution. If one up the stream in his works, be they ever so lawful, honorable, and necessary for private weal or public weal, do thereby injure the land of that owner further down by unlawful invasion of it, by casting upon it things damaging it, or by polluting the purity of the water, rendering it unfit for the owner's consumption as it passes through his land, the man up the stream must answer in damages. One man without fault is injured by another. That is enough for liability. This is the general principle of the common law. One man cannot thus injure another. Especially is this so in this state, where the Constitution says that private property shall not be damaged for public use without compensation. How, then, can it be damaged for private interests or to promote a supposed public policy? The authorities are ample on this subject to sustain this position."

In the case of Bowling Coal Co. v. Ruffner, 117 Tenn. 180, 100 S. W. 116, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 923, the Supreme Court of the state of Tennessee, in refusing to follow the Sanderson Case, said: "We are of opinion that the doctrine announced in Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Sanderson, supra, is opposed by the great weight of authority in this country and England, and is, in our judgment, subversive of fundamental private rights, while it discards * * * the honored principles of the common law embodied in the maxim, sic utere tuo ut alienum non ledas."

In a note to this case in 10 Ann. Cas. p. 587, where it is also reported, many cases, English and American, are cited sustaining the general rule that where an upper riparian owner pollutes a stream by mining operations rendering the water unfit for domestic, manufacturing, or agricultural purposes, or causing refuse to be deposited on the lower riparian owners' lands materially injuring the same; he is responsible in damages.

We are of opinion that instruction No. 9 did not correctly state the law as applied to the facts of this case, and the court did not err in refusing to give it.

[7] The next assignment of error is to the action of the court in refusing to give the defendants' instruction No. 7, and in giving in lieu thereof the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that it is the duty of a person injured by the wrongful act of another to take such reasonable precautions to prevent increase of injury as would be taken by a reasonable man under the circumstances; and if the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff failed to take such precautions and that the injury which the jury may believe from the evidence the plaintiffs have suffered was thereby increased; the defendants are not responsible in damages for the amount of such increased injury—the burden of proof is upon the defendants to establish by a preponderance of legal evidence that the injury caused by deposit of debris from defendant's operations has been increased in whole or in part by failure by plaintiffs to take such reasonable precautions."

The criticism made upon the instruction given by the court is that it left to the jury the question of whether or not the plaintiffs had been guilty of contributing to the injury done them by the defendants in failing to remove certain trees which had fallen into the stream, blocking it and thereby causing the water and the deposits therein to extend over more land than they would have done if the trees had been removed, since the evidence showed that the plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence in not so removing the trees as a matter of law.

We do not think that under the evidence the court would have been justified in taking that question away from the jury and holding that the plaintiffs were per se guilty of negligence in not removing the trees and thereby mitigating their damages. Under the circumstances disclosed by the record that was a question for the jury, and the instruction given fairly submitted it to them.

[8] The action of the court in permitting S. P. Maury to testify as an expert is assigned as error.

The defendants had introduced evidence tending to show that it was practically impossible for them to operate their mines without polluting the waters of Contrary creek. Maury was introduced by the plaintiffs for the purpose of controverting that contention, and gave some evidence which tended to do so, but his testimony was objected to upon the ground that it did not appear from his testimony that he had had any experience in mining iron pyrites or sulphur ore. It appeared that he was a scientific and practical engineer of long experience, and though he did not claim to be a mining engineer, he had been for many years a member of the American Society of Mining Engineers; that while he had no experience in filtering or purifying water from mines, he had been a city engineer and had experience in filtering and cleansing water for drinking purposes. He may not have been very highly qualified to speak as an expert upon the question as to which he was permitted to testify, yet we cannot say that it clearly appears that he was not a competent witness, and unless we can so declare, under the well-settled rule of this court permitting him to testify as an expert would furnish no sufficient ground for reversal. Locomotive Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 641, 27 S. E. 509; Va. Iron & Coal Co. v. Tomlinson, 104 Va. 249, 51 S. E. 362; Savage v. Bowen, 103 Va. 540, 49 S. E. 668; Clinchfield Coal Co. v. Wheeler, 108 Va. 448, 62 S. E. 388.

[8] But if he were clearly an incompetent witness, his evidence could not have prejudiced the defendants, since we have seen in disposing of the last preceding assignment of error that it was immaterial whether the defendants could or could not operate their mines without polluting the waters of Contrary creek, as it was charged with doing; for if they could not that gave them no right to inflict the injuries complained of.

[10] The next assignment of error, as we understand it, is based upon the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict because it was jointly against both the plaintiffs in error for the whole damages suffered, instead of against each for the injury, if any, caused by each.

There was evidence sufficient to justify the jury in finding that each of the plaintiffs in error had inflicted injury upon the defendants in error by polluting the stream, but it does not appear—indeed it is not contended—that the plaintiffs in error were joint wrongdoers. The instruction asked for by the plaintiffs upon this point and given by the court without objection treated the defendants as several wrongdoers, and told the jury, that "if it was possible to determine from the evidence what specific amount of damage has been caused by any one of the defendants, they should assess against such defendant the amount for which it was responsible, but if it is impossible to determine in what proportions the defendants have contributed to the injuries, each who has contributed in any degree to the injury is responsible for the whole injury, and this although his act alone might not have caused the entire injury, and though without fault on his part the damage would have resulted from the act of another."

At the time this case was tried (May, 1909), the case of Pulaski Coal Co. v. Gibboney, 110 Va. 448, 66 S. E. 73, had not been decided, which holds that if several mining companies, acting independently, cast their refuse into a stream, thereby causing injury to a lower riparian owner, each is liable only for the damage done by its acts and not for the result of the acts of others. While, as stated in that case, the weight of authority is in favor of the doctrine announced, the cases are not in harmony upon the subject, some holding that where several mineowners contribute to the pollution of a stream, they are liable either jointly or severally for all the damages caused the lower riparian owner, especially where it is impossible to determine in what proportion each contributed to the injury. See Day v. Louisville Coal & Coke Co., supra, where authorities sustaining that view are cited.

The instruction given seems to have been based upon the principle announced in Grand Trunk Co. v. Cummings, 106 U. S. 700, 1 Sup. Ct. 493, 27 L. Ed. 266, in which it was held, that where separate and independent acts of negligence of two parties are the direct cause of a single injury to a third person, and it is impossible to determine in what proportion each contributed to the injury, either is responsible for the whole injury; and this although his act alone might not have caused the entire injury, and although without fault on his part the same damage would have resulted from the act of another. Whether the rule announced in Pulaski Anthracite Coal Co. v. Gibboney, supra, would control, where it is impossible to determine in what proportion each of several wrongdoers had contributed to the injury complained of, need not be considered in this case, since the instruction given was not objected to by the defendants. The defendants must be treated, therefore, as having impliedly assented to the proposition laid down in the instruction, and they will not be heard here for the first time to question its correctness. See Wallen v. Wallen, 107 Va. 131, 57 S. E. 596; Montague, etc., v. Allan, etc., 78 Va. 592, 49 Am. Rep. 384; Lambert v. Cooper, 70 Va. 61, 66; Clark v. Sleet, 99 Va. 381, 38 S. E. 183.

[11] The remaining assignment of error is to the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict of $800 because not sustained by the evidence. Without discussing in detail the large mass of testimony taken on that subject, it is sufficient to say that while there is a great diversity of opinion among the witnesses, and we might, if upon the jury, have given smaller damages, we cannot say that the verdict is without evidence to support it. While this court has the right to pass upon the evidence in the case, it is well settled by a long line of decisions that it will not reverse the judgment of the trial court and grant a new trial because the verdict is contrary to the evidence or without evidence to support it, except in a case of plain deviation from or palpable insufficiency of evidence, and not in a doubtful case merely because the court, if on the jury, would have given a different verdict. ball & Fink v. Friend, 95 Va. 125, 143, 144, 27 S. E. 901, and cases cited; C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Williams, 108 Va. 689, 62 S. E. 796.

The judgment complained of is affirmed. Affirmed.

NORFOLK & PORTSMOUTH TRACTION CO. v. C. B. WHITE & BROS., Incorporated.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1912.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 230*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—NOTICE.

Where defendant's deed recited that it was the intent of his grantor to convey all the property acquired by said grantor under a certain recorded deed, and that the property was subject to any easements created by the occupancy of a street railway, and the recorded deed referred to contained no reference to the easement of the street railway, it merely gave notice to the grantee that the street railway was in possession of part of the land conveyed, but not as to the railway's title.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 232*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—RECORDING OF DEED—POSSESSION AS EVIDENCE OF TITLE.

Code 1904, §§ 2463, 2464, 2465, respectively, provide that every contract for the sale or conveyance of real estate, not in writing shall be void as to bona fide purchasers and creditors; that any such contract, if in writing, from the time it is admitted to record shall be, as against creditors and purchasers, as valid as a deed conveying the property covered by the contract; and that every such contract in writing, or deed conveying any estate or term of years, as to subsequent purchasers and creditors, shall be void, unless duly recorded, provided that the possession of any such estate, without notice of other evidence of title, shall not be notice to subsequent purchasers. Held that, while the proper office of a proviso is to modify or restrain the enacting clause or preceding matter, and a proviso to a particular section does not apply to others, unless it is clear that its effect was intended to extend beyond the section immediately preceding it yet the proviso in this case applies to all of the preceding sections, because all were intended to perfect registry laws, and section 2463 was intended to place the purchaser of land under a parol agreement in the same condition as purchasers under a writing who had failed to record it; and hence the mere possession of a purchaser of land under a parol contract is not notice to a subsequent bona fide purchaser.

Appeal from Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Bill by the Norfolk & Portsmouth Traction Company against C. B. White & Bros., Incorporated. From a decree sustaining a demurrer to the bill, complainant appeals. Affirmed.

Williams & Tunstall and H. W. Anderson, for appellant. Tazewell Taylor, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. This is an appeal from a decree sustaining a demurrer to an amended bill filed by the appellant to restrain the appellee from prosecuting an action of ejectment to recover a small strip of land over which the appellant alleges that it has a perpetual right of way, acquired under a parol purchase from D. C. Foreman, who subsequently sold and conveyed the land over which the right of way passes to the John L. Roper Lumber Company, which company conveyed the land to the appellee.

The ground relied on to obtain the relief sought is that when the appellee acquired title to the land it had notice of the appellant's rights therein, by reason of a provision in the deed of the appellee and the fact that the appellant was in possession of the right of way, and was operating its street car line over it at that time.

[1] The appellee's deed contains the following statement, viz.:

"It is the intention of this deed to convey unto the parties of the second part all of the property acquired by the said party of the second part by a certain deed made to it by D. C. Foreman and wife dated on the 18th day of April, 1902, and of record in the office of the clerk of the corporation court of the city of Norfolk, Virginia, in Deed Book 134-B, page 222, to which reference is hereby made as part hereof, together with any additional rights, privileges or appurtenances obtained after the execution of the said deed by virtue of the change of the port warden's line, as made and adopted by the board of harbor commissioners on the 11th day of July, 1904, and subject to any easements (if any) acquired by the Berkley Street Railway by virtue of its occupancy of a part of said property, as shown on said plat, with its street railroad, the said party of the first part having given the said Berkley Street Railway no right so to occupy, or made no conveyance to it of any interest therein.

"The party of the first part covenants that it is seized in fee simple of the aforesaid property; that the same is free from incumbrances; that it will execute such further assurances thereof as may be requisite and necessary, and that it will warrant generally the title thereto."

The only effect of the language quoted, as we construe it, and as seems to be conceded by the petition of the appellant for the appeal, when read in connection with the deed of Foreman to the appellee's grantor, which neither reserved nor made mention of the appellant's right of way, was, so far as it affects this case, to give notice to the appellee that the appellant was in the possession of a part of the land conveyed. The question, therefore, to be determined upon this appeal is whether or not a vendee of an interest in land of a greater extent than a term of five years, under a verbal contract, who has paid the purchase price, and is in possession of such interest, has superior rights to a subsequent grantee of the land who has no other evidence of the former's title than his possession.

[2] The decision of this question depends upon the effect of the proviso to section 2465 of Pollard's Code. If, as contended by the counsel of the appellant, that proviso only applies to possession taken under such contracts as are mentioned in section 2465, and not to possession taken under such contracts as are described in section 2463, then the amended bill stated a case entitling the appellant to the relief sought.

Sections 2463, 2464, and 2465 of the Code are as follows:

"Sec. 2463. Contracts in consideration of marriage, or for the sale of real estate, and so forth, void as to creditors and purchasers unless in writing. Every contract, not in writing, made, in respect to real estate or goods and chattels, in consideration of marriage, or made for the conveyance or sale of real estate, or a term therein of more than five years, shall be void, both at law and in equity, as to purchasers for valuable consideration without notice and creditors.

"Sec. 2464. If in writing and recorded, as valid as deeds. Any such contract, if in writing, shall, from the time it is duly admitted to record, be, as against creditors and purchasers, as valid as if the contract was a deed conveying the estate or interest embraced in the contract.

"Sec. 2465. Contracts, deeds, and so forth, that are void as to creditors and purchasers unless recorded. Every such contract in writing and every deed conveying any such estate or term, and every deed of gift, or deed of trust, or mortgage conveying real estate or goods and chattels, and every bill of sale or contract for the sale of goods and chattels when the possession is allowed to remain with the grantor (and any such bill of sale or contract shall be in writing and signed by the vendor), shall be void as to subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, and creditors, until and except from the time that it is duly admitted to record in the county or corporation wherein the property embraced in such contract, deed, or bill of sale may be: Provided, that the possession of any such estate or term, without notice of other evidence of title, shall not be notice to said subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration."

As will be observed, section 2463 relates to contracts not in writing, while the provisions of sections 2464 and 2465 relate to written instruments.

Those sections are the same now as they were when the case of Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 397, 21 S. E. 813, 50 Am. St. Rep. 846, was decided, except the language italicized in section 2465. That section was amended by adding that language after the decision in the case of Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 397, 21 S. E. 813, 50 Am. St. Rep. 846 was rendered. Acts of Assembly 1895-96, p. 842; 1897-98, p. 833; and 1899-1900, p. 89.

In that case it was held that a purchaser for value of real property in the possession of another was put upon his inquiry as to the rights of the one in possession, and is affected with knowledge of whatever rights such possessor has; and such knowledge was held to be the same in effect as the notice which is imputed by the registry laws. The object of that amendment of section 2465, as generally understood by the courts and the legal profession, was to abolish the common-law doctrine of Chapman v. Chapman, and to provide that the possession of such estate or term, without notice of other evidence of title in such occupant, should not be notice to such subsequent purchaser for valuable consideration.

The contention of appellant's counsel is that the proviso in question only applies to a possession under a written instrument, such as is described in section 2465, of which the said proviso is a part, and that the common-law doctrine of Chapman v. Chapman is still in force as to contracts (unwritten) mentioned in 2463.

The general rule undoubtedly is that the appropriate office of a proviso is to restrain or modify the enacting clause or preceding matter, and that a proviso to a particular section does not apply to other sections. But if, from the context and a comparison of all the provisions relating to the same subject-matter, it is clear that it was intended to give the proviso an effect beyond the phrase immediately preceding it, or a scope beyond the section of which it is a part, it will be construed as restraining or qualifying preceding sections relating to the same subject-matter of the proviso, or as tantamount to the enactment of a separate section, without regard to its position and connection. Wartensleben v. Haithcock, 80 Ala. 565, 1 South. 38; Mayor v. Cumberland, 34 Md. 381; U. S. v. Babbit, 1 Black, 55, 61, 17 L. Ed. 94; Banking Co. v. Smith, 128 U. S. 174, 181, 9 Sup. Ct. 47, 32 L. Ed. 377; U. S. v. Whitridge, 197 U. S. 135, 143, 25 Sup. Ct. 406, 49 L. Ed. 696.

One of the objects of section 2463 was to abolish the doctrine of Floyd v. Harding, 69 Va. 401, and to place a purchaser of land under a parol contract, as to purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice, and creditors, in the same condition as purchasers under a writing, who had failed to register it as provided by sections 2464 and 2465. All three sections were intended to render more nearly perfect our registry laws, and might very properly have been embraced in one section. Sections 2464 and 2465 are so connected with and dependent upon section 2463 that they must be read with it, in order to ascertain what is meant by the terms "any such contract" and "every such contract in writing," as used in those sections, respectively. It is clear that before the proviso was added to section 2465 a person in possession of land under a contract, not in writing, and one in possession under a contract in writing, not recorded, were in the same condition as to subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice, and creditors. The doctrine of Floyd v. Harding, supra, having been abolished, there is no reason why the possession of a purchaser of land under a contract, not in writing, should have any greater weight as evidence in determining the good faith of a subsequent purchaser than the possession of a purchaser under a written contract. There was not only no reason when the proviso was enacted why it should not apply alike to the possession of both classes of purchasers, but, unless it be so construed, it will fail to accomplish one of the objects for which, as before stated, it was passed, viz., to abolish the common-law doctrine of Chapman v. Chapman, supra; for in that case the prior purchaser was in possession under a contract not in writing.

For the foregoing reasons, the court is of opinion that the proviso in question was intended to apply, and should be construed as applying, to the possession of a prior purchaser of land, whether his purchase was under an unwritten contract, such as is mentioned in section 2463, or under a written instrument, such as is described in section 2465.

The court is further of opinion that the contract set up by the appellant was a contract "made in respect to real estate," within the meaning of sections 2463 and 2465 of the Code. 2 Minor on Real Property, §§ 97, 100; 2 Minor's Inst. 28.

It follows from what has been said that the court is of opinion that there is no error in the decree complained of, and that it must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

Error to Corporation Court of Danville.

Action by W. T. Lewis against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

William Leigh, for plaintiff in error. B. H. Custer and R. W. Peatross, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This case is before us for the second time. See 110 Va. 847, 67 S. E. 357. On the former hearing the judgment was reversed for error in the instructions. The last trial resulted, like the first, in a judgment against the defendant company, which this writ of error brings under review.

In the view we take of the case, it is only necessary to consider the assignment of error which calls in question the action of the lower court in refusing to set aside the verdict and grant the defendant a new trial.

The action was brought by W. T. Lewis to recover damages for an injury which he alleges was brought about by the negligence of the defendant company. There is no material difference between the facts established on the two trials. They are sufficiently stated in the former opinion of this court, and need not be repeated here, except so far as may be necessary in disposing of the question now under consideration.

It is not alleged that the shifting engine and cars were improperly operated, or that the particular car which the plaintiff was attempting to mount was out of order or of an improper width, or that the switch was out of repair. The plaintiff was in the act of mounting a shifting box car when it was passing a switch, and the sole negligence charged is that the defendant company placed and maintained the switch, which it is alleged struck the plaintiff, too close to its track, and that the switch was too high. The evidence shows that the appliance was a "Ramapo" switch stand, that was in common use by the defendant and other railroads in their yards; that it was placed seven feet from the center of the track, which was the distance from the track commonly adopted for placing all such switches, thereby leaving a space of two feet between the lamp and the side of the car, which was a reasonably safe clearance for passing trains; that the switch stand was four feet and one inch high, including the lamp or target on top; and that this was the height of all such switches used on the railroad yards mentioned. Not only is this switch stand shown to be one of a class in common use by the defendant and other roads, and situated at a distance from the track commonly adopted by such roads, but it appears that the point of its location was where the greatest amount of work was done on the yards, and that it had been in that location for about two years without complaint and without accident to any one.

The evidence for the plaintiff tends to show that this class of switch was being superseded by the "New Century" switch, which was better liked and had been largely adopted by the defendant and other companies. This is not controverted; but it is none the less an established fact that the "Ramapo" switch stand is still in common use and is still regarded as a reasonably safe appliance.

[1, 2] It is well settled that the master is not bound to use the newest and best appliances. He performs his duty when he furnishes those of ordinary character and reasonable safety, and reasonable safety means safe according to the usages of the business. His duty is also to use ordinary care to provide a reasonably safe place in which his servant is to work, considering the character of work in which the servant is engaged, and he is liable for injuries to the servant resulting from his failure to exercise such care. Absolute safety is unattainable, and employers are not insurers. They are liable for negligence, and the unbending test of negligence in methods, machinery, and appliances is the ordinary usage of the business. Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. 869, 70 L. R. A. 999; N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Cromer, 99 Va. 763, 40 S. E. 54; Norfolk Traction Co. v. Ellington, 108 Va. 245, 61 S. E. 779, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 117; Southern Ry. Co. v. Lewis, 110 Va. 847, 67 S. E. 357.

The plaintiff endeavored, but failed, to show that the car he was attempting to mount was of more than ordinary width, thereby diminishing the space between it and the switch. It appears that the car in question was an ordinary box car of the defendant company, belonging to what is known as the "14,000 series," which series was in general use by railroad companies. The car being used at the time of the accident was not measured, but one of that series was; the measurement showing that cars of that width would not diminish or obstruct the space provided for between the switch and passing cars, but would leave a clearance of two feet, which was the standard clearance commonly adopted by the defendant and other companies as reasonably safe, and sufficient if the brakeman exercise ordinary care in performing his duty.

[3, 4] One who affirms negligence as the basis of an action for damages must establish it. We are of opinion that the evidence in this case fails to show that the defendant was guilty of any negligence which contributed to the injury complained of by the plaintiff. Under such circumstances there is no liability, and there can be no recovery.

The judgment complained of must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial, if the plaintiff be so advised, to be had not in conflict with this opinion.

Reversed.

POTTS v. COMMONWEALTH

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 23, 1911.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 146*)—MURDER—INSTRUCTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

It was not error to instruct that, if the jury believed from the evidence that the killing was done with a deadly weapon, then the law presumes it was done with malice; and it was for the defense to satisfy the minds of the jury that it was not done with malice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 265-271; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 778*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SHIFTING BURDEN OF PROOF.

An instruction that if the jury believed that the commonwealth had proven beyond reasonable doubt that decedent was killed by accused with a deadly weapon in his previous possession, and accused relied upon self-defense, the jury must be satisfied from the evidence that the defense was a true one, was improper, as shifting the burden of proof to accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 778.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 308*)—PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE—OPERATION.

The presumption of accused's innocence follows him through every stage of the prosecution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 781; Dec. Dig. § 308.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 327*)—PLEA OF NOT GUILTY—EFFECT.

A plea of not guilty denies every essential allegation in the indictment, and places upon the prosecution the burden to prove accused's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; and that burden can never be imposed on accused, though the evidence may shift from one side to the other, to meet the varying exigencies of the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 720; Dec. Dig. § 327.*]

5. HOMICIDE (§ 151*) — BURDEN OF PROOF — SELF-DEFENSE.

The rule that the burden to prove accused's guilt is upon the prosecution throughout the trial is not affected by the rule that, where self-defense is pleaded, accused must set it up by affirmative proof, unless the fact appears on the commonwealth's own evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 151.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Norfolk County.

Shirley Potts was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he brings error. Reversed.

John W. Hopper, for plaintiff in error.
The Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

WHITTLE, J. The plaintiff in error, Shirley Potts, brings error to a judgment of conviction of murder in the second degree, for which he was sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for the term of 18 years.

[1, 2] At the instance of the commonwealth's attorney, the jury were instructed as follows:

First. "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the commonwealth has proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the deceased was killed by the accused with a deadly weapon in his previous possession, and that the accused relies upon the defense of self-defense to excuse the act, then the jury are instructed that their minds must be satisfied from the evidence that the said defense is a true one;" and,

Second. "The court instructs the jury that, if they believe from the evidence that the killing was done with a deadly weapon, then the law presumes it was done with malice, and it is for the defense to satisfy the minds of the jury that it was not done with malice."

The giving of both these instructions was made the ground of exception, and constitutes the first assignment of error.

The last instruction, with some change of language, is the equivalent of instructions approved in Hill's Case, 43 Va. 595, Bristow's Case, 56 Va. 634, Honesty's Case, 81 Va. 284, and a long line of Virginia decisions.

[3-5] But we are of opinion that the circuit court erred in giving the first instruction. It is a fundamental principle of criminal law that a person charged with the commission of crime is presumed to be innocent; and that presumption follows the accused through every stage of the prosecution. Moreover, the plea of not guilty denies every essential allegation in the indictment, and lays upon the prosecution the burden of proving the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt. That burden is continuous, and can never be imposed upon the accused, although the evidence may shift from one side to the other, to meet the varying exigencies of the trial.

The rule is stated with exceptional clearness and force in State v. Wingo, 66 Mo. 181, 27 Am. Rep. 329, where it is said: "That it devolves upon the state to establish by evidence the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt will not be controverted. The defendant by his plea of not guilty puts in issue every material allegation in the indictment. He is not required to plead specially any matter of justification or excuse. The case is not divided into two parts—one of guilt, asserted by the state; the other of innocence, asserted by the accused. He does not plead affirmatively that he is innocent, but negatively that he is not guilty; and on that issue, and that alone, the jury are to try the case throughout. There is no shifting of the burden of proof. It remains upon the state throughout the trial. The evidence may shift from one side to the other. The state may establish such facts as must result in a conviction, unless the presumption they raise be met by evidence; but still the burden of proof is on the state to establish the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt."

This rule is not affected by the modification that in cases of homicide, where the defense of self-defense is interposed, unless the fact appears from the commonwealth's own evidence, it is incumbent upon the accused to set it up by affirmative proof. For the evidence so introduced by the defendant must be considered and weighed by the jury, along with all the other evidence in the case, in determining the ultimate proposition, whether the evidence as a whole raises a reasonable doubt on their minds as to the guilt of the accused.

This principle is recognized in Litton's Case, 101 Va. 833, 849, 44 S. E. 923, 927, where the court sustained an instruction which told the jury: "That when the commonwealth has proved that the accused has committed a homicide, and it does not appear from the circumstances given in evidence by the commonwealth that the killing was of a lower degree than murder in the second degree or in self-defense, then it is prima facie murder in the second degree, and the burden is cast upon the accused to prove that it was below murder in the second degree or in self-defense; and if the commonwealth seeks to elevate the offense to murder in the first degree, the burden is upon it to do so. Yet when the evidence is all in, then, if the evidence both for the commonwealth and the accused leave a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the accused, the jury must find the prisoner not guilty."

The principle enunciated in the concluding paragraph of the instruction in Litton's Case is supported by the great weight of authority. Many of the cases on the subject are collected and reviewed in a comprehensive note to the case of Commonwealth v. Palmer, 222 Pa. 299, 71 Atl. 100, 128 Am. St. Rep. 809, found in 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 483.

The instruction under review does not incorporate the qualification adverted to, and the practical effect of the omission is to impose upon the accused the burden of proving that he is not guilty.

For this error, the judgment must be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider the remaining assignment of error, that the verdict is contrary to the evidence.

WILLIAMS PRINTING CO. et al. v. SAUNDERS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1912.)

1. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 104*)—EVIDENCE—MALICE—OTHER PUBLICATIONS.

Libels other than those declared on, whether published before or after the bringing of suit, including libels on third parties, are admissible to show malice, and the general character of the publication issued by defendant.

2. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§§ 6, 33*)—LIBEL PER SE—CHARGING OFFENSES.

The declaration in libel alleged that defendant published an article headed "S. and L.—Boss and Lieutenant," S. being plaintiff, and also an article stating that a certain person, a saloonkeeper, was plaintiff's partner, the article being entitled "G., Polcy King—Partner of S. in Stock Farm," and also an article, entitled "Buying Votes in M. and R.," which charged by innuendo that plaintiff would buy votes to get re-elected to the Democratic executive committee of the city. Held, that the charge must have been injurious to plaintiff's reputation, and was actionable per se.

3. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 32*) — GENERAL DAMAGES—LOSS OF BUSINESS OR PROFITS.

Evidence of general loss of customers or profits is general, not special, damage, and is admissible in proof of general damages, where the words charged are actionable per se.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

4. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 100*) — ACTIONS—ISSUES—PROOF—TRUTH.

Under Code 1904, § 3375, providing that defendant may justify by "alleging and proving" that the words written were true, and, after notice of intent to do so, may show in mitigation an apology offered to plaintiff before the action, the truth cannot be shown under a plea of not guilty, but only under a special plea of justification.

5. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 48*) — PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS — DISCUSSING POLITICAL CANDIDATES.

A publication in good faith of the truth as to the qualifications of a candidate for public office is not libel, being qualifiedly privileged.

6. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 34*)—"PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION."

"Privileged communications" are of four classes, to wit, where the publisher of the slander acted in the bona fide discharge of a public or private, legal or moral, duty, or in the prosecution of his own interests; second, statements by an employer with reference to the character of a servant who has been in his employment; third, words used in the course of a legal or judicial proceeding; and, fourth, publications duly made in the course of parliamentary proceedings.

7. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 48*)—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS—QUALIFIED PRIVILEGE—CANDIDATE FOR OFFICE.

While the privileged character of a publication may be such as to absolutely bar an action, as where it is absolutely privileged, as in the case of words used in legal, judicial, or parliamentary proceedings, the right to comment on the character and qualifications of a candidate for public office is only qualifiedly privileged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 146; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

8. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 101*) — MALICE—PRESUMPTION — PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

There is no presumption of malice if the publication is even qualifiedly privileged, so that plaintiff must prove malice in order to recover.

9. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 123*) — ACTIONS—JURY QUESTION—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

10. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 48*)—WORDS LIBELOUS—CRITICISM OF POLITICAL CANDIDATE.

16. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 50*)—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

Error to Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond.

Action by Clyde Saunders against the Williams Printing Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

The declaration contained three counts. The first count set forth as a libel a publication headed "Saunders and Leaman—Boss and Lieutenant." The second count set forth as libel another publication, entitled "Andy Griffith, Policy King—Partner of Clyde Saunders in Stock Farm." The third count was under the statute for insulting words, and set forth the two publications above mentioned and a third publication, entitled "Buying Votes in Manchester and Richmond."

In said declaration it was stated, and was also proven by the evidence, that the plaintiff was, at the time of the publication, and had been for several years prior thereto, a member of the Democratic executive committee from Clay ward, in the city of Richmond, and was, at the time of said publication, a candidate for re-election upon said committee. Each of said articles was published in a certain periodical, entitled "The Idea," issued weekly by the said defendant A. A. Yoder, and was printed by the said Williams Printing Company in the ordinary course of business. It was alleged that they were so published to injure the plaintiff, and "to prevent him, the said plaintiff, from being chosen by the voters of his ward as a member of said Democratic executive committee at an election" soon thereafter to be held.

Meredith & Cocke, for plaintiffs in error. Scott, Buchanan & Cardwell and David H. Leake, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the law and equity court of the city of Richmond, rendered in an action for libel brought by Clyde Saunders against Rufus O. Williams and Roy H. Williams, partners doing business as the Williams Printing Company, and Adon A. Yoder. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for $1,600.

During the progress of the trial, the defendants reserved a number of exceptions to the rulings of the court, the propriety of which will be the subject of inquiry.

The declaration contains three counts. The first two set forth as libels certain publications which were printed and published by the Williams Printing Company, and of which Yoder was the author. The third count is under the statute for insulting words, and sets forth the publications mentioned in the first and second counts and one peculiar to itself, entitled "Buying Votes in Manchester and Richmond."

There was no demurrer to the declaration, and the only plea was that of not guilty; but the defendants, at the request of the plaintiff, stated their grounds of defense as follows: (1) Not guilty; (2) privileged communication; (3) fair or proper criticism or comment upon the plaintiff when running for public office or position; (4) no malice; and (5) erroneous construction of the words of the publication. No plea of justification was filed; the defendants deeming it unnecessary so to do.

[1] Numerous exceptions were taken to the introduction of evidence offered by the defendant in error and admitted by the court, despite the objection of plaintiffs in error. They may be considered under three heads: (1) Articles published in the Idea of and concerning the defendant in error, Saunders, prior to the institution of the suit, other than those mentioned in his declaration; (2) articles published after the institution of the suit of and concerning the defendant in error; and (3) articles published which did not refer to defendant in error, but to others, and were admitted as tending to prove the general scope and character of the Idea as edited by Yoder and printed and published by the Williams Printing Company. All of these articles embraced in the three classes were admitted by the court for the purpose of showing malice, and for that purpose only, and the jury were instructed that the plaintiff could not recover for any words published, either before or after the bringing of the suit, except the words declared upon; and, with reference to those publications concerning other members of the community than the plaintiff, the jury were told that they might be considered as showing a reckless indifference to the rights of others, and as furnishing a basis for the inference that they were malicious in fact, but that, before such other publications could be considered, the jury must be satisfied from the evidence that they were false and defamatory.

In Newell on Libel and Slander, at page 331, it is said: "Any other words written or spoken by the defendant of the plaintiff, either before or after those sued on, or even after the commencement of the action, are admissible to show the animus of the defendant, and for this purpose it makes no difference whether the words tendered in evidence are themselves actionable or not, or whether they be addressed to the same party or to some one else. Such other words need not be connected with or refer to the defamatory matter sued on, provided they in any way tend to show malice in the defendant's mind at the time of publication. And not only are such other words admissible in evidence, but also the circumstances attending the publication, the mode or extent of their repetition. The more the evidence approaches proof of a systematic practice of libeling or slandering the plaintiff, the more convincing it will be."

Ogders on Libel and Slander (pages 270-273, inclusive) is to precisely the same effect, and adds: "The jury no doubt should be told, whenever the other words so tendered in evidence are in themselves actionable, that they must not give damages in respect of such other words, because they might be the subject-matter of a separate action; but the omission by the judge to give such a caution will not amount to a misdirection. But the defendant is always at liberty to prove the truth of such other words so given in evidence, for he could not plead a justification as to them, as they were not set out on the record."

"It must be remembered," says Ogders, "that this evidence of former or subsequent defamation is only admissible to determine quo animo the words sued on were published; that is, they are only admissible when malice in fact is in issue. If there is no question of malice, no such other libels would be admissible, unless they had immediate reference to the libel sued on; and even then it would be better that they should be set out in the statement of claim. * * * And it is now clear law that, whenever the question of malice or bona fides is properly about to be left to the jury, evidence of any previous or subsequent libel is admissible, even though it be more than six years prior to the libel sued on, and even though a former action has been brought for the libel now tendered in evidence, and damages recovered therefor. The law is the same in America." See Russell v. Macquister, 1 Campbell, 49, note; Camfield v. Bird, 3 C. & Kir. 56; 2 Starkie on Slander, p. 55; Pearson v. Lemaitre, 5 M. & Gr. 719.

Objection was made to questions asked the defendant in error, as follows:

"Q. Has that decline in your business been marked or otherwise? A. Very perceptible, commencing in July. The first notice the books show that trade had fallen off was in July.

"Q. What, in figures, was the amount of that diminution? A. About $4,000—three thousand, nine hundred and some dollars.

"Q. Can you state whether there was any other reason, either known to you or reasonably to be conceived by you, for that diminution, other than the publication of this libel? A. I know of none whatever, as I have lost no contract, and the contract work was excluded from that calculation. It was taken from the regular current trade work."

[2, 3] The words alleged and proved to have been used by the defendant must have been injurious to the plaintiff's reputation, and are therefore actionable per se; and the plaintiff may recover a verdict for substantial damages without giving any evidence of pecuniary loss. Odgers on Libel and Slander, § 289. And at page 314 the same author says: "Loss of custom or diminution of profits * * * is general, not special, damage, and can only therefore be proved where the words are actionable per se."

And in 25 Cyc. p. 506, it is said: "When the defamation complained of is one affecting plaintiff's business, from which the law presumes general damage, evidence of general diminution or loss of business is admissible in proof of general damages."

It is further to be observed here that the jury were instructed not to award the plaintiff speculative or conjectural profits, but only such sum, if any, as they believe from the evidence will compensate him by way of general damage for the injury, if any, occasioned by the publication.

[4] Before considering the instructions to the jury, we shall consider two propositions of law: First, is it permissible for the defendant to an action for defamation, such as that under consideration, to allege and prove, under the plea of not guilty, that the words spoken or written were true; or must he plead a special plea of justification?

The plaintiffs in error rely with confidence upon the case of Commonwealth v. Morris, 3 Va. 176, in support of their contention that the plea of justification is not necessary in this state, where the publication concerns a candidate for office. That case was an information filed against the defendant, who pleaded not guilty, on which the issue was joined, and tendered two special pleas, to the effect that it was lawful for him to write and publish the paper writing charged in the information to have been written and published by him, because he saith that all the charges therein set forth were true, and all the acts therein charged to have been done and committed were in fact and truth done and committed. The second plea was also one of justification, and differed only from the first, in that it recited that the plaintiff, at the time the writing in question was written and published, and before that time, was a public officer, to wit, the high sheriff of the county, and then set forth that the charges were true as in the first special plea. The circuit court adjourned to the general court, and requested its decision upon the following points: First. Whether the defendant to an indictment or information for a libel can in all cases plead the truth of the libel in justification. Second. If not, whether he can give the truth of such libel in evidence on the plea of not guilty. Third. Whether, in this particular case, the defendant can in either way, and which, give evidence of the truth of the matters stated in the writing alleged to be libelous.

The general court held as follows: "It is the unanimous opinion of the court that by the common law truth is no justification of a libel, and cannot, as such, be given in evidence on an indictment or information for the offense. In this commonwealth, the second article of the Bill of Rights having declared, 'that all power is vested in, and consequently derived from, the people, that magistrates are their trustees and servants, and at all times amenable to them,' it follows as a necessary consequence that the people have a right to be informed of the conduct and character of their public agents. In the case of an indictment or information for a libel against public officers, or candidates for public office, truth is a justification, and may be given in evidence as such under the general issue, and this forms an exception to the general rule established by the common law; but even in such case any libelous matter which does not tend to show that the person libeled is unfit for the office cannot be justified, because it is true."

In the note to that case it is said that, "Although, in a criminal prosecution for a libel, the truth forms no justification in England, in any case whatever, yet, in mitigation of the fine, it may be shown to the court, after the verdict rendered. In Virginia, the truth may be given in evidence before the jury, in mitigation of the fine, because here it is rendered, by Act of Assembly, the duty of the jury to assess the fine."

It is admitted that the plaintiff, Saunders, was a candidate for office and within the class referred to in Commonwealth v. Morris, and that the defendants are entitled to its protection, if that case is to be considered as establishing the law of this state in actions for defamation.

Since that case was decided, more than a century has elapsed, and, so far as we have been able to discover, it is the only reported case in our books of a criminal libel. Many civil suits for damages for defamation, however, are to be found in our reports, covering almost every conceivable aspect of the subject, and Commonwealth v. Morris appears never to have been cited. In Minor's Law of Crimes, it is referred to, under the head of "Offenses against the Public," at page 165. It is reported, also, in 5 Am. Dec. 515, with no other comment than the citation of Commonwealth v. Clap, 4 Mass. 163, reported, also, in 3 Am. Dec. 212, where a different conclusion was reached. Indeed, wherever we have found any mention made of Commonwealth v. Morris in digests, encyclopedias, or text-books, it has always been with reference to a criminal prosecution. Either that case must be held to apply only in prosecutions by the commonwealth, or its authority must be considered as completely overruled by subsequent decisions of this court.

In Bourland v. Eldson, 49 Va. 27, decided in 1851, all the Virginia authorities upon the subject of defenses in actions of slander were considered; Judge Allen, speaking of Cheatwood v. Mayo, 19 Va. 16, said: "The defendant offered in mitigation of damages, and not by way of justification, to prove facts which, if they did not altogether, almost established the truth of the charge. He could not offer such evidence in bar of the action, because he had failed to file the plea of justification. But, if permitted to introduce it in mitigation of damages, the same impression would be made on the minds of the jury, and the plaintiff could not know what defense he was to meet. The case therefore establishes that evidence falling short of a full justification, but tending to prove the truth of the words charged, and leaving that impression on the minds of the jury, is inadmissible, notwithstanding the declaration that it is offered in mitigation of damages, and not by way of justification."

The case of McAlexander v. Harris, 20 Va. 465, was to the same effect.

The syllabus of the case of Bourland v. Eldson, supra, is that: "In an action of slander, under the plea of not guilty, the defendant may, in mitigation of damages, prove any facts as to the conduct of the plaintiff, in relation to the transaction which was the occasion of the slanderous language complained of, which tend to excuse him for uttering the words, provided the facts do not prove or tend to prove the truth of the charge complained of, but in fact relieve the plaintiff from the imputation involved in it."

Language could not be used more strongly to establish the proposition that the truth of the charge cannot be shown under the plea of not guilty.

In Newell on Slander and Libel (page 651), it is said: "The defendant cannot prove, under the plea of the general issue at common law, the truth of the defamatory words, either in bar of the action or in mitigation of damages. If he desires to confess the publication of the defamatory words and avoid the consequences by asserting the truth of the same, he can do so under the plea of justification. The truth of the defamatory words is, if pleaded, a complete defense to any action of libel or slander, though alone it is not a defense in a criminal trial."

The same author, at page 652, says: "A justification must always be specially pleaded, and with sufficient particularity to enable the plaintiff to know precisely what is the charge he will have to meet. If the libel makes a vague general charge, as, for instance, that the plaintiff is a swindler, it is not sufficient to plead that he is a swindler. The defendant must set forth the specific facts which he means to prove, in order to show that the plaintiff is a swindler. The plea is always construed strictly against the party pleading it. It must justify the whole of the words to which it is pleaded, and set forth facts issuably."

It would seem, therefore, to be a dangerous plea, and one not lightly to be resorted to. It has the further effect, if not maintained, of being a strong circumstance going to establish malice, and it is not to be wondered at that cautious and astute counsel in difficult or doubtful cases do not rely upon it.

See 1 Starkie on Slander, 466, where the law is thus stated: "If the defendant means to rely on the truth of that which he has published, either in bar of action or mitigation of damages, he must plead it specially."

In Townshend on Slander and Libel (note to section 211), it is said, "The defense of truth must be pleaded, and cannot be given in evidence under the general issue, either in bar or in mitigation of damages," and in support of this proposition there is a great array of authorities, English and American.

In 4 Minor's Inst. (1st Ed.) pt. 1, at page 384, it is said: "It seems clear, therefore, that the Legislature designed to change the previous policy, as expounded in those cases of Brooks v. Calloway and Moseley v. Moss, and to allow and require the truth to be pleaded specially in bar of the action, as at common law. If so, the truth of the specific accusation cannot be given in evidence under the general issue in mitigation of damages, and much less can facts of bare suspicion." See Underwood v. Parks, 2 Strange, 1200, and the Virginia cases to which we have already referred; Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 153, 31 Am. Rep. 757; 1 Barton's L. Pr. § 126; Hogan v. Wilmoth, 57 Va. 80.

Authorities might be multiplied almost without limit to the same effect, but why should authority be cited when the controversy is covered by statute?

In the Code of 1849, p. 669, there was first enacted a statute, which has passed into our present Code as section §375, which declares, that: "In any action for defamation, the defendant may justify by alleging and proving that the words spoken or written were true, and (after notice in writing of his intention to do so, given to the plaintiff at the time of, or for pleading to such action), may give in evidence, in mitigation of damages, that he made or offered an apology to the plaintiff for such defamation before the commencement of the action. * * *

The language used, that "the defendant may justify by alleging and proving that the words spoken or written were true," plainly intends that the truth shall be specially pleaded; for if the Legislature had intended that the proof should be given in under the plea of not guilty there was no occasion to require that it should be alleged.

We conclude, therefore, that in this state, in an action of defamation, the truth of the publication, if relied upon by the defendant, either as a bar or in mitigation of damages, must be shown under a special plea of justification, and not under a plea of not guilty.

[5] The second contention upon the part of plaintiff in error is that, as Saunders was a candidate for office, the occasion of the publications complained of was privileged; and that may be conceded. A candidate for office is considered as putting his character in issue, so far as with respect to his fitness or qualification for the office he seeks, and publications of the truth on this subject, with the honest intention of informing the people, are not a libel.

"A privileged communication is one made in good faith upon any subject-matter in which the party communicating has an interest, or in reference to which he has, or honestly believes he has, a duty, to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, and which contains matter which, without the occasion upon which it is made, would be defamatory and actionable." Newell on Libel and Slander, p. 388.

[6] Privileged communications are of four classes: First. Where the author or publisher of the alleged slander acted in the bona fide discharge of a public or private duty, legal or moral, or in the prosecution of his own rights or interests. Second. Anything said or written by a master in giving the character of a servant who has been in his employment. Third. Words used in the course of a legal or judicial proceeding, however hard they may bear upon the party of whom they are used. Fourth. Publications duly made in the ordinary mode of parliamentary proceedings.

[7] The privilege may constitute a bar to an action—for instance, words used in the course of a legal or judicial proceeding, or publications made in the ordinary mode of parliamentary proceedings; but the privilege with which we are here to deal, which grows out of the fact that the plaintiff, Saunders, was a candidate for office, is known as a qualified privilege.

[8, 9] In all actions for defamation of character, whether by libel or slander, in order that damages may be recovered, malice must be alleged and proved. Where the communication is not privileged, malice may be presumed, but where the communication is privileged, even though it be but a qualified privilege, there is no presumption of malice, and in order to recover the plaintiff must prove actual malice or malice in fact. Whether or not a communication, oral or written, is privileged is a question for the court; and it is for the jury to say whether or not the privilege has been abused; that is to say, whether or not it was actuated by a malicious motive. Chaffin v. Lynch, 83 Va. 106, 1 S. E. 803; Tyree v. Harrison, 100 Va. 540, 42 S. E. 295.

[10] Publications of the truth regarding the character of a public officer, and relating to his qualifications for such office, made with intent to inform the people, are not libelous; but the publication of falsehood and calumny against public officers and candidates for public office is a very high offense. Commonwealth v. Clap, 4 Mass. 163, 3 Am. Dec. 212.

"The term 'privileged,' says Newell on Slander and Libel, at page 566, 'as used by the judges, does not mean privileged by reason of the occasion, in the strict legal sense of that term. The meaning really is that the words are not defamatory—that criticism is no libel. If such criticism was privileged in the strict sense of the word, it would in every case be necessary for the plaintiff to prove actual malice, however false and however injurious the strictures may have been; while the defendant would only have to prove that he honestly believed the charges himself, in order to escape all liability; and this clearly is not the law.'"

"Criticism and comment on well-known or admitted facts are very different things from the assertion of unsubstantiated facts. A fair and bona fide comment on a matter of public interest is an excuse of what would otherwise be a defamatory publication. The statement of this rule assumes the matters of fact commented upon to be somehow ascertained. It does not mean that a man may invent facts, and comment on the facts so invented in what would be a fair and bona fide manner on the supposition that the facts were true. If the facts, as a comment upon which the publication is sought to be excused, do not exist, the foundation fails. There is no doubt that the public acts of a public man may lawfully be made the subject of fair comment or criticism, not only by the press, but by all members of the public. But the distinction cannot be too clearly borne in mind between comment or criticism and allegations of fact, such as that disgraceful acts have been committed, or discreditable language used. It is one thing to comment upon or criticise, even with severity, the acknowledged or proved acts of a public man, and quite another to assert that he has been guilty of particular acts of misconduct. To state matters which are libelous is not comment or criticism." Newell, p. 568.

"So long as a writer confines himself to discussing the public conduct of public men, the mere fact that motives have been unjustly assigned for such conduct is not of itself sufficient to destroy this defense. A line must be drawn between criticism upon public conduct and the imputation of motives by which that conduct may be supposed to be actuated; one man has no right to impute to another, whose conduct may be fairly open to ridicule or disapprobation, base, sordid, and wicked motives, unless there is so much ground for the imputation that a jury shall find, not only that he had an honest belief in the truth of his statements, but that his belief was not without foundation." Newell, p. 572.

While discussing the general principles of the law of libel and slander pertinent to the case in hand, it will not be improper to refer to the "liberty of the press," which has been much urged in argument.

[11] The press has no exclusive privilege. It does not matter by whom the report is published; the privilege is the same, as a matter of law, for a private individual as for a newspaper. Newell, p. 552.

Speaking on this subject, Mr. Cooley says:

"A candidate for public office does not surrender his private character to the public, and he has the same remedy for defamation as before; and publication of false and defamatory statements concerning him, whether relating to his private character or public acts, is not privileged. * * *

"Liberty of the press is not license, and newspapers have no privilege to publish falsehoods or to defame under the guise of giving the news. It is held that the press occupies no better position than private persons publishing the same matter; that it is subject to the law, and if it defames it must answer for it."

Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) 448.

By "liberty of the press" indeed is merely meant that the publications in the press shall not be subject to an antecedent censorship, but, in the language of our Bill of Rights, "any citizen may freely speak, write and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right."

We come now to the consideration of instructions asked for by plaintiffs in error and rejected by the court, and those given to the jury by the court, to which the plaintiffs in error excepted.

[12, 13] Instruction No. 1, which was refused, was approved in Gatewood v. Garrett, 106 Va. 552, 56 S. E. 335, as applied to the facts appearing in that case, in which it seems that the evidence was not made a part of the record by proper bill of exceptions; but, as instructions are to be considered in the light of the facts proved, it may well be that an instruction proper upon one state of facts would be altogether improper upon a different state of facts. Then, too, the value of a case as a precedent is affected by the consideration that the precise point for which it is relied upon as authority was presented in argument and considered by the court. The opinion says that it was not denied in that case that the instruction asked for was a correct statement of the law, and, comparing the facts before us with those existing in Gatewood v. Garrett, no two cases could be more dissimilar.

Instruction No. 3, it is claimed, is also supported by the opinion in Gatewood v. Garrett, supra, and we accept as law the instruction as it appears in Gatewood v. Garrett. It declares that the conduct of candidates for public office is open to public criticism, and it is for the interest of society that their acts may be fully published with fitting comments or strictures; but one of the differentiating features between the case before us and Gatewood v. Garrett is that, while the comments and strictures in that case were fitting—that is to say, suitable and proper to the occasion—those set out in the declaration in this case transcend the bounds of propriety prescribed by law, are in excess of the right and duty of a citizen to make complaint of any misconduct or act showing a lack of qualification or fitness for office of a candidate, and attribute moral turpitude to the defendant in error.

[14] The second instruction asked for and refused is, we think, sufficiently covered by instruction No. 15, which was given by the court.

[15] Instruction No. 4 was properly refused, because it left it to the jury to say whether or not the publications were true, when, there being no plea of justification in the case, they are conclusively presumed to be false; and, secondly, that their verdict should be for the defendants, if Yoder's expressed belief was justified by the facts as the jury found them, or was such as he might reasonably and justly hold from such facts—"then the jury must hold that the occasion was privileged."

[16] The law is, as we have seen, that it is for the court to say whether or not the occasion is a privileged one, and, if it be one of privilege, whether a qualified or an absolute privilege, and by its instructions to guide the jury to a right conclusion. As the privilege with respect to the criticism of public officers, or candidates for public office, does not extend to the imputation of moral delinquency with reference to their private character, such imputations are libelous, and the party making them may be held liable therefor in a suit for slander, unless he can prove the charges to be true. In such case it is not sufficient to prove that the party publishing had good reason to believe and did believe them to be true, as a publication of this character is not even conditionally privileged. From the publication of such libelous charges, the law implies malice, as well as damages to the plaintiff; and the jury may, therefore, on proof of the publication, only render a verdict for substantial damages. Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 153, 31 Am. Rep. 757. And just here we will state that this case is one of unusual authority. It was an action for libel upon a man who was a candidate for the House of Delegates of West Virginia. The opinion was delivered by a judge of great distinction, and is a mine of learning and sound reasoning. It cites all of the Virginia cases upon the subject prior to the creation of the state of West Virginia; such cases being as binding authority in the new state as in the old. The case, therefore, may be accepted without hesitation as one of the highest authority.

Instruction No. 5 depends upon No. 4, and must fall with it.

No. 6, while rejected in the form in which it was offered, was given with an addendum in No. 10 of the instructions by the court, which is, we think, a correct and sufficient statement of the law.

Instruction No. 7 was properly refused, if for no other reason, because there is nothing in the evidence which would have warranted the jury in reaching any such conclusion as the instruction suggests.

We are of opinion that the cases and textbooks consulted establish the following propositions:

(1) That the truth of defamatory words, written or spoken, cannot be shown under the plea of not guilty, but that there must be a plea of justification.

(2) That it is the right and duty of the citizen to criticize public officers and candidates for public office, and that proper criticism is privileged, and imposes no liability, unless express malice be shown; that it is for the court to say whether or not the occasion is privileged, and for the jury to say whether or not it has been abused.

(3) That, while proper criticism of the conduct or fitness of public officers and candidates for public office is privileged, the privilege does not extend to the imputation of moral delinquency to such persons, and that he who attacks their private character and attributes to them moral turpitude must stand prepared to prove the truth of his statement under a plea of justification; otherwise the presumption is that the defamatory language, written or spoken, is false and will, without more, support a verdict for substantial damages.

(4) That the press enjoys no special privilege or immunity, but stands in all respects before the law upon the same footing as the great body of citizens.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed.

Affirmed.

ELSNER BROS. v. HAWKINS, Revenue Com'r, et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 11, 1912.)

1. PAWNBROKERS (§ 1*)—POLICE POWER—REGULATIONS.

The pawnbrokerage business, because of the opportunities it offers for the commission of crime and its concealment, is one which properly comes within the control of the police power of the state, and which is subject to the strictest regulation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pawnbrokers, Cent. Dig. § 1.*]

2. PAWNBROKERS (§ 2*)—POLICE POWER—DELEGATION OF POWER BY STATE—CITY CHARTER.

Under the charter of the city of Richmond the city council may enact suitable ordinances for the promotion of the safety, health, peace, good order, and morals of the city, and punish violations by any fine or penalty up to an amount limited by the charter. Held, the power delegated is broad enough to permit the city, in the interest of good order and the protection of its citizens, to provide that it shall be unlawful for pawnbrokers to deal in deadly weapons, and such an ordinance is a reasonable exercise of the power granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pawnbrokers, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 63*)—GOVERNMENTAL POWERS AND FUNCTIONS—JUDICIAL SUPERVISION.

Municipal corporations are prima facie the sole judges of the necessity and reasonableness of their ordinances, and as every intendment is in favor of the lawfulness of the exercise of power in making regulations to promote public health and safety, the courts will interfere with such action only in case of a clear abuse.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1378, 1379; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 592*)—POLICE POWER—CONFLICT OF ORDINANCE WITH STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

State Tax Bill (Code 1904, p. 2253) § 140, provides that no person shall sell pistols, dirks, or bowie knives without having first procured a license therefor and paid a privilege tax to the state. An ordinance of the city of Richmond provided that no such weapons should be sold in pawnshops. Pawnbrokers, who complied with the requirements of the statute, brought mandamus to compel the city officials to issue a license authorizing them to deal in such weapons. Held, the object of the statute was for the raising of revenue, not to give every person who paid the tax and obtained a license the right to carry on the business, notwithstanding police regulations to the contrary, and the ordinance was not void as in conflict with the statutory provisions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1311-1314; Dec. Dig. § 592.*]

Error to Hustings Court of City of Richmond.

Mandamus by Elsner Bros. against one Hawkins, Revenue Commissioner, and others. From a judgment dismissing the petition, plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Wyndham R. Meredith, for plaintiffs in error. H. R. Pollard and Minitree Folkes, for defendants in error.

HARRISON, J. The grand jury of the city of Richmond, having recommended, in the interest of the public safety, that pawnbrokers should not be allowed to deal in weapons which may be used for personal injury the council of the city passed an ordinance, approved April 18, 1911, providing that it shall be unlawful for any licensed pawnbroker, or any other person acting as pawnbroker, to receive as security, pledge, or pawn, or to purchase, sell, loan, or hire any pistol, dirk, bowie knife, razor, slung shot, or any weapon of like kind. Any person violating the provisions of this ordinance was made liable to a fine of not less than $5 nor more than $25 for each offense, recoverable before the police justice of the city.

The plaintiffs in error are a duly licensed firm of pawnbrokers, who had given the bond and complied with all the police regulations prescribed by the state statute, and had paid the license required both by the state and the city of Richmond.

Section 140 of the state tax bill (Code 1904, p. 2253) provides that no person, firm, or corporation shall sell pistols, dirks, or bowie knives without having first procured a license therefor. The sum of $20 per annum is required to be paid to the state as a special license tax for the privilege of transacting the business of selling pistols, dirks, or bowie knives by any such person, firm, or corporation, and any violation of the provisions mentioned is made a misdemeanor punishable by fine. Under this section 140 of the state tax bill the plaintiff applied to the proper officials of the city of Richmond for a special license authorizing them to deal in pistols, etc. Acting in obedience to the city ordinance of April 18, 1911, making it unlawful for any licensed pawnbroker to deal in pistols, etc., these city officials refused to issue the license asked for. Thereupon the plaintiffs in error applied to the hustings court for the city of Richmond for a writ of mandamus compelling the defendants in error to issue the license authorizing them to deal in pistols, etc. The hustings court having denied the writ of mandamus and dismissed the petition praying therefor, its judgment is brought under review by this writ of error.

The record shows that the ordinance of April 12, 1911, was passed by virtue of the police power which the city of Richmond deemed to be vested in it, and was intended to remedy to some extent the growing and dangerous practice, by the lawless and disorderly class in the community, of carrying concealed weapons.

The plaintiffs in error insist that the city of Richmond did not have the authority under its police power to pass the ordinance in question; that the statute of the state having made it lawful for a person, firm, or corporation to deal in pistols, etc., upon the payment of a license tax, the city of Richmond could not, under its police power, deny such privilege to pawnbrokers.

[1] The business of pawnbrokers, because of the facility it furnishes for the commission of crime and for its concealment, is one which belongs to a class where the strictest police regulation may be imposed. This is shown by our legislation, both state and local, on the subject, and by the adjudications of courts. Acts of Assembly 1904, p. 196 (Code 1904, p. 2232); Ordinances of Richmond City, c. 48, §§ 1, 2; Freund on Police Power, § 93; Lauder v. Chicago, 111 Ill. 291, 53 Am. Rep. 625; Grand Rapids v. Braudy, 105 Mich. 670, 64 N. W. 29, 32 L. R. A. 116, 55 Am. St. Rep. 472.

In the case last cited it is said "that it is a matter of common knowledge that thieves resort to these places to dispose of their stolen goods, and that unscrupulous and oftentimes criminal persons are engaged in the business. The business, therefore, comes expressly within the control of the police power of the state and is properly subject to reasonable rules and regulations."

[2] Very broad and comprehensive police powers are delegated by the Legislature to the city of Richmond. Under its charter the council has power to enact suitable ordinances to secure and promote the general welfare of the inhabitants of the city, such as they may deem proper for the safety, health, peace, good order, and morals of the community. In addition they have the power to make such ordinances and regulations as may be deemed desirable and suitable to prevent vice and immorality, to preserve public peace and good order, to prevent and quell riots, disturbances, and disorderly assemblages, etc. For a violation of any of its ordinances the council has power to prescribe any fine or penalty (except when a fine or penalty is otherwise provided for in the charter) not exceeding $500, and may provide that on failure to pay the fine or penalty imposed the offender shall be imprisoned in the jail of the city for any term not exceeding three calendar months.

The police powers delegated by these provisions to the city are, within its limits, quite equal to those possessed by the Legislature itself. They are certainly amply broad to cover and include the right of the city, in the interest of its good order and the protection of its citizens from violence, to provide that it shall be unlawful for any licensed pawnbroker, or other person acting as pawnbroker, to receive as security, pledge, or pawn, or to purchase, sell, loan, or hire, any pistol, dirk, bowie knife, etc. In view of the character of the business conducted by these dealers, where the criminally disposed can go and for a pittance procure a deadly weapon for a deadly purpose that he would not otherwise be able to obtain, the ordinance assailed is not only reasonable, but eminently wise, as tending to minimize the commission of crime in a populous city.

[3] The rule is generally recognized that municipal corporations are prima facie the sole judges respecting the necessity and reasonableness of their ordinances. Every intendment is to be made in favor of the lawfulness of the exercise of municipal power making regulations to promote the public health and safety, and it is not the province of courts, except in clear cases, to interfere with the exercise of the powers vested in municipalities for the promotion of the public safety. McQuillin on Ordinances, § 186; 2 Dillon on Mun. Cor. (5th Ed.) § 649; California Red Co. v. Sanitary Red Works, 199 U. S. 306, 319, 26 Sup. Ct. 100, 50 L. Ed. 204; Wagner v. Bristol Belt Line Co., 103 Va. 594, 598, 62 S. E. 391, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1278.

[4] The plaintiffs in error contend that under section 140 of the revenue bill, supra, any person, firm, or corporation can sell pistols, dirks, etc., by first procuring a license therefor; that the ordinance forbidding such a license to pawnbrokers is in conflict with the state law and therefore void, unless the city of Richmond had express power to enact the same.

This question was settled in this state more than 50 years ago. Mayo, Mayor, etc., v. James, 53 Va. 17. In that case Clinton James, a free negro, who had been duly licensed to keep a cook shop under the provisions of an act of assembly of April 17, 1853, complained that he had been unlawfully prosecuted before the mayor of the city of Richmond for the violation of an ordinance thereof, which provided that no negro should keep a cook shop within the city under the penalty of stripes, at the discretion of the mayor, insisting that the ordinance was in conflict with the act of assembly, and therefore void. The circuit court awarded a writ of prohibition in vacation, restraining the mayor from enforcing the ordinance, and upon the hearing refused to discharge the writ and gave judgment against the city. Upon appeal that judgment was reversed by this court, upon the ground that a statute requiring a license to keep a cook shop, and laying a tax upon it, is not in conflict with, and does not avoid, an ordinance of the city of Richmond, passed in pursuance of its charter, prohibiting or restricting the keeping of cook shops by free negroes within the city. In reaching this conclusion, Judge Moncure, speaking for a unanimous court, says: "The only object of the act was to aid in raising revenue by laying a tax on the business of keeping a cook shop. It was not the object or effect of the act to give to every person who paid the tax and obtained a license to keep a cook shop the right to do so, notwithstanding any police regulations which might otherwise lawfully be made for the good government of a city or town, much less to repeal or annul any such regulations in actual existence at the time of the passage of the act. If the ordinance would have been lawful, had there been no such act, it is lawful notwithstanding the act; for there is nothing in the act to render it unlawful. The business of keeping a cook shop before the passage of the act was a lawful business, which any man might pursue, subject only to such lawful police regulations as might be made in regard to its being carried on within the limits of a town. The effect of taxing it was to restrict, not to enlarge, the right of pursuing it, nor to exempt it from such lawful police regulations."

The case at bar is in all essential particulars like the case cited, and is controlled by it. The object of section 140 of the tax bill, like the act in Mayo v. James, supra, was to aid in raising revenue. It was not the purpose or effect of the act, in laying a tax on the business of selling pistols, dirks, etc., to give to every person, who paid the tax and obtained a license, the right to carry on such business notwithstanding any police regulations which might otherwise lawfully be made for the good government of a city or town. The ordinance assailed would have been lawful, had there been no section 140 of the tax bill, and it is lawful notwithstanding that act; for there is nothing in the act to render it unlawful or in conflict therewith. As said in Mayo v. James, supra, with respect to the keeping of cook shops in Richmond by free negroes, the propriety and necessity of regulating, restraining, or wholly interdicting the right of pawnbrokers to deal in pistols, dirks, etc., in the city of Richmond must be apparent to all.

For the foregoing reasons, we are of opinion that the ordinance of April 18, 1911, which is called in question by this proceeding, is not in conflict with section 140 of the tax bill, that the city council had the power under its charter to enact the same, and that the judgment of the hustings court of the city of Richmond, so holding, must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

THORNTON v. COMMONWEALTH

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1912.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 62*)—SURPLUSAGE.

Where an indictment charged an officer of a bank with a violation of Code 1904, §§ 1169, 1170, requiring banking corporations to render statements to the Corporation Commission, and punishing any banking officer making a false statement, an allegation charging a failure to comply with section 1160, requiring the directors once in three months to examine the moneys of the bank, and settle the cashier's accounts, must be treated as surplusage on demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§§ 133, 147*) — DEFECTS—SURPLUSAGE—MANNER OF RAISING OBJECTIONS.

Where an indictment contains surplusage, the remedy is by motion to strike the objectionable allegations or by motion to exclude testimony in support thereof, or by an instruction to disregard such allegations and evidence in support of them, but the objection cannot be reached by demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Dec. Dig. §§ 133, 147.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1091*)—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—REQUISITES.

Where the body of the evidence was not copied into a skeleton bill of exceptions signed by the judge or attached to the bill, but appeared in separate and distinct papers and in the stenographer's report of the evidence and not identified, the evidence was not a part of the record on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1091.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 450*) — OPINION EVIDENCE—CONCLUSIONS OF WITNESS.

On the trial of an officer of a bank for making a false statement of the financial condition of the bank, in violation of Code 1904, §§ 1169, 1170, a question asked a witness for the prosecution, "Taking all your information up to the present time, including your investigation into these books, have you been able to reach a conclusion that [accused] made a true statement as to the condition of this bank?" called for an opinion on an issue for the jury, and the allowance of an answer that the statement was not true was reversible error.

Error to Circuit Court, Charlotte County.

F. C. Thornton was convicted of crime, and he brings error. Reversed.

H. D. Flood and W. C. Carrington, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

KEITH, P. F. C. Thornton was indicted in the circuit court of Charlotte county for having made to the State Corporation Commission a false statement of the financial condition of the Charlotte Banking & Insurance Company, knowing it to be false, and he being the cashier of that institution. He demurred to this indictment, the demurrer was overruled, he pleaded not guilty, and upon the trial of that issue the jury found him guilty, and fixed his imprisonment in the state penitentiary for one year, and assessed a fine against him of $700, and to that judgment he has obtained a writ of error.

The first error assigned is to the judgment of the court overruling the demurrer to the indictment.

The prosecution relied upon sections 1160, 1169, and 1170 of the Code of 1904.

It is conceded, or if not conceded there can be no doubt, that the indictment states a case under the last two sections above referred to, the first of which requires that every bank and banking institution chartered under the laws of the state of Virginia and doing a banking business therein shall annually report to the State Corporation Commission its financial condition at such times as the State Corporation Commission may by its rules prescribe, identically as the national banks organized under the laws of the United States are required to make their statements to the Comptroller of the Currency. The statements are to be made in accordance with forms prescribed by the Corporation Commission, certified under oath by the president or cashier of the bank, and attested by at least three of its directors. It is made the duty of the Corporation Commission to call upon such companies, banks, and banking institutions for the statements mentioned, and at the time prescribed, and to have prepared such forms as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the law. The Corporation Commission is required at least once in every year, and at such other times as they may deem necessary, to cause to be examined each and every such bank and banking institution designated as a state depository, all the expense incident thereto to be borne by the bank or institution so examined.

By section 1170 it is provided that any such joint stock company, bank or banking institution, etc., failing to comply with the provisions of section 1169 for a period longer than 30 days after being called upon by the State Corporation Commission, shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000. The Corporation Commission is required to give notice of such default in some newspaper, as provided in the preceding section, and any officer of any such joint-stock company, bank, banking institution, etc., who knowingly makes a false statement of the condition of any such bank, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, upon conviction, shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned in the penitentiary not less than 1 nor more than 10 years.

[1] In the indictment under consideration, there is embraced a charge not only of failure to comply with the sections just cited (1169 and 1170), but there was a charge of failure to comply with section 1160, which is as follows: "The directors shall, once in three months at the least, cause an examination to be made of the moneys of the bank, and a settlement to be made of the accounts of the cashier, a statement of which examination and settlement shall be recorded with the proceedings of the board."

The contention of plaintiff in error is that section 1160 has no proper place in the indictment; that the offense for which he was tried and punished is fully provided for in sections 1169 and 1170; and that the introduction of section 1160 was and is prejudicial to his rights.

This may be true, but the objection cannot be availed of upon a demurrer to the indictment. That indictment, as we have said, states a sufficient case against the plaintiff in error. Such being the fact, the reference to section 1160 is surplusage, and does not vitiate the indictment. Stephens on Pleading, p. 424.

In Bishop's Criminal Procedure (4th Ed.) § 478, surplusage is defined to be "any allegation without which the pleading would remain adequate in law." And in section 479 it is said: "An indictment, either on a statute or at the common law, fully setting out the offense, is not rendered ill by the addition of matter aggravating it beyond the law's defining."

[2] While it cannot be reached by demurrer, there are other modes by which it can be done: By a motion to strike out the surplus statement or averment from the indictment; by a motion to exclude testimony sought to be introduced in support of such an averment; or by an instruction to the jury to disregard the averment and all evidence in support of it. Counsel for plaintiff in error recognized that the proceeding by demurrer could not be trusted to afford relief, and sought to accomplish the result by means of an objection to an instruction offered by the commonwealth; but with that aspect of the case we shall deal later on.

[3] During the progress of the trial 29 bills of exceptions were taken, and we are met at the threshold of the case with the objection upon the part of the commonwealth that in none of those bills are the papers or documents which are referred to, or the evidence of witnesses, so identified as to constitute a record proper for our consideration.

We regret that this difficulty is one of such frequent occurrence, and we shall not attempt to fix the responsibility for the omission or further animadvert upon the fact than to say that, while it is a matter of profound regret that such should be the case, we have no choice but to enforce the law as we find it. Those who are not responsible for the administration of justice in accordance with established modes of procedure easily dispose of such objections by denouncing them as technical, but while technical nothing can be of higher importance in the administration of justice than that the record upon which the courts are required to act should be ascertained with certainty, and so attested as to leave no doubt of its authenticity, in order that the law pertaining to it may be safely and intelligently declared and the rights of individuals and of society duly protected.

All of the bills of exceptions in this case, from the first to the last (except perhaps the fourth and ninth), hang upon bill of exceptions numbered 29, which is what is known as a skeleton bill—that is to say, it is one into which the evidence, whether documentary or the testimony of witnesses, is not copied into the bill itself, which is signed by the judge, but the body of the evidence, documentary and otherwise, appears in separate and distinct papers and in the stenographer's report of the evidence. It is obvious, therefore, that the mere signature of the judge to such a bill leaves it incomplete, and that it becomes necessary to identify the papers referred to and the evidence of the witnesses contained in the stenographer's report in such manner as to leave no doubt, when found in the record, that they constitute the papers and stenographer's report referred to in the bill.

In the body of bill of exceptions No. 29, it is said that "the commonwealth to maintain the issue joined on its part introduced the following evidence in chief, which is as follows, to wit: (Here insert the evidence introduced by the commonwealth as shown by the evidence written up by the stenographers and marked 'Stenographer's Report of Evidence, Nos. 1 and 2,' and identified by the signature of the judge of this court.) And thereupon the defendant to maintain his defense on the issue joined, introduced the following evidence, which is as follows, to wit: (Here insert all the evidence introduced by the defendant as shown by the said 'Stenographer's Reports of Evidence Nos. 1 and 2,' identified by the signature of the judge of this court.) And thereupon the commonwealth to further maintain the issue joined on its part introduced in rebuttal the following evidence, which is as follows, to wit: (Here insert all of the evidence introduced by the commonwealth in rebuttal as shown by the said 'Stenographer's Report of Evidence Nos. 1 and 2,' identified by the signature of the judge of this court.) Which said stenographer's reports of the said evidence are filed herewith and are relied upon and made a part of this exception, and the foregoing being all of the evidence introduced except the following, to wit: The certified copies of the charter of the Charlotte Banking & Insurance Company from the clerk's office of Charlotte and from the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth," and other papers introduced in evidence.

The trouble is that the signature of the judge of the circuit court, by which the report of evidence and the papers referred to were to be identified, is nowhere to be found in the record, and there is as a matter of fact no such identification—indeed no identifying mark whatever.

These are the facts with reference to bill of exceptions No. 29, and all others, we believe, except Nos. 4 and 9.

No. 4 refers to a statement purporting to be made by the cashier, Thornton, "in the words and figures following, to wit: (Here insert statement.) And also the original statement made by F. C. Thornton to the State Corporation Commission under date of the 24th day of May, 1909, which original statement is in the words and figures following, to wit: [Here copy original statement.]" The difficulty here is that the papers referred to are not copied into or attached to the bill of exceptions, nor are they identified or earmarked in any way.

In Kecoughtan Lodge v. Steiner, 106 Va. 589, 56 S. E. 569, it is said: "Where a bill of exception states that all of the evidence in a case is certified in bill of exception No. 2, and bill No. 2 states that the 'evidence as certified by the court is in the words and figures following, to wit,' and the stenographer's report of the evidence, indorsed by counsel on both sides as a correct copy, and signed by the trial judge, is securely attached to the bill of exception by paper fasteners, the bill of exception and report of the evidence are so articulated as to form but one paper, and sufficiently identifies the evidence referred to in the bill of exceptions."

In U. S. Mineral Co. v. Camden, 106 Va. 663, 56 S. E. 561, 117 Am. St. Rep. 1028, it was held that "a paper filed in the record, without identification of any kind whatever, which purports to set out the evidence given on the trial, at the end of which is a certificate of the judge presiding at the trial, 'I hereby certify that the foregoing is all the evidence in this case,' is not a bill of exception, and cannot be made to serve its function. It cannot be used as a basis of review of the action of the trial judge in granting and refusing instructions based on the evidence, or in overruling a motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence."

In Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. v. Rhodes, 109 Va. 176, 63 S. E. 445, it appeared that the bill of exceptions, which after certifying that the plaintiff and defendant each introduced evidence, said, "all of which evidence, both for the plaintiff and the defendant, is found in a typewritten booklet now marked 'A,' and is adopted by the court as the evidence introduced by the plaintiff and the defendant, and that it contains all the evidence offered by them," and it was held that the bill of exceptions sufficiently identified the evidence, and made it a part of the record of the case.

In Standard Peanut Company v. Wilson, 110 Va. 650, 66 S. E. 772, it was held that "It must appear from the record itself when the bill of exception was signed and thereby made a part of the record. That fact cannot be made to depend upon parol evidence. Neither parol evidence, nor custom, nor long practice in a particular court, will avail to add to or take from the record as made under the supervision of the trial judge. A statement by the clerk which is no part of the final order in a cause and not authorized by the trial judge, but which is inserted by him in making up the record for this court, that 'the bills of exception referred to in the foregoing order are in the words and figures following, to wit,' is no part of the record."

In Hot Springs Lumber Co. v. Revercomb, 110 Va. 240, 65 S. E. 557, speaking of identification of bills of exceptions, the court said: "If not so identified within the time prescribed by law for taking the bill, it cannot be so identified afterwards. The identification of the evidence to be inserted in a bill of exception is a judicial act to be performed by the judge himself within the time prescribed for filing the bill, and cannot be delegated to the clerk. A skeleton bill containing such expressions, as 'here insert the evidence,' without earmarking the evidence to be inserted, is not a compliance with the law."

The citations which we have given show what the law is in this court; and it differs in no respect from the practice in other courts.

In the case of Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Wagner, 19 Kan. 335, the opinion was delivered by Judge Brewer, afterwards a distinguished justice of the Supreme Court. Speaking of bills of exceptions, he said: "A bill of exceptions is a record, and like any other record is not to be established by parol testimony, but must carry on its face the evidences of its own integrity and completeness. While what is familiarly known as a skeleton bill—that is, a bill which provides for the subsequent copying by the clerk into it and as a part of it some paper or document—is allowed, yet, to make such a bill valid and complete, these rules must be regarded: (1) The bill, in referring to such paper or document, must purport to incorporate it into and make it a part of the bill. A mere reference to it, although such as to identify it beyond doubt, or a statement that it was in evidence, is not sufficient. (2) The document must itself, at the time of the signature of the bill, be in existence, written out and complete. (3) It must be annexed to the bill, and referred to as annexed, or it must be so marked by letter, number, or other means of identification mentioned in the bill as to leave no doubt when found in the record that it is the one referred to in the bill and these means of identification must be obvious to all, so that any one examining the record can know what document is to be inserted, or after insertion that the clerk has made no mistake."

The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are to the like effect.

In Leftwitch v. Lecanu, 4 Wall. 187, 18 L. Ed. 388, Judge Miller said: "If a paper which is to constitute a part of a bill of exceptions is not incorporated into the body of the bill, it must be annexed to it, or so marked by letter, number, or other means of identification mentioned in the bill, as to leave no doubt, when found in the record, that it is the one referred to in the bill of exceptions, or it will not be considered." See, also, Muller v. Ehlers, 91 U. S. 250, 23 L. Ed. 319; U. S. v. Jones, 149 U. S. 262, 13 Sup. Ct. 840, 37 L. Ed. 726; Michigan Ins. Co. v. Eldred, 148 U. S. 293, 12 Sup. Ct. 450, 36 L. Ed. 162; Origet v. U. S., 125 U. S. 240, 8 Sup. Ct. 846, 31 L. Ed. 743; Malony v. Adsit, 175 U. S. 287, 20 Sup. Ct. 115, 44 L. Ed. 163; Yellow Poplar Lumber Co. v. Chapman, 74 Fed. 448, 20 C. E. 438; Coburn v. Murray, 2 Me. 336; Lynch v. Craney, 95 Mich. 199, 54 N. W. 879.

[4] Bill of exceptions No. 9 makes no reference to the evidence as contained in bill of exceptions No. 29, but is complete in itself, and is as follows: "Allen Talbott, a witness for the commonwealth, was asked the following question: 'Taking all of your information, up to the present time, including your investigation into these books, have you been able to reach a conclusion that Mr. Thornton made a true statement as to the condition of this bank? A. No, sir; it was not a true statement'—to the introduction of which evidence the defendant, by counsel, objected, and moved the court to exclude the same from the jury on the ground that the same was not admissible in law on the issue joined, etc." The court allowed the evidence to go before the jury, and it was duly excepted to.

The very issue which the jury were sworn to try was whether or not the defendant, Thornton, had made a true statement as to the condition of the bank. The question and answer take that issue from the jury and submit it to the witness, and upon that evidence alone, if admissible, the prisoner might have been found guilty. It may be said that the witness was an expert, and his opinion, therefore, admissible in evidence. It may be said that, if all the evidence before the jury were before the court, it would have justified the question and the answer; but the evidence that may have been before the jury is not before the court. It is contained in bill of exceptions No. 29, and must stand or fall with that bill of exceptions, and this bill of exceptions must be treated and considered as though it stood alone in this record, and, so considered, we have no doubt that it presents reversible error.

But it is said, on the other hand, that this was not opinion evidence; that it called for the statement of a fact. If the question had been confined to what the witness had discovered from an examination of the books, there would be some force in this contention; but the question had a much wider range, and asked for his conclusion resting upon all the information in his possession up to the time the question was asked: "Including your investigation into these books, have you been able to reach a conclusion that Mr. Thornton made a true statement as to the condition of this bank?"—showing clearly that the witness was not to be confined to a mere examination of the books, but asked to give his conclusion based upon information in his possession from whatever source derived.

For the foregoing reasons, we are of opinion that the demurrer to the indictment was properly overruled; that the evidence attempted to be presented by bill of exceptions No. 29 was not properly authenticated, and cannot be considered; that the other bills, except bill of exceptions No. 9, are dependent upon the twenty-ninth bill, and the rulings of the court which they were designed to bring before us for review cannot be considered; and, finally, that the admission of the testimony contained in bill of exceptions No. 9 was erroneous, and for that error the judgment complained of must be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial in accordance with the views expressed in the foregoing opinion.

Reversed.

RICHARDS v. W. M. RITTER LUMBER CO.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 23, 1911.)

1. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 164*)—GRANTS—COUNTERSIGNING BY SECRETARY OF STATE — "COUNTERSIGN."

A land grant sealed with the seal of the state, signed by the Governor, and countersigned on the opposite side of the sheet by the Secretary of State is sufficient, within Const. art. 3, § 16, providing that grants shall be sealed with the seal of the state, signed by the Governor, and countersigned by the Secretary of State; the word "countersign" meaning the signature of an officer to a writing, signed by a superior, to attest its authenticity (quoting 2 Words and Phrases, p. 1651).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. § 473; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

2. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 164*)—LAND GRANTS—COUNTERSIGNING BY SECRETARY OF STATE.

A land grant, countersigned in the name of the Secretary of State, per his chief clerk, is void, because the statute does not authorize the countersigning by a deputy or clerk.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. § 473; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 345*)—ABSTRACTS OF GRANTS—CERTIFIED COPIES.

Under Revisal 1905, § 1596, providing that abstracts of grants filed in the office of the Secretary of State, certified by him as true copies, shall be admissible in evidence like the original, does not make the abstract better evidence than the registration of the original in the designated county; and where the grant recorded in the county shows a countersigning by the Secretary of State, per his chief clerk, an abstract, not containing the countersigning by the clerk, cannot be received in evidence to show a valid grant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1302-1314; Dec. Dig. § 345.*]

Hoke, J., dissenting on defendant's appeal, and Allen and Walker, JJ., dissenting on plaintiff's appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Macon County; Cline, Judge.

Action by D. J. Richards against the W. M. Ritter Lumber Company. From the judgment rendered, both parties appeal. New trial granted on plaintiff's appeal, and defendant's appeal dismissed.

Robertson & Benbow, J. Frank Ray, and Geo. L. Jones, for plaintiff. L. C. Bell, for defendant.

CLARK, C. J. [1] Both sides appealed. The plaintiff offered grant No. 3,050. This grant was duly sealed with the great seal of the state, with a plot of the land attached, and is signed "W. W. Holden, Governor," and on the opposite side of the sheet are the words: "Secretary's Office, Feb. 3, 1869. H. J. Menninger, Secretary of State"—which bears the same date as the grant. The judge rejected the deed, on the ground that it was not "countersigned." In this there was error. There is no decision in the courts of this state, or in any other that we have been able to find, which authorizes this ruling. The word "countersign" comes from the French "contresigne" and the Latin "contra signum." Webster's International Dictionary gives this derivation, and says the meaning of the verb "countersign" is to "sign on the opposite side," and it has, secondarily, the meaning "to sign in addition to the signature of another." Worcester's, the Century, and Clarkson's Standard Dictionaries all give exactly the same meaning. The Century further says that it means "to superadd a signature." All four dictionaries give the meaning of the noun as follows: "The signature of a secretary or other officer to a writing, or writings, signed by the principal or superior to attest its authenticity." Words and Phrases gives the same definition.

It is well settled in this state that when a signature is essential to the validity of an instrument it is not necessary that the signature appear at the end, unless the statute uses the word "subscribe." Devereux v. McMahon, 108 N. C. 134, 12 S. E. 902, 12 L. R. A. 205. This has always been ruled in this state in regard to wills, as to which the signature may appear anywhere. If this is true of a "signature," it must also be true of the word "countersign." It has been often held that the place of signing is a matter of taste. Adams v. Field, 21 Vt. 264; Attorney General v. Clark, 26 R. I. 474, 59 Atl. 395; 9 A. & E. Enc. 143; 36 Cyc. 441.

The Constitution (article 3, § 16) provides that there shall be a great seal of the state, and adds, "all grants and commissions shall be sealed with 'the great seal of the state' signed by the Governor and countersigned by the Secretary of State." But there is nothing in this or in any statute which changes the original meaning of the word, which is to "sign on the opposite side" of the sheet, or its derivative meaning, which is to super-add another signature, as "additional evidence of authenticity." Mr. Menninger, the then Secretary of State, evidently construed the word in its historical sense, to sign on the opposite side of the sheet. He did this, not at random, but officially, because the words used are: "Secretary's Office, Feb. 3, 1869. H. J. Menninger, Secretary of State." He also came within the derivative meaning, as set out in all the dictionaries, because he thus superadded his signature as proof of the authenticity of the paper. Originally a grant or order was signed by the king and authenticated by the great seal merely, but subsequently, especially after the advent of responsible government, "countersigning" by a minister was required, and this was usually done on "the other side of the sheet," as the word signifies.

The original grant is filed in the record. There is no question made by any one but that it is genuine. This is shown by the great seal of state. When that appears, the signatures of the Governor and Secretary of State on an instrument, thus issued from the Secretary's office, are presumed to be genuine. They are protected by the statute against forgery, and by the presumption of genuineness of the signatures upon an official document thus issued. The register of deeds of the county acts upon such instrument without any probate, and records it as was done in this case. A reference to the office of the Secretary of State shows that this grant was duly entered, and that the grant was issued in payment of the sum therein recited. An instrument, unquestionably genuine and authenticated, and issued in consideration of the money duly received by the state therefor, should not be set aside upon any controversy as to where a signature should be placed. The presumption is that the official act of the Secretary was correct, when, acting on his own judgment, he placed the signature on the opposite side of the sheet, and when there is no statute or decision requiring it to be placed elsewhere.

The defendant contends that the word "countersign" means to sign on the opposite side of the same page. But there is no statute or decision which provides this, and the place where the defendant says the Secretary should sign is not on the opposite side of the page, but in immediate juxtaposition to the Governor's signature. It is true that there does appear printed at that place the words "By command," and a blank space, followed by the words "Secretary of State," but there is no statute requiring this, and all that we know is that the words were put there by the printer. The Secretary of State himself construed the meaning of the word "countersign" to be "to sign on the opposite side" of the sheet, and wrote his name with more formality: "Secretary's Office, Feb. 3, 1869. H. J. Menninger, Secretary of State." There is no authority anywhere for the use of the words "By command."

The grant being undeniably genuine, and duly issued upon payment of the consideration, authenticated by the great seal, signed by the Governor and by the Secretary of State, both officially, we cannot hold that it was not "countersigned," because the place where the Secretary added his signature, with the title of his office, was not at the particular spot on the grant which the defendant contends for. The essential thing is the additional signature, not its location, with the evidence of the intent to authenticate, which is here shown by the use of the words which show, not only that the grant was signed by "the Secretary of State," but in his office.

[2] The defendant offered grant 3,083. The plaintiff objected to this grant, because the grant, as recorded in Macon county, shows that the only indication of countersigning is as follows: "By command. H. J. Menninger, Secretary of State, per T. J. Menninger, Chief Clerk." In Beam v. Jennings, 96 N. C. 82, 2 S. E. 245, this very point was presented, and the court held that the statute did not authorize the countersigning of a grant to be done by a deputy or clerk; and therefore that such grant was void. The Legislature of 1905 (chapter 512) accepted that view, and validated all grants thus defectively authenticated, adding, "that nothing herein contained shall interfere with vested rights." Therefore, as to the plaintiff, this grant 3,083 was void, and should have been rejected.

[3] It is true that Revisal 1905, § 1596, provides that "all abstracts of grants which may be filed in the office of Secretary of State, certified by him as true copies, shall be as good evidence in any court as the original." The defendant, instead of the original, offered an abstract, which did not contain the defective countersigning by the deputy clerk. The statute does not make the abstract any better evidence than the registration of the original (Revisal, § 1598), and the inherent probability is that the words "per T. J. Menninger, Chief Clerk," were copied by the register of deeds, in Macon county, from the grant as actually issued. It is not probable that it would have ever occurred to him, out of his own head, to transcribe those words, if not in the grant. Whereas, the abstract might have been made in the Secretary of State's office with the careless omission of those words. As the abstract is no better evidence, under the statute, than the record in Macon county, the case should go back, that the jury may find which is the better evidence. The plaintiff may serve notice on the defendant to produce the original grant, and, if found, of course, it will settle the controversy, as that is the best evidence. On account of these errors, there must be a new trial, and it is unnecessary to consider the other exceptions in the record.

Defendant's appeal dismissed. In plaintiff's appeal, new trial.

BROWN, J., concurs.

HOKE, J. (concurring in result). I concur in the disposition made of the case, being of opinion that, on the testimony, there was a sufficient countersigning of the grants in question, within the meaning of the Constitution and statutes. I am of opinion, further, that under the conditions and careful methods known to exist in the office of the Secretary of State, and of which we may, to this extent, take judicial notice (Furniture Co. v. Express Co., 144 N. C. 639, 57 S. E. 458), where a grant, under the seal of the state, has been attested by the Governor and countersigned in the name of the Secretary of State, per his chief clerk, and to the issuance of which no suspicion has attached, and no reason for such suspicion is suggested or shown, the same should be held a valid grant. It should be presumed that such a grant was countersigned in the presence of the Secretary of State, and by his direction; and that the case of Beam v. Jennings, 96 N. C. 82, 2 S. E. 245, to the extent that it contravenes this position, was not well decided, and should be overruled.

ALLEN, J. I dissent from the opinion of the court on the plaintiff's appeal, and concur on the defendant's appeal, but do not care to do more than note the difference in the facts, and to state, without discussion, my view of the law.

On the plaintiff's appeal, the question is presented of the admissibility of a paper, purporting to be a grant, which was signed by the Governor, and the great seal attached, but which had no signature of any officer or clerk on the page which the Governor signed. On the back of this paper appear the words: "Secretary's Office, Feb. 3, 1869. H. J. Menninger, Secretary of State"—but no evidence was introduced that this indorsement was in the handwriting of H. J. Menninger, or that it was on the paper when it came from the office of Secretary of State.

The Constitution (article 3, § 16) says: "All grants and commissions shall be issued in the name and by the authority of the state of North Carolina, sealed with the great seal of the state, signed by the Governor and countersigned by the Secretary of State." This language was construed, in 1820, in Hunter v. Williams, 8 N. C. 221, a part of it, at that time, being in the Constitution, and a part in a legislative act, and the court there says: "The Constitution (section 36) declares that all grants shall run in the name of the state and bear test, and be signed by the Governor. The year after the adoption of the Constitution the Legislature, at their November session, declares that the Secretary shall make out grants for all surveys returned to his office, which grants shall be authenticated by the Governor and countersigned by the Secretary. Act of Assembly 1777, c. 1, § 11. This is the only mode pointed out by the Legislature, whereby individuals can acquire a right to the unappropriated lands; and if it be not pursued no right can be acquired, in any other way, sooner than if no mode at all had been pointed out. Nothing, therefore, passed by this instrument, as it is not pretended that Mr. Martin had title individually."

When the Constitution says a grant shall be issued under the great seal, and shall be signed by the Governor, and countersigned by the Secretary of State, I think we may dispense with the seal or the signature of the Governor, if we can hold that it is not necessary for the Secretary of State to countersign.

If evidence of the handwriting on the back of the paper had been introduced, I do not think it would amount to more than an office entry, and it would not be a countersigning; but the paper, when offered at the trial, did not come from the office of Secretary of State, but was produced by the plaintiff, and he offered no evidence of handwriting, or as to the time when the indorsement first appeared on the paper. So far as we can see, it may have been written after the paper left the office of Secretary of State.

On the defendant's appeal, it appears that the defendant claimed under a paper purporting to be grant No. 3,083, under the great seal, which was signed by the Governor and countersigned "H. J. Menninger, Secretary of State, per T. G. Menninger, Chief Clerk." The defendant also offered in evidence a certified copy, from the office of Secretary of State, of the abstract of grant No. 3,083, which was signed by the Governor and countersigned by the Secretary of State. I think the paper was incompetent, under the authority of Beam v. Jennings, 96 N. C. 83, 2 S. E. 245, holding that: "The clerk of the Secretary of State has no power to certify to and affix the great seal of the state to copies of grants and other papers from the Secretary of State's office, to be used in evidence. The statute contemplates that this officer should do all official acts himself, and does not permit any of them to be done by a deputy"—and that the certified copy was competent, by virtue of section 1596 of the Revisal, which reads as follows: "Copies of the plats and certificates of survey, or their accompanying warrants, and all abstracts of grants, which may be filed in the office of the Secretary of State, certified by him as true copies, shall be as good evidence in any court as the original."

I therefore conclude that the judgment ought to be affirmed on the plaintiff's appeal, and reversed on the defendant's appeal.

WALKER, J., concurs in this opinion.

 appeal. Reversed.

A. W. Horn, J. Frank Ray, and O. L. Anderson, for appellants. F. S. Johnston, J. H.
 Dillard, and Geo. L. Jones, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The only question presented is whether grant No. 3,075 is valid. The original is sent up in the record, and shows:

[1] (1) The grant purports to be countersigned as follows: "By command H. J. Menninger, Secretary of State, per T. J. Menninger, Chief Clerk." This is invalid. Beam
 v. Jennings, 96 N. C. 82, 2 S. E. 245; Richards v. Lumber Co., 73 S. E. 485, at this term.

[2] (2) The Secretary of State himself seems to have been of this opinion, and duly countersigned it himself, by writing on the opposite side of the sheet the following:
 "Secretary's Office, May 21, 1869. H. J.
 Menninger, Secretary of State." This is sufficient countersigning, as is held in Richards
 v. Lumber Co., 73 S. E. 485, at this term.
 The abortive countersigning by the chief clerk does not vitiate the proper counter-signing by the Secretary of State himself.
 "Utile per inutile non vitiatur."

[3] The genuineness of the signature of the Secretary of State and that of the Governor is presumed from the great seal being affixed, and there is no attack made upon it.
 Reference to the Secretary of State's office shows that this grant was duly issued, and upon payment of the purchase money. The entry and plot, as well as the great seal, are affixed to the grant. In rejecting it, there was error.

BROWN and HOKE, JJ., concur.

ALLEN, J. (dissenting). The question involved in this appeal is similar to the one considered on the plaintiff's appeal in Richards v. Lumber Co., but the facts differ in one particular.

The paper, purporting to be a grant, offered in evidence in this case, in addition to a countersigning, "H. J. Menninger, Secretary of State, per T. J. Menninger, Chief Clerk," had indorsed on it: "Secretary's Office, May 21, 1869. H. J. Menninger, Secretary of State." There was no evidence as to handwriting, or that this indorsement was on the paper when it left the office of Secretary of State.

For the reasons assigned in the opinion in Richards v. Lumber Co., I think the paper was properly excluded, and that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

WALKER, J., concurs in this opinion.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; R. O. Watts, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Joella Campbell, administratrix of Charles L. Campbell, deceased, against the Southern Railway Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Dismissed.

Cothran, Dean & Cothran, for appellants. McCullough & Blythe and Jas. H. Price, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained on account of the death of Charles L. Campbell, a conductor on a work train of the Southern Railway Company, at Piedmont, S. C., on the 21st of October, 1908.

The allegations of the complaint material to the questions under consideration are as follows: "That while in the discharge of his duty, and while carrying out the orders and instructions of the defendant Southern Railway Company, the said Chas. L. Campbell met his death on said date, by reason of the joint and concurrent negligence of the defendants, in that, while the engine and tender were being backed on a side track at the said station of Piedmont, the said Chas. L. Campbell had occasion to use the steps provided by the defendant Southern Railway Company on said tender for those having occasion to go from the ground to the back of the tender, or from the back of said tender to the ground, and one of the treads of said steps consisted of the top of a box, extending across the rear of said tender, which box was used by the defendant for the purpose of keeping and storing away tools and appliances, and, while in discharge of his duty he was using said steps, the defendant carelessly and negligently left the top of said box, which top constituted one of the treads, partly open at an angle of about 45 degrees, and, when intestate's foot hit the top of said step, he slipped and was thrown underneath the engine and tender, and his body was horribly crushed and mangled, which resulted in his death. That it was the duty of the defendants, and especially of the defendants Paul Odam and Rudolph Sammons, to see that the lid of said box was down and securely fastened for the use of such persons as might have occasion to go to and from the rear of said tender, and said defendants negligently, on this occasion, failed to perform their duty, and left said lid partly open as set forth, thereby rendering the use of the appliance which was furnished the intestate for the discharge of his duty unsafe, defective and dangerous, and defendants, through their joint and concurrent negligence, failed to furnish said intestate with a safe place to do the work required of him, and safe and suitable appliances to perform the duty expected of him, which negligence on the part of defendants combined and concurred as the proximate cause of intestate's death." The defendants denied the allegations of negligence, and set up the defenses of assumption of risk, contributory negligence, and negligence of a fellow servant. At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendants made a motion for a nonsuit, which was refused. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $1,500.

The defendants appealed upon the ground that his honor erred in overruling the motion for the nonsuit, in that there was no testimony tending to sustain the plaintiff's allegations of negligence, and on the further ground that the testimony sustained the defenses upon which the defendants relied. The particular acts upon which the defendants relied to sustain their defense that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence are as follows: "First. The tender and engine were moving backwards, and the deceased was sitting on the top of the cab of the engine, and jumped down therefrom upon the floor of the tender, immediately opposite which on each side were facilities for alighting. He passed through the tender to the rear thereof, at each corner of which and on the side were facilities for alighting. He attempted to alight at the most dangerous place he could have selected, namely, at the extreme rear end of the tender in the center thereof, where there were no facilities for alighting, and immediately in the path of the tender and engine. That it was not at all necessary to alight from the engine and tender until it stopped. Second. The deceased adopted the dangerous method of alighting when there were perfectly safe ways for alighting." They also relied upon these facts, and upon the additional fact that the deceased had knowledge of the danger, to sustain the defense of assumption of risk.

The first question that will be considered is whether there was any testimony tending to sustain the allegations of negligence. There was testimony tending to sustain every material allegation of the complaint upon which the plaintiff relied to show negligence on the part of the defendants. The only instances in which the court will sustain a nonsuit when there is testimony sustaining the plaintiff's allegations are when the complaint is subject to a demurrer. Austin v. Manufacturing Co., 67 S. C. 122, 45 S. E. 135. In the case now before the court the complaint is not demurrable, as it alleges that the deceased was killed by reason of the failure of the defendant Southern Railway Company to furnish the deceased a safe place to work, which is a primary and nondelegable duty. Even conceding that there was testimony tending to sustain the defenses upon which the defendants relied, it was not of such a nature that only one inference could be drawn from it.

We do not deem it necessary to set out in detail such portions of the testimony as induce us to reach these conclusions.

Appeal dismissed.

JONES, C. J., concurs. WOODS, J., did not sit.

HYDRICK, J. (dissenting). I think the nonsuit should have been granted. The only negligence alleged in the complaint consisted in leaving the tool box open, with the lid thrown back at an angle of about 45 degrees, so that, when Campbell stepped on it, he slipped and fell. There was no testimony to support the allegation that it was the duty of the defendants Odam and Sammons to keep it closed. If defendant would be liable under the authority of Richey v. Railway, 69 S. C. 387, 48 S. E. 285, as for a failure to furnish plaintiff's intestate a safe place to work, if it had appeared that the box was left open by one of his fellow servants, that fact was not proved, and the burden of proving it was on the plaintiff. It cannot be inferred from the mere fact that a box was left open by some one. Indeed, from the testimony, it is as probable that it was left open by Campbell himself as by any one else. If it was, he was the author of his own injury.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

WOODS, J. (dissenting). Charles L. Campbell, conductor in charge of a work train, was killed by falling from the tender of his train; and the plaintiff, as administratrix of his estate, recovered judgment under the allegation that his death was due to the negligence of the defendant, in that the tool box placed by the defendant at the rear of the tender to be used as a step in descending was not closed, but was left with the lid up at an angle of about 45 degrees, so that Campbell in attempting to descend lost his footing, and was run over and killed.

I can see no escape from holding that the nonsuit should have been granted on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant. It is elementary that, when an employer places reasonably safe appliances in the hands of an employé for his use, the employer is not responsible for their negligent use by such employé. There is no allegation nor proof that the box lid or the tool box was defective, or that the lid was raised when Campbell took charge of the train as conductor, and therefore no negligence can be imputed to the defendant in that respect. Being intrusted with the train as the representative of the master, the general rule would be that it was Campbell's duty to see that the box was kept closed if that was necessary to the safety of himself and the other employés.

Neither the conductor nor his administratrix can be allowed to allege that the defendant was negligent in failing to perform a duty which devolved on him as the company's representative.

A witness for the plaintiff, it is true, testified that it was the duty of the last man who used the box to close it, but on the part of the plaintiff there was not a particle of evidence tending to show when or by whom the box was opened and lid left so as to be dangerous. Therefore the plaintiff's case rested on negligence which must be imputed either to the conductor himself or one of his fellow servants on the same train. Even if it could be assumed that the defendant would be liable if the box had been left open by Odam, the engineer, or Sammons, the fireman, there could be no recovery, for, under the plaintiff's evidence, it would be entirely a matter of conjecture whether the conductor himself or the fireman or the engineer had left the box open. Green v. So. Ry., 72 S. C. 398, 52 S. E. 45, and cases cited.

The evidence introduced by the defendant cannot help the plaintiff, for that evidence was to the effect that Campbell himself opened the box a very short time before the accident, and was the last man seen near it and in charge of it. This evidence not only does not tend to show that the box was left open by another employé of the defendant, but tends to prove affirmatively that Campbell himself, having control of the box, left it open after having had a cable taken from it.

McFARLANE et al. v. ROBERTSON et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 28, 1911.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 16, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 212*)—ASSIGNMENT OF POLICY—VALIDITY.

Upon the application of Stephens, an insurance policy was issued on his life, payable to his executors, administrators, and assigns, and placed in the hands of an agent of the insurer for delivery. The insured intended the policy for the benefit of a relative, Mrs. Smisson, provided she would pay the premiums thereon. She declined to do so, and the insured made known to his niece, Mrs. Robertson, that if she, or her husband, would pay the premiums on the policy, he would take the insurance, and she should receive the proceeds of the policy. On January 9, 1909, W. E. Hawkins, the general manager of the insurance company wrote to the husband of Mrs. Robertson that the policy was not yet in force, but if he would sign notes left with the local agent, "payable to W. E. Hawkins," the insurance would go immediately into effect, and "after this we can have the beneficiary changed on the request of Mr. Stephens, making it payable to your wife, the niece of the insured. We trust you will decide to give settlement for the policy and allow same to go into force. We have sent assignment blanks to Mr. Ray, so that Mr. Stephens can assign the policy to your wife, affording temporary protection until the beneficiary can be changed." On January 21, 1909, Stephens assigned the policy to Mrs. Robertson, whose husband signed and forwarded to the general manager the notes above referred to. On that day Robertson also wrote the general manager that Ray stated that "you would have the policy rewritten in favor of my wife." If this is "not true, or not authorized by you, please return me the notes which I signed and mailed you this afternoon. I cannot afford to be carrying insurance made payable to some one else or his estate, when I wish it for the benefit of my wife and children." On January 23, 1909, the general manager wrote Robertson: "In reply I beg to say with the assignment blanks we have in our possession puts this policy in full force, and in the event of the death of Mr. Stephens it will be payable to your wife;" that it would be "some two weeks" before the policy could be rewritten, and "in the meantime you can feel fully protected under the assignments what we have on hand." On February 5, 1909, the general manager sent Robertson a writing for Stephens to sign, requesting that the policy be rewritten, payable to Mrs. Robertson. Stephens refused to sign the request. The policy was rewritten, payable to Mrs. Robertson, but was never delivered, because of the refusal of Stephens to sign the request. Robertson declined to pay the notes, but paid them after the death of Stephens and on the same day he died. Hawkins was to pay the premiums to the insurer and retain the notes as his individual property. Soon after the notes were given, and some time prior to the death of the insured, Hawkins paid the premiums to the company and sent its receipt therefor to Robertson. The insurer paid the money into court, and in a contest between the administrator of Stephens and Mrs. Robertson, the jury found a verdict in favor of the latter. To the order of the court overruling their motion for a new trial, the administrator and the children of Stephens, who were also parties to the case, excepted. Held, the fact that Stephens did not sign a request that the policy be rewritten, so that Mrs. Robertson should become the payee thereof, and the fact that the policy was not delivered after being rewritten, did not make the assignment of the policy by Stephens to Mrs. Robertson invalid, and the evidence did not warrant a charge wherein the jury were authorized to find that the assignment was invalid on the ground that it was not to be a binding and valid assignment unless the policy was rewritten, and was not a completed and final assignment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 212.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 210*) — ASSIGNMENT — CONSIDERATION.

Under the evidence Robertson was liable to Hawkins on his notes for the premiums paid by Hawkins to the company, though the rewritten policy was not delivered, because of the refusal of Stephens to sign the written request that this be done, and the assignment could not be said to be invalid because of the refusal of Robertson, prior to the death of the insured, to pay these notes; and the charges of the court inconsistent with the ruling above made were error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 477; Dec. Dig. § 210.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1033*) — REVIEW — HARMLESS ERROR — INSTRUCTIONS.

The charges referred to in the preceding headnotes were erroneous, but they were not such errors as were harmful to the plaintiff in error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4052-4062; Dec. Dig. § 1033.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 119*) — INSURABLE INTEREST — WAGERING POLICY.

One of the charges of the court to which exception is taken is as follows: "The theory of the law as to wagering contracts is this: At best payment of an insurance premium in consideration of a guaranty of the payment of a certain fund upon the death of the person insured is at least practically a contract whereby the insurer, the company, takes the chances of the person insured not dying either within, if it be a limited contract policy, the limit of time, or if it be a life policy, or any other character of policy, it is a contract by which the company takes the chances of the premiums paid being worth as much or more than the amount to be paid upon the death of the insured; and, on the other hand, the payment of premiums constitutes a contract in which the assured agrees to pay a certain amount of premium under the terms of the contract on the theory when either his life terminates the policy becomes due, or for the years for which it is taken is passed the policy matures; so that you will see as between the two parties, the insurer and insured, they stand in the attitude towards each other of one agreeing to pay money in consideration of insurance, and the other agreeing to pay the insurance in the event of death. Now, the law says, to take out insurance, you must have an insurable interest." Immediately after this charge the court charged the jury as follows: "A creditor has an insurable interest in the life of another to the extent of his debt and premiums and interest necessary to maintain it in force. A husband has it in the wife, and the wife in the husband, and a child in the father." And immediately thereafter delivered the charge quoted in the succeeding headnote. Held, that the charge first above quoted, in connection with its context, did not accurately define a wagering contract as applicable to the law of insurance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 165; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

5. INSURANCE (§ 116*) — "INSURABLE INTEREST" — RELATIONSHIP OF PARTIES.

The court charged the jury as follows: "Uncle and niece occupy no such relations towards each other as that by the very fact of that relationship an insurable interest exists; but I charge you that the absolute relationship by blood of two parties is not the sole test of an insurable interest between them, but an insurable interest which takes a contract out of the class of wagering contracts may arise from such an interest or relationship as will convince the jury that the party claiming the insurable interest in the life of another has, because of natural affection and relationship between the two parties, a desire to protect the life of that other; and while it is true that the rule of law that a niece has no insurable interest in the life of her uncle, because of that fact of relationship alone, yet, if you believe from the evidence that, in addition to being the niece of the insured, Stephens, that defendant, Mrs. Robertson, had showed Stephens such natural affection as would tend naturally to create a desire on her part to prolong, promote, and protect the life of Stephens, then I charge you that Mrs. Robertson had an insurable interest in the life of Stephens." This charge was error, as it did not correctly set forth what constituted an "insurable interest" on the part of Mrs. Robertson in the life of Stephens. The charge made the insurable interest consist in the existence of the fact that Mrs. Robertson had shown Stephens such natural affection as would tend naturally to create a desire on her part to prolong, promote, and protect his life, instead of making an insurable interest depend upon the existence of such facts as would create a reasonable expectation on the part of Mrs. Robertson of benefit or advantage to her from the continuance of the life of Stephens, and of loss by reason of his death. 1 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. pp. 278-284, 290; 4 Words & Phrases, 3672, 3673.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 15, 1911.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 750*)—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR—SUFFICIENCY.

Where, in a bill of exceptions assigning error upon the judgment of a trial court in awarding a fund in court to one of two contestants therefor, the issues presented by the pleadings and the facts as agreed upon by counsel for the respective parties are set forth, and there is an averment in the bill of exceptions that upon such issues and facts the judge, as a matter of law, decided that the party other than the one complaining was entitled to the fund, an assignment of error that such decision was error because it was contrary to law is sufficient, and the motion to dismiss the writ of error upon the ground that there was no sufficient assignment of error is overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 750.*]

2. MORTGAGES (§ 176*)—LIEN—PRIORITY—JUDGMENT.

The lien of a judgment rendered before the recording of a prior mortgage is superior to the lien of the mortgage (Civil Code 1910, § 3260), though at the time of the rendition of the judgment a petition to foreclose the mortgage (on realty) has been filed and a rule nisi has been issued thereon and served. Richards v. Myers, 65 Ga. 763; Benson v. Green, 80 Ga. 230, 4 S. E. 851; New England, etc., Co. v. Ober, 84 Ga. 294, 10 S. E. 625; Cabot v. Armstrong, 100 Ga. 438 (3), 28 S. E. 123. In such a case notice, actual or constructive, to the judgment creditor, at the time when the judgment was rendered, of the existence of the unrecorded mortgage, is immaterial. Burke v. Anderson, 40 Ga. 540; Cottrell v. Bank, 89 Ga. 517, 15 S. E. 944.

(a) A mortgage was executed January 7, 1908, on land of the mortgagor situated in a county other than that of his residence. A petition to foreclose was filed February 15, 1909. The mortgage was recorded September 20, 1909. An execution on the foreclosure was issued on February 28, 1910, and recorded, in the county where issued, on March 2, 1910. A common-law judgment in favor of another creditor of the mortgagor was rendered against him, in the county of his residence, on April 7, 1909, and the execution issued thereon was entered upon the general execution docket of that county May 31, 1909. Held that, under the ruling just above announced, the lien of the common-law judgment was superior to the lien of the mortgage, and that the trial judge erred in holding that the mortgagee's claim to a fund arising from a sale of the mortgaged land was superior to the claim of the judgment creditor, and in awarding the fund to the mortgagee.

(b) If, in such a contest, the time when the common-law execution was entered of record on the general execution docket were material it appears in this case that it was entered prior to the record of the mortgage.

UNITED PAINTING & DECORATING CO. v. DUNN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 3*)—EXISTENCE OF AGENCY—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

An owner of land entered into a written agreement with a contractor, under the terms of which, for a consideration of $5,400, the latter was to furnish all material and labor and to erect upon the land of the owner a building in accordance with specifications prepared by a named architect. Among other stipulations in the agreement were in substance the following: The architect should supervise the work and see that it came up to the specifications. His decision as to the meaning of the drawings and specifications prepared by himself should be final. No alterations should be made in the work, except upon his written order; and the amount to be paid by the owner to the contractor on account of such alterations should be stated in such order. Within 24 hours after written notice from the architect, the contractor should proceed to remove from the ground or building all material condemned by the architect, whether worked or unworked, and take down all work which the architect should, in written notice to the contractor, condemn as unsound or improper, or as in any way failing to conform to the drawings and specifications; and upon the failure of the contractor to perform certain conditions of the contract the owner should have the right to take charge of the work and complete it at his own expense, and charge the contractor with all expenses thereby incurred. On the same day that the contract was executed, a further stipulation was added, under the signatures of the parties, as follows: "It is further mutually agreed between the parties hereto that the above price is a guaranty that the cost of the house complete will not exceed this amount of money namely, $5,400, and the bond is given to insure said guaranty. The contractor is to give the owner credit for any amounts which he may save in the construction of the building and in buying materials, etc. He is to furnish his service in the execution of the work for the sum of 10 per cent. of the total cost, said 10 per cent. being included in the $5,400; contractor to furnish architect with the amounts of subcontracts and price paid for different materials and labor." Held that, under a proper construction of the whole contract as thus amended, the contractor was an independent contractor, and in no sense the agent of the owner for the purpose of buying materials with which to complete the construction of the building, and the owner was not liable to a creditor of the contractor for the price of materials sold to him for such purpose. Ridgeway v. Downing, 109 Ga. 591, 34 S. E. 1028; Young v. Smith & Kelly Co., 124 Ga. 475, 52 S. E. 765, 110 Am. St. Rep. 186; Lapton v. Cedartown Co., 6 Ga. App. 147, 64 S. 1. EJECTMENT (§ 109*)—PROCEEDINGS—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

This was an action of ejectment. The defendant claimed title only under an alleged contract between the plaintiff's intestate and the defendant, whereby the premises became the property of the defendant in consideration of the defendant's services in nursing and caring for the intestate during her last illness. The evidence was wholly insufficient to show that such a contract was made, and therefore the court did not err in directing a verdict in behalf of the plaintiff for the recovery of the premises.

2. EJECTMENT (§ 109*)—PROCEEDINGS—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

According to the rulings of this court, jurors are not absolutely bound by the opinion of witnesses as to the rental value of the premises for the recovery of which an action is brought, though there be no variance as to such value in the opinion of the different witnesses. Martin v. Martin, 135 Ga. 162, 68 S. E. 1095, and cases cited. The trial judge therefore erred in directing a verdict for mesne profits in accordance with the opinion of witnesses as to the rental value of the premises.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1172*)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—DECISION IN GENERAL.

2. SALES (§ 23*)—VALIDITY OF CONTRACT—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.

Where an offer to purchase a given number of bales of cotton to be delivered in the future at a stipulated price is made by one party to another, which contains the statement that the party making the offer will give bond in an agreed amount guaranteeing his acceptance of the goods purchased, the stipulation in reference to the giving of the bond is to be construed as a condition precedent; and where the party to whom the offer is made accepts the offer generally, without further stipulation and without waiver of any condition contained in the offer, the contract made by the offer and the acceptance thereof does not become binding upon the party to whom the offer is made until a compliance by the offeror with the condition in reference to the giving of a bond.

Error from Superior Court, Irwin County; U. V. Whipple, Judge.

Action by J. H. C. All & Son against E. W. Batts. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Hal Lawson and H. J. Quincey, for plaintiff in error. Newbern & Meeks, for defendants in error.

BECK, J. J. H. C. All & Son brought an action against E. W. Batts to recover damages from the breach of certain contracts. There were three of the contracts, of different dates, but substantially the same in terms and conditions; and what is here said in reference to one of the contracts is controlling as to all of them. The first of these contracts reads as follows:

"Savannah, Ga., May 12, 1909.

"Mr. E. W. Batts, Ocilla, Ga.—Dear Sir: We beg to confirm that we have to-day purchased from you 100 bales of cotton at 10 cents per pound, basis good middling, f. o. b. cars Ocilla, Georgia, to be delivered in October, 1909, not less than 50 bales of which are to be delivered at a time. This 100 bales is to average 500 pounds per bale, with an allowance of 1% under or over. It is also understood that the difference between grades are to be those prevailing on the Savannah Cotton Exchange on the date of delivery. We are sending you a duplicate of this contract which please accept and return. We will send you in a later mail bond on our part for $5.00 per bale to guarantee our acceptance of this purchase. We offer to do this for you, although we have bought cotton to-day for October delivery at the same figures, without having to put up any guaranty. On your part you may put up the $5.00 per bale, or give bond in a reputable company for same, or get the bank in your town to guarantee your fulfillment of same. Yours truly, J. H. C. All & Son, by John E. All."

"Accepted. E. W. Batts."

Paragraphs 1 to 12 of the petition consist of allegations that the contract was executed on the date thereof; that according to the terms of the contract Batts sold to petitioners and contracted to deliver 300 bales of cotton, averaging 500 pounds in weight, on the basis of good middling, at stipulated prices; that petitioners were bound under the contract to receive and pay for the cotton according to the stipulations of the writing; that petitioners, up to the 30th day of October, 1909, had been able, willing, and ready to accept and pay the contract price for the cotton and perform all the obligations imposed by the contract; that on the 30th day of October, 1909, petitioners made demand upon the defendant for the cotton, and defendant refused to deliver, and has not yet delivered it. It is alleged that the value of cotton at the time of the breach of the contract exceeded the contract price, and petitioners lay their damage in the amount equal to the excess. That part of the petition embraced in paragraphs 13 to 20 relates to damages sued for on the ground that, because of a failure of certain cotton shipped by the defendant to the plaintiffs to come up to the stipulated grade, there was an "out-turn" against the plaintiffs of a stated amount; and the plaintiffs sue for this. That part of the petition embraced in paragraphs 1 to 12, inclusive, thereof, is referred to herein as the first part of the petition, and the remainder, excepting the prayer for judgment and process, is referred to as the second part of the petition.

[1] 1. The defendant filed a demurrer containing 13 grounds. Of these grounds the court overruled 1 to 7, inclusive, and sustained 8 to 13, inclusive. The defendant excepted to the order overruling the first 7 grounds. The seventh and eighth grounds of the demurrer read as follows:

"(7) Defendant demurs to the alleged cause of action attempted to be set forth in paragraphs 13 to 20, inclusive, upon the ground that said paragraphs set forth no cause of action as against this defendant.

"(8) Defendant demurs to the alleged cause of action attempted to be set forth in paragraphs 13 to 20, inclusive, upon the ground that it nowhere appears that the payments of money by the plaintiffs were made upon any mutual mistake of fact; nor does it appear why the plaintiff paid the purchase money demanded by the defendant without first investigating to ascertain whether the amounts were correct; nor does it appear that this defendant in any way deceived or misled the plaintiff; nor does it appear that the defendant was ever notified of any alleged mistake in a reasonable time after the discovery by the plaintiffs of such mistake."

As we construe these two grounds of demurrer, the plaintiff in error was not hurt by the failure of the court to sustain the seventh ground of the demurrer, because, even if the part of the petition to which it relates—that is, the second part of the petition—was open to attack by the general demurrer as stated in the seventh ground, that part of the petition to which the seventh ground refers was effectually destroyed when the court sustained the eighth ground of the demurrer. All that the defendant could ask was that the court wipe out the second part of the petition. The court did so by its order sustaining the eighth ground of the demurrer. What does it matter to the defendant if the court refused to destroy the second part of the petition on one ground, if it was completely annihilated on another?

[2] 2. The contract in this case consisted, in effect, of an offer on the part of the plaintiffs to purchase 100 bales of cotton and an acceptance of the offer by the defendant. In the statement of the offer there is contained an obligation upon the party making the offer to give a bond on his part for $5 per bale (which would be $500 for each 100 bales). This offer was accepted generally by the defendant, without stipulation of any condition on his part or the waiver of any condition contained in the offer; and the contract would have been binding upon him

Immediately upon a compliance with the stipulated condition in the offer that the bond should be given (sent by mail). But we are of the opinion that the stipulation contained in the offer that a bond in compliance with the terms of the contract should be sent by mail was a condition precedent, and that until it was complied with the contract was not binding upon the defendant. While the acceptance of the plaintiff's offer was general in its terms, it secured to the defendant the benefit of all conditions in the offer which might safeguard him in the delivery of the property purchased, as effectually as it brought him under the obligation to perform his undertaking, and one of those safeguards was a bond, which would have protected him against loss or diminished his loss in the event the proposed purchasers should refuse or become unable to pay for the cotton after the same had been shipped to them. Consequently, in order to state a cause of action against the defendant for a failure to deliver the cotton, it was essential that the plaintiffs should have alleged a compliance with this material condition stated in their offer which we have under consideration, and, having failed to allege this, no cause of action was shown against the defendant, and a general demurrer to the petition should have been sustained. Equitable Mfg. Co. v. Davis, 130 Ga. 67, 60 S. E. 262.

BROWN et al. v. MARTIN et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. VENUE (§ 5*)—CHARACTER OF ACTION—TITLE TO LAND — "RESPECTING TITLES TO LAND."

An action under Civil Code 1910, § 3666, by a remainderman against a life tenant, to have the estate of the latter declared forfeited and the remainderman put in possession, because of waste committed by the tenant, is a suit "respecting titles to land," and the venue thereof is the county in which the land involved is located.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-11; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

2. GROUNDS OF DEMURRER—DISMISSAL OF PETITION.

None of the grounds of demurrer were well taken, and the court erred in dismissing the petition.

Error from Superior Court, Calhoun County; Frank Park, Judge.

Action by Herbert Brown and others against R. B. Martin and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Herbert Brown and others, as remaindermen under a certain deed, brought an action against Mrs. Madden and R. B. Martin, to declare a forfeiture of the life estate conveyed by the deed, and to acquire possession of the property because of alleged waste committed. By the terms of the deed the property was conveyed to Mrs. Madden for life, for the comfortable maintenance of herself and children, and at her death to go to the children in fee simple. The plaintiffs are the children just referred to. The original petition made substantially the following averments: On June 16, 1906, a decree was taken, subjecting the interest of Mrs. Madden in the property named in the deed to a certain indebtedness, under which decree her life estate was sold at public outcry, and was bought in by her; but, she failing to comply with her bid, under the terms of the decree "title to the said property went to various creditors, subject to a fixed charge for the maintenance of petitioners." The defendant Martin was one of the creditors, and went into possession of the land, holding the life interest only as held by Mrs. Madden, and subject to the liabilities imposed by law on her, and entitled only to such rights as she had. The land is located in Calhoun county. Mrs. Madden is a resident of that county, and Martin is a resident of Randolph county. Various acts of waste have been committed by Martin, and allowed by him to be committed by others, consisting of working the timber for turpentine purposes, cutting, selling, and destroying valuable timber in large quantities. Mrs. Madden, the life tenant, fails and neglects to prevent these acts of waste, and both defendants have been guilty of such acts "as to forfeit her or his interest in said land, and cause said estate to vest absolutely in fee simple in petitioners," and they elect to claim immediate possession. The prayers of the petition are that the life estate be declared to be forfeited; that Mrs. Madden, and Martin, holding under her, be decreed to have forfeited their interest in said estate; and that plaintiffs recover the land, with the title, possession, and right of possession vested in them free of condition, together with the rental value of the land since the filing of the suit.

An amendment to the petition was allowed, in which it was alleged: Mrs. Madden leased to one Sealy about 75 acres of the land for the purpose of working turpentine thereon, and Sealy extracted the turpentine from the trees and carried it away, and cut timber and converted it into barrel staves, and used large quantities of timber for making turpentine, which "act was done by Mrs. Madden with the knowledge and assistance, in the year 1906, of R. B. Martin." Mrs. Madden and Martin conspired and confederated, while she was life tenant, to sell and dispose of the real estate, and in furtherance of that intention Martin leased the land and sold said timber for Mrs. Madden. "Said Madden permitted said Martin to waste said real estate, by neglecting to care for same, and neglecting to prevent the cutting of same. Said Madden has committed voluntary waste, and in a manner evidencing entire disregard of the rights of the next taker, by cutting said timber, allowing it to die and fall upon the ground and rot. Said Martin had full knowledge of this fact, and knew that said waste was permissive and voluntary, and took title to said land under a decree with full knowledge of the facts that said Madden had committed said acts." Martin has continued the acts of waste, and his title was taken subject to full knowledge that Mrs. Madden had forfeited her entire life estate.

A demurrer was filed by Martin, setting up the following grounds: "(1) Because no cause of action, either legal or equitable, is set forth in the petition. (2) Because no such acts are alleged in the petition as will justify the court in decreeing a forfeiture as prayed. (3) Because no copy of the decree under which it is alleged defendant holds title is attached to the petition, nor does it appear with sufficient fullness under what title the defendant claims. (4) Because the land referred to in paragraph 1 of the petition is not described with sufficient fullness or definiteness. (5) Because the petition shows that the superior court of Calhoun county has no jurisdiction of this defendant."

The court rendered judgment as follows: "The plaintiffs have amended their petition, and said amendment having been allowed, and the within and foregoing demurrers having been renewed to said petition as amended, it is, after argument, ordered that said demurrers be sustained, and the petition as amended be dismissed, both parties by agreement treating the decree referred to in the petition as being a part of and attached to the petition." To this judgment the plaintiffs filed their bill of exceptions.

M. C. Edwards, for plaintiffs in error.
Hawes & Pottle, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). There is no merit in the first and second grounds of the demurrer. Acts of waste on the part of the life tenant, of the character alleged in the petition, would give the remaindermen the right to bring an action to declare a forfeiture of the estate of the life tenant, as provided for in Civil Code 1910, § 3666. In view of the recital of the court, in his order quoted in the statement of facts, that by agreement both parties treated the decree referred to in the petition as though it were a part thereof, the third ground of demurrer will be considered as having been waived. It might be here remarked, however, that this decision, in its entirety, is made without reference to the decree, as it does not appear to have been actually attached to the petition, and was not brought to this court. This statement is made, in view of the fact that the plaintiffs may have been parties to the decree and bound thereby, and it may have contained provisions which would affect their rights with respect to the present litigation. There is no merit in the fourth ground of demurrer. Paragraph 1 of the petition gives the numbers of the land lots involved, and this description, taken in connection with the allegation elsewhere in the petition that the property is situated in Calhoun county, sufficiently identifies the land referred to, or can be made to do so when aided by parol testimony.

[1] This brings us to the fifth and last ground of the demurrer, by which the defendant Martin challenges the jurisdiction of Calhoun superior court with respect to him. Counsel in their briefs largely deal with the case on the theory that it is an equitable proceeding, and should be located in the county of his residence, because he is the defendant against whom substantial relief is prayed; however, counsel for the plaintiff in error does insist that the suit is one respecting title to land, and therefore properly brought in Calhoun county, where the land in controversy is situated. In order to determine the venue of the suit, it is important to classify the action. While the petition does not in terms so state, the suit evidently is brought under the statute of this state providing for a forfeiture in behalf of the remainderman against the life tenant in the event the latter wastes the estate, which statute is hereinafter copied. Originally at common law an action of waste was maintainable only against the holder of the legal estate of a guardian in chivalry, or tenant in dower or by the curtesy, on the theory that, this class of estates being creatures of the law, the law would protect the inheritance of the heir by affording him a remedy for waste committed. No action could be maintained against the holder of an estate for life or for years, since they were created by the demise or lease of the owner, and it was deemed that his failure, when granting the estate, to provide against waste by the tenant, constituted an act of neglect on his part, the consequences of which he would be left to suffer. 2 Blackstone Com. 283. The statute of Marlbridge (52 Hen. III, c. 23) extended the common-law liability, so as to make it apply to tenants of the last-named class, and to make them liable for full damages resulting from waste; and the statute of Gloucester (6 Edw. I, c. 5) gave a more stringent remedy in such cases by a writ of waste, under which the tenant was liable to forfeiture of the thing wasted and treble damages. 2 Bl. Com. 283-284; 1 Reeves on Real Property, § 558; Roby v. Newton, 121 Ga. 679, 49 S. E. 694, 68 L. R. A. 601. In Parker v.

Chambliss, 12 Ga. 235, it was held: "In this state, a tenant in dower is liable for waste committed on the estate, but she does not thereby forfeit her estate, and treble damages as provided by the statute of Gloucester. The remedy against her is by action on the case, in the nature of waste, to recover the actual damage done to the estate, or by an injunction to restrain her from committing waste, when necessary, on a proper case made." In the opinion Judge Warner, after pointing out that we had adopted the common and statute law of England only where "properly adapted to the circumstances of the inhabitants of this state," and quoting Chancellor Kent to the effect that the writ of waste had gone out of use, and special action on the case in the nature of waste had superseded the common-law remedy, on page 238, said: "We therefore adopt and recognize the principles of the common law including the statute of Gloucester, so far as to make the tenant in dower liable for waste committed, but reject the harsh and penal remedy provided by that statute." This decision was made in 1852.

Code 1863, § 2235 (which is identical in language with section 3666 of the Code of 1910), contained the following provisions: "The tenant for life is entitled to the full use and enjoyment of the property, so that in such use he exercises the ordinary care of a prudent man for its preservation and protection, and commits no acts tending to the permanent injury of the person entitled in remainder or reversion. For the want of such care, and the willful commission of such acts, he forfeits his interest to the remainderman if he elects to claim immediate possession." In Dickinson v. Jones, 38 Ga. 97, a case of injunction to restrain threatened waste, it was assumed that the statute of Gloucester was of full force in Georgia; but in Woodward v. Gates, 38 Ga. 205, 212, it was pointed out that the apparent holding in the Dickinson Case was obiter, no question of forfeiture being there involved, and the true rule in Woodward v. Gates was declared to be that the effect of the adoption of the Code of 1863 was that (page 213), "in case of waste, the tenant for life shall forfeit his interest to the remainderman, if he elects to take immediate possession. But the rule of the statute of Gloucester as to treble damages is not still adopted." And this decision was construed and followed in Belt v. Simkins, 113 Ga. 894, 39 S. E. 430. It appears, therefore, that the present statute (Civil Code 1910, § 3666), quoted supra, is declaratory, and at the same time restrictive, of the common law, and that the right of action thereunder is purely an action at law. What was the nature of this action at common law? Blackstone says: "This action of waste is a mixed action; partly real, so far as it recovers land, and partly personal, so far as it recovers damages." 2 Bl. Com. 228; 3 Bl. Com. 118. It would seem, therefore, that, our statute having eliminated the treble damages feature, and retained only the forfeiture provided for by the common law, an action brought under such statute would be a real action.

The suit in the present case is based purely on this statute. It is in no sense an equitable action, and no equitable features are involved. The allegations of the petition, simplified, are to the effect that the life tenant has been guilty of acts of waste within the meaning of the statute, and thereby rendered his estate subject to the forfeiture, and that the remaindermen elect to have such forfeiture declared and to take immediate possession of the estate. The prayers of the petition all seek relief within the bounds of the statute; that is, that the interest of the life tenants be declared to be forfeited and they be put in possession of the land. True, there is an additional prayer that the defendants be required to account for the rental value of the premises since the filing of the suit; but this is merely a prayer for incidental relief with respect to a right which will accrue to them during the pendency of the action, provided they succeed in maintaining their claim of forfeiture, which, if declared, would relate back at least to the filing of the suit. There is also a prayer to the effect that the plaintiffs recover the premises free of any charge for the maintenance of the life tenant, or any one holding under her. The property was conveyed to the life tenant for life, for the comfortable maintenance of herself and children. The children are the remaindermen, and are the plaintiffs in this case. The right of the life tenant to maintenance from the property is incident to and a part of her life estate, and would cease with the loss of that estate, in the event a forfeiture thereof be declared. Neither of the prayers just mentioned seeks any relief other than is incidental to an action under the statute. The suit being one in which no equity is invoked, but purely a real action under a statute having its origin in the common law, its venue is not affected by the constitutional provision that equity cases shall be tried in the county of the residence of a defendant against whom substantial relief is prayed. (It might here be remarked that no equity jurisdiction can attach with respect to legal waste, except for purposes of injunction. 5 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. § 491.) "Real actions at common law were those by which all disputes concerning corporeal hereditaments were decided." Will's Gould on Pleading, 6. They extended to actions claiming title to rents, commons, and the like, in fee simple, fee tail, or for life, as well as actions for the recovery of the land itself. 3 Bl. Com. 117. Such actions were local in character. 3 Bl. Com. 294. But with us the venue of suits is now controlled by constitutional and statutory provisions. In addition to the constitutional provision regarding equity cases above referred to, the Constitution further declares that "cases respecting titles to land shall be tried in the county where the land lies," and, with exceptions as to specified actions not material here to mention, "that all other civil cases shall be tried in the county where the defendant resides." This suit was brought in Calhoun county, in which the land involved is located. The demurrers were filed by the defendant Martin, who did not reside in that county; and unless the suit was one "respecting titles to land," within the meaning of the constitutional provision referred to above, there was no jurisdiction over Martin.

Was it such a suit? Numerous adjudications have been made with respect to what did or did not constitute an action respecting titles to land; but an examination of all the cases we have been able to find discloses that those held not to be of this nature are, in the main, reducible as follows: (a) Those in which the action sounded in trespass and the object was the recovery of damages, or proceedings were for the purpose of injunction to prevent trespass, or an attempt was made to fasten a lien on property, actions in which the question of title was only incidentally involved to the extent of showing a right on the part of the plaintiff to maintain his action. Examples of this class are Osmond v. Flournoy, 34 Ga. 510, Powell v. Cheshire, 70 Ga. 357, 48 Am. Rep. 572, Beckwith v. McBride, 70 Ga. 642, and Wheatley v. Blalock, 82 Ga. 406, 9 S. E. 168. (b) Those in which the legal title was out of the plaintiff, and it was sought to cancel a deed, or to obtain specific performance, or in some other way invoke the aid of a court of equity in order to establish the plaintiff's legal title. The following cases fall within this class: Smith v. Bryan, 34 Ga. 53, Bivins v. Bivins, 37 Ga. 346, Taylor v. Cloud, 40 Ga. 288, McArthur v. Matthewson, 67 Ga. 134, Lowe v. Mann, 74 Ga. 387, Saffold v. Scottish Security Co., 98 Ga. 785, 27 S. E. 208, Fulgham v. Pate, 77 Ga. 454, Clayton v. Stetson, 101 Ga. 634, 28 S. E. 983, Ellis v. Farmer, 119 Ga. 238, 46 S. E. 105, and Martin v. Gaisert, 134 Ga. 34, 67 S. E. 536.

The line of cases just cited are the progeny of Smith v. Bryan, supra, in which the ruling was that "a bill in equity to set aside and cancel a deed, on the ground of fraud, is not a case respecting title to land," within the meaning of the provision of the Constitution fixing the venue in such cases. In that case (34 Ga. 62, 63) the court used this language: "What, in the intendment of the Constitution, are 'cases respecting titles to land'? We understand them to be cases in which the plaintiff asserts his title to the land in question, and depends for his recovery upon his maintenance of it, or to supply a link in the chain, wanting by reason of accident or other cause. In order to determine whether or not a plaintiff at law or a complainant in equity, who selects his forum upon this clause of the Constitution, has made a case of jurisdiction for the selected court, it is necessary to examine carefully his allegations. What, then, is the gravamen in this case? Is it, at the time of the filing of this bill, the complainant had title to the lands, and that the defendant held possession, or committed waste, or did any act respecting them, without his consent, and in derogation of his title? Not at all. * * * His case is not that the title never legally passed from him, nor that it has legally returned to him. His prayer is not that his title, under existing circumstances, may be adjudged good and valid, but that by reason of certain facts, dehors the title, the contract which divested him of it may be annulled, and it restored. The case, then, does not respect title to lands, but is respecting a contract in relation to them, and certain fraudulent practices, which, it is alleged, vitiate that contract." And in Clayton v. Stetson, 101 Ga. 634, 638, 28 S. E. 983, 984, it was said: "If the plaintiff, without resorting to the powers of the superior court as a court of equity, and without invoking equitable relief, can, upon her legal title, recover, the suit is well brought in the county where the land lies; but if, in order to vest herself with a legal title upon which she can recover at law, it becomes necessary at first to assert an equity as against the person invested with the legal title, then we conclude that the action should have been brought in the county wherein the defendant resided."

In the present case, proof of the conveyance to them by deed of the remainder interest (giving to them the right of ultimate enjoyment), and proof of acts of waste on the part of the life tenant such as to create a forfeiture of the intermediate estate within the intendment of Civil Code, § 3666, quoted supra, is sufficient to show in the plaintiffs a legal title and make out a prima facie case for recovery. We are satisfied that where the plaintiff, as in this case, confines himself to the remedy afforded him by the statute, he is seeking only to maintain a title devolving upon him by law as against the defendant's possession and claim of title under deed, and the suit is one "respecting titles to land," within the meaning of the Constitution. The very gist of the action is: Whose legal title is superior with respect to the right of possession in present—the defendant, claiming the life estate under deed, or the plaintiff, claiming it under forfeiture by virtue of the statute? The object of the action is to gain possession, and the right to possession is determined by an adjudication as to which has the superior legal title. We think the case we are considering measures up to the criterion laid down in Clayton v. Stetson, quoted supra, by which to determine when the action is one respecting titles to land, and that the venue of the suit, as brought, is in Calhoun county.

[2] None of the grounds of demurrer were well taken, and the court committed error in sustaining them and dismissing the petition.

JEFFERSON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1156*)—WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF TRIAL JUDGE—COMPETENCY OF JUROR.

When, in a criminal case, after verdict, an attack is made upon a juror upon the ground that he was not impartial, the trial judge occupies the place of a trier, and his finding that the juror is competent will not be reversed, unless under all the facts the discretion of the judge is manifestly abused. No abuse of discretion appears in this case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3070; Dec. Dig. § 1156.*]

2. GROUNDS FOR NEW TRIAL—EXPRESSION OF OPINION BY JUDGE.

Certain grounds of the motion for new trial, in which exception was taken to the expressions of the judge made pending the examination of witnesses, and others made while instructing the jury, were not subject to the criticism that they amounted to the expression of an opinion upon material facts in issue, or that they were otherwise prejudicial to the accused.

3. HOMICIDE (§ 203*)—EVIDENCE—"DYING DECLARATIONS"—ADMISSIBILITY.

In the trial of a murder case, if at the time of making declarations the condition of the wounded party making them, the nature of his wounds, the length of time after making the declarations before he expired, and all the circumstances, make a prima facie case that he was in the article of death, and conscious of his condition when he made the declarations, such declarations are admissible in evidence under proper instructions by the court to the jury, though the person may not have expressed his consciousness of impending dissolution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 431; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2297, 2298.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 921*)—NEW TRIAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Whether or not statements, made about eight or ten minutes after deceased was shot, to the effect that the accused "shot him like a dog and kicked him in the face," were admissible as a part of the res gestæ, the admission of them was not cause for a new trial, in view of other evidence to the same effect, which was afterwards introduced, some of which was introduced by the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2207; Dec. Dig. § 921.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 921*)—NEW TRIAL—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

In view of other evidence admitted, it was no cause for a new trial that the judge refused to allow a witness to testify that the prosecutor in the case, who was a witness for the state, had previously said: "He stated to me he wanted to hang him [meaning defendant] as high as a telegraph post."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2207; Dec. Dig. § 921.*]

6. EXCEPTIONS TO CHARGE—NO ERROR.

There were numerous exceptions to the charge; but, considered in the light of the evidence and the charge in its entirety, none of them were sufficient to require the grant of a new trial.

7, 8. OMISSIONS TO CHARGE—NO ERROR.

Several grounds of the motion for new trial complained of omissions to charge, and several of the refusal to charge upon request; but, in the light of the charge as given and the evidence submitted, none of them were meritorious.

9. NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The alleged newly discovered evidence was not sufficient to require the grant of a new trial.

10. HOMICIDE (§ 234*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, and there was no error in refusing to grant a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

11. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—INSTRUCTIONS—DEGREE OF OFFENSE.

The contention that the court erred in refusing to instruct Pen. Code 1910, §§ 64, 65, relating to voluntary manslaughter, cannot be sustained, where the court gave a concrete charge as to the law of voluntary manslaughter in so far as the offense was involved in the case, under either the evidence or the prisoner's statement.

12. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SELF-DEFENSE—DEGREES OF HOMICIDE.

Instructions that, if the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man that he was in any serious danger and the serious danger was less than a felony, it would be a voluntary manslaughter, and, if of a felonious assault, it would be justifiable homicide, and that, if an assailant intends to commit a trespass only, to kill him is manslaughter, and if he intends a felony, the killing is self-defense, and justifiable, did not give accurate statements of the law, and were properly refused.

13. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—DYING DECLARATIONS.

Where the court, in charging, read the sections of the Code as to dying declarations, and further instructed that dying declarations should be received with great caution, that if they were made the jury should consider all the circumstances under which they were made, the mental and physical condition of the deceased, whether the circumstances were calculated to impair his powers of observation and memory, whether he stated a mere conclusion, or the facts of the case, whether his statement was full, and whether the account was influenced by resentment, and therefore biased, there was no error in refusing to charge that great caution is necessary in the use of dying declarations, as deceased may have spoken under circumstances of confusion and surprise, which may occasion an injury to the mind and an indistinctness of memory, and that such evidence is liable to be incomplete.

14. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 942*)—NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—IMPEACHING TESTIMONY.

Alleged newly discovered evidence, merely intended to impeach witnesses for the state, is insufficient to require the grant of a new trial.

15. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 944*)—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—CUMULATIVE EVIDENCE—CREDIBILITY.

Newly discovered evidence, partly cumulative, offered by a witness whose veracity is sustained by the affidavit of one person and attacked by the affidavits of several, is insufficient to require interference with discretion of the judge in overruling a motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; S. P. Gilbert, Judge.

James Jefferson was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

J. H. Martin, S. B. Hatcher, A. W. Cozart, Ed. Wohlwender, S. T. Pinkston, and J. E. Sheppard, for plaintiff in error. Geo. C. Palmer, Sol. Gen., T. T. Miller, T. S. Felder, and T. Hix Fort, Atty. Gen., for the State.

ATKINSON, J. James Jefferson was indicted for the crime of murder. The person alleged to have been killed was Marion Marchant, a policeman in the city of Columbus. The implement employed by Jefferson in committing the homicide was a pistol. Immediately before the killing, Jefferson was seen standing in the front door of Thompson's near-beer saloon, fronting on Sixth avenue, talking to Marchant, who was standing out on the sidewalk facing him. No other witness testified to having heard the conversation, but Jefferson was seen suddenly to commence firing his pistol while standing in the door, and to fire five shots in rapid succession; all taking effect, and all passing entirely through the body except one, which passed through the arm. At the first shot Marchant began falling face forward, and when the shooting was over was lying face downward on the sidewalk, unable to move. After lying in that position for several minutes, and calling for those coming to the scene to turn him over, he was lifted, and carried into the saloon, and laid on the pool table. In about five minutes after he was shot, he made certain statements to McPhail, a witness introduced by the defense, concerning the homicide, and about eight or ten minutes afterwards made other statements of the same character to J. T. Moore, the chief of police, and Moses Moon, a fellow policeman. The shooting occurred in the city of Columbus at about 7:30 o'clock on Wednesday evening, the 12th day of April, 1911. On Saturday following the shooting, he made to the solicitor general a statement, telling who shot him, and giving other circumstances attending the shooting. The statement was reduced to writing, and on the following Monday morning submitted to him, and upon its being read over to him he said that it was correct. During the same morning he died. The doctor was with him at the time he made the statement on Saturday, and testified as to the nature of his wound and his opinion that Marchant could not recover, and that he was conscious and realized his condition; but he was not with him at the time the written statement was submitted to him on Monday. The chief of police, who was present on both occasions, testified as to Marchant's condition and appearance, and, upon the facts recited by him, stated that Marchant was conscious and obliged to know that he was in a dying condition.

According to the statement of the accused, the policeman threatened to arrest him without cause, and, upon being remonstrated with, threatened to blow a hole through him, and attempted at the time to draw his pistol, whereupon the accused drew his pistol and fired the five shots; Marchant endeavoring all the time to draw his pistol, but failing to do so. According to the statement of the deceased, Jefferson was drunk, and a few minutes before had been warned by him to go home, and after returning from up the street and finding him at this saloon he "got after him again," and Jefferson began shooting him without any provocation. At the first shot he fell, and Jefferson "stamped" him. After this he was shot while lying on the ground, but could not say how many times. The jury found the accused guilty, without recommending that he be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for life, and the death penalty was imposed. A motion for a new trial was refused, and the defendant excepted.

[1] 1. The fourth ground of the motion for new trial, being the first of the amended grounds, complained that one of the jurors who rendered the verdict "was not a fair and impartial juror, but he was incompetent and disqualified to serve as a juror in said case; he having said [on a given date], and before the trial of this case, that the defendant ought to be hung." As to this ground the trial judge occupied the position of a trier on the hearing of the motion for new trial. The evidence submitted upon the question was conflicting, and there was no abuse of discretion in overruling this ground of the motion. In such a case the Supreme Court will not control the discretion of the trial court, unless it clearly appears that it has been abused. Bowdoin v. State, 113 Ga. 1150

[2] 2. The fifth, tenth, eleventh, thirteenth, twenty-second, twenty-third, and thirty-fifth grounds complained that certain expressions of the judge used pending the examination of witnesses, and others made while instructing the jury, amounted to the expression of an opinion upon the facts, and were otherwise prejudicial to the accused. These grounds of the motion are lengthy, and it is unnecessary to set them out or elaborate upon them; but upon a careful consideration of each of them we fail to find that the expressions of the judge were subject to the criticism that they contained intimations upon questions of fact at issue, or that the remarks of the judge or questions propounded by him to the witnesses, upon which error was assigned, were unfair or illegally prejudicial to the accused. Grounds 9, 26, 27, 28, 31, and 34 also, among other things, complained that the charge criticised in them expressed opinions of the judge on issues of fact; but none of them were subject to this criticism. Other criticisms upon the charge embodied in these grounds fall within the ruling announced in the sixth division of this opinion.

[3] 8. The sixth amended ground complained that the court illegally admitted in evidence a paper which the state contended constituted the dying declaration of the deceased, over the timely objection that, before a paper as a dying declaration can go to the jury, the state must show that the declarant was conscious of his condition and in the article of death, and the evidence only showed that the paper was taken on Saturday and read over to the declarant on Monday, a short time before his death, and failed to show that he was conscious of his approaching dissolution. Evidence was introduced as to the nature of his wounds, the physical condition of the deceased produced by them, and other circumstances, which, taken together, was sufficient to make a prima facie case that the deceased was in the article of death and conscious of his condition when he made the declarations which were admitted in evidence; and the court submitted them to the jury under appropriate instructions. It is not necessary to the admissibility of such a statement that the person whose statements are sought to be introduced as dying declarations should express himself as believing that he is in a dying condition. Consciousness of his condition may be inferred from the nature of the wounds or from other circumstances. Barnett v. State, 136 Ga. 65, 70 S. E. 868; Perdue v. State, 135 Ga. 277 (8), 69 S. E. 184. There was no error in admitting the paper in evidence over the objection urged.

[4] 4. The seventh and eighth grounds of the amended motion for new trial complain of the admission in evidence of statements made by Marchant, after he was shot, to the effect that the defendant "shot him like a dog and stamped him in the face"; the statements having been made separately to J. T. Moore, the chief of police, and to Moses Moon, a fellow officer. The objection urged to the admissibility of the evidence was that the statements were no part of the res gestæ, but were mere hearsay. The statements were made about eight or ten minutes after the wounds were inflicted. Whether or not these statements were admissible, their admission will not require a new trial, as statements to the same effect were contained in the written dying declaration of the deceased, which was properly admitted in evidence on the testimony of one of the witnesses to whom the alleged res gestæ statements were made. The other witness to whom the alleged res gestæ statements were made did not testify concerning the dying declarations; and, were the issue close upon the point, it might make a difference, owing to the difference in the credibility of the witnesses. But the issue was not close. McPhail, a witness introduced by the defendant, whose testimony went in without objection, testified that Marchant told him that the accused "shot him like a dog"; also that, when he approached Marchant, who was lying on the sidewalk, his head was bruised. The accused denied in his statement that he had stamped Marchant in the face, and McPhail testified to the same effect; but he was the only witness so testifying, and he did not pretend to account for the manner in which Marchant's head became bruised. Several other witnesses testified that the accused stamped Marchant in the face.

[5] 5. The question, "State what prosecutor, Chief J. T. Moore, said with reference to this case," was propounded to a witness for the accused. It was stated to the court that, if permitted to answer, the witness would testify. "He said to me he wanted to hang him [meaning defendant] as high as a telegraph post." It was also stated that the testimony was offered in order to show the prosecutor's feelings, and in order that the evidence might go to the credit of the prosecutor, who was a witness for the state. The court refused to allow the question and answer, and error was assigned upon the ruling. It appears that Moore had elsewhere testified that he was the prosecutor in the case, had aided in employing counsel to assist in the prosecution, and had taken great interest in the prosecution, and could not remember whether he had made the remark attributed to him as sought to be proved. Under these circumstances, the exclusion of the proposed evidence did not furnish ground for the grant of a new trial.

[6] 6. The twelfth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteen, seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, twenty-first, twenty-third, twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, twenty-ninth, thirtieth, thirty-first, and thirty-second grounds of the amended motion complain of excerpts from the charge of the court. After a careful consideration of each of them, in connection with the evidence and the charge in its entirety, none of them contained any error requiring the grant of a new trial, nor were they of such character as to require elaboration.

[7, 11] 7. The twentieth amended ground complained that the judge erred in failing to define and charge the different grades of homicide, including manslaughter and voluntary manslaughter. The thirty-eighth ground was substantially to the same effect. The forty-third ground complained that the judge erred in failing to charge the jury the law of voluntary manslaughter, and failed to charge sections 64 and 65 of the Penal Code of Georgia; "there being evidence to warrant the jury in finding the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter, because the defendant killed the deceased upon a sudden heat of passion, and there being evidence to warrant the jury in believing that the deceased attempted to commit a serious personal injury on the defendant, or other equivalent circumstances to justify the excitement of passion, and to exclude all idea of deliberation or malice, either express or implied." The court gave the jury a concrete charge as to the law of voluntary manslaughter, in so far as that offense was involved in the case, under either the evidence or the prisoner's statement. Therefore there was no merit in the ground of the motion for new trial complaining that the court failed to define voluntary manslaughter in accordance with sections 64 and 65 of the Penal Code.

[8, 12] 8. The thirty-sixth amended ground complained that the judge refused to charge, on written request: "If the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man that he was in any serious danger, and the serious danger was less than a felony, it would be voluntary manslaughter; if of a felonious assault, it would be justifiable homicide." The thirty-seventh ground complained that the judge refused to charge, upon written request: "If an assailant intends to commit a trespass only, to kill him is manslaughter; if he intends a felony, the killing is self-defense, and justifiable." These requests did not give accurate statements of the law, and the principles sought to be stated in them were sufficiently covered by the general charge.

[13] The thirty-ninth ground complained that the judge refused to charge: "I charge you that great caution is necessary in the use of dying declarations, because, although there may have been an utter abandonment of all hope of recovery, it may often happen that the particulars of the violence of which the deceased has spoken occurred under circumstances of confusion and surprise, calculated to prevent their being accurately observed. The consequence also of the violence may occasion an injury to the mind and an indistinctness of memory as to the particular transaction. The deceased may have stated his inference from facts concerning which he may have drawn a wrong conclusion, or he may have omitted particulars, from not having his attention called to them. Such evidence is therefore liable to be incomplete. He may naturally also be disposed to give a partial account of the occurrence, although not possibly influenced by animosity or ill will. From these considerations the law recognizes and declares that dying declarations shall be received and used as testimony with great caution." The court, in charging the jury, read them the sections of the Code as to dying declarations. He further instructed them: "Dying declarations should be received and considered by the jury with great caution. If such declarations were made, it is your duty to consider all of the circumstances under which they were made, the mental and physical condition of the deceased at the time, whether the circumstances were calculated to impair his powers of observation and memory, whether the deceased stated a mere conclusion of his own mind or the facts of the case, whether his statement was full, or only a partial one, and, after considering all the attending circumstances, determine for themselves the credibility and weight of this part of the testimony. The jury may also consider, in regard to dying declarations, whether the account given by the deceased on the occasion was influenced by resentment, and therefore was biased and incomplete, or whether it was complete and unbiased. * * * It is for you to determine, therefore, first, whether the evidence sufficiently shows that the deceased was conscious of his approaching death, that his death was really approaching, to authorize the admission of the dying declarations; and, if not, you should disregard the dying declarations altogether. * * * You are to determine what weight to give it," etc.

These instructions being certainly as favorable to the accused as he could expect, it was not error for the court to decline a request to give a lengthy argumentative charge on the subject of dying declarations, which set forth the reasoning of a writer on criminal evidence, quoted in the opinion in the case of Mitchell v. State, 71 Ga. 128, delivered by a judge of this court, "why great caution is necessary, not only in the admission, but in the use, of this testimony." In Campbell v. State, 11 Ga. 353-375, it was said: "Great caution should be observed in the use of this kind of evidence." But this was before the adoption of the Code dealing with the admissibility of dying declarations. It would seem that the codifiers, in prescribing the rule as to the admissibility of dying declarations in prosecutions for homicide, declaring that they are admissible only when made by a person in the article of death, when he is conscious of his condition, as well as restricting the use of such declarations to the sole purpose of showing the cause of death and the person who committed the act, defined the precautionary rule which the decisions had pronounced which should be observed in the admission of this kind of evidence. See Mitchell v. State, 71 Ga. 141. Having so instructed the jury, there was no error in refusing this request.

[9, 14] 9. The fortieth ground of the motion relates to alleged newly discovered evidence as disclosed in an affidavit by Hermon Bussey, and the forty-first ground relates to alleged newly discovered evidence as set forth in an affidavit by Irene Jones. An examination of the affidavits discloses that the alleged newly discovered evidence merely tended to impeach witnesses who had testified in behalf of the state, and therefore it did not show cause for the grant of a new trial.

[15] The forty-second ground relates to the alleged newly discovered evidence of Virginia Reynolds. Her affidavit amounts to evidence merely cumulative of the statement of the accused, except that she states that the deceased had his hand on his right hip pocket, with the other hand reaching toward the accused, and that the deceased had one foot on the steps of the store when the accused first fired. The character and credibility of Virginia Reynolds is vouched for by one affidavit only, that of Ellen Schley, who deposes that the associates of Virginia Reynolds were Emma Peterson, William Peterson, and the deponent. On the hearing of the motion for a new trial the state submitted affidavits of numerous witnesses, whose respective characters were sustained by affidavits of other witnesses, to the effect that Virginia Reynolds was a negro prostitute, of bad character, and unworthy of belief, and that they would not believe her on oath, and that Ellen Schley, who made the affidavit as to the good character of Virginia Reynolds, was herself of bad character, and a prostitute, and unworthy of belief. This ground also is insufficient to require interference with the discretion of the trial judge in overruling the motion for a new trial.

[16] 10. The verdict was authorized by the evidence, and the discretion of the trial court in refusing a new trial will not be disturbed.

NEAL BANK v. BRUCE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MORTGAGES (§ 439*) — FORECLOSURE — AMENDMENT TO PETITION.

Where the petition for the foreclosure of a mortgage was brought in the name of the holder of the mortgage, there being upon the back of the mortgage an indorsement making the instrument payable to a named party, which indorsement purported to be signed by the mortgagee, followed by an indorsement in blank, which purported to be that of the transferee under the first indorsement, the defendant in his plea having denied both the genuineness and the legality of the indorsements and transfers set forth, it was competent for the plaintiff to amend the petition, so as to substitute therein the name of the mortgagee as suing for the use of the original plaintiff, the holder of the instrument sought to be foreclosed; and the court erred in refusing to allow an amendment to that effect upon its being offered by the plaintiff.

2. REVIEW.

The court having erroneously refused to allow the amendment referred to above, the subsequent proceedings on the trial of the case were nugatory.

Error from Superior Court, Wilcox County; U. V. Whipple, Judge.

Action by J. L. Bruce against the Neal Bank. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

A petition for the foreclosure of a mortgage on realty was brought against the mortgagor in the name of the Neal Bank; there being upon the back of the mortgage the following indorsements: "Pay to the order of Dreger & Doughty, Mgrs., Sept. 3, 1904. L. M. Bruce." "Dreger & Doughty, Mgrs." L. M. Bruce was the mortgagee. To which petition for foreclosure the defendant filed the following plea: "Defendant denies both the genuineness and legality of the indorsements and transfers set forth in the third paragraph of said petition." Upon the trial of the case the plaintiff offered the following amendment to the declaration: "Now comes the plaintiff in the above-styled case, and, by leave of the court first had and obtained, amends the declaration in said case filed as follows, to wit: The defendant in said case having denied in the pleadings therein the legality of the transfer on said mortgage from L. M. Bruce to Dreger & Doughty, Mgrs., and the transfer by Dreger & Doughty, which transfers are on the back of the mortgage as follows: 'Pay to the order of Dreger & Doughty, Mgrs., Sept. 3, 1904.' 'Dreger & Doughty, Mgrs.' Therefore the plaintiff aforesaid amends the declaration in said case, so as to substitute in said declaration wherever the name of said plaintiff, the Neal Bank, appears as plaintiff, the name of L. M. Bruce for the use of the Neal Bank, so that the suit shall proceed, not in the name of the Neal Bank as plaintiff, but in the name of L. M. Bruce, suing for the use of the Neal Bank." And in connection with said amendment the plaintiff offered to indemnify L. M. Bruce against any costs in the case, in such way as the court might direct. Upon objection of the defendant the court refused to allow the amendment, which ruling was assigned as error.

Error from Superior Court, Appling County; C. B. Conyers, Judge.

Action by J. L. Weaver against J. B. Cromartie and Tenar Cromartie. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

V. E. Padgett, for plaintiffs in error. H. L. Williams and W. W. Bennett, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. A complaint for certain described land was brought by J. L. Weaver against J. B. Cromartie and Tenar Cromartie in Appling superior court. The defendants admitted possession of the land, but denied the plaintiff's title thereto.

The plaintiff sought to recover upon substantially the following state of facts: A mortgage was executed by J. B. Cromartie, of Appling county, upon a valuable consideration, and for the purpose of securing the payment of a certain promissory note, payable to Dwelle & Dwelle, or order, and by the terms of the mortgage the mortgagor did "sell, mortgage, alien, and convey unto Dwelle & Dwelle, their successors and assigns," the real estate sued for, and did "authorize the holder of this mortgage to foreclose the same in the usual manner, or (at their option) by taking possession of the mortgaged property and selling all or any portion thereof, either at public or private sale upon giving ten days notice to me in writing (the said J. B. Cromartie) the same to be left at my usual place of residence, of their intention to sell, and such other notice as they may deem proper, and I hereby constitute the said Dwelle & Dwelle, or their assigns, my attorney to pass good and sufficient title to such property upon making such sale." The above-recited instrument, properly executed and recorded, was transferred to "Dr. J. L. Weaver, with all our right and title and full power to foreclose the same as we might do under the laws of the state of Georgia." Notice was given to the mortgagor, J. B. Cromartie, dated January 6, 1910, reciting that on the 17th day of January, 1910, he, J. L. Weaver, would sell before the courthouse door in Appling county, Ga., between the legal hours of sale, the property described in the suit; "the purpose of said sale being to pay the mortgage hereinbefore recited for the sum of $316.47, besides interest thereon, and signed by the plaintiff, J. L. Weaver, holder of said mortgage." The property described in the mortgage and notice was sold to H. W. Reins, and a deed executed to the purchaser on January 17, 1910, by J. L. Weaver, attorney in fact for J. B. Cromartie, and, in turn, a deed was executed by Reins to J. L. Weaver to the property described in the mortgage and notice. At the conclusion of the evidence, the defendants moved the court to grant a nonsuit because the evidence was insufficient to authorize a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, which motion the court overruled, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and to this judgment the defendants excepted.

The sole question in this case is whether the sale of the land sued for is in conformity with the power of sale contained in the mortgage, and whether that power must be strictly complied with before the sale would be legal and pass the title to the land to the purchaser at the sale. Under the terms of the mortgage, the holder was "authorized to foreclose in the usual manner, or (at their option) by taking possession of the mortgaged property and selling all or any portion thereof, either at public or private sale upon giving ten days notice" to the mortgagor, etc.

[1] It is insisted as neither Dwelle & Dwelle, the original mortgagees, nor J. L. Weaver, their assignee, had ever "taken possession of the property" before the sale, that the sale was therefore void under the power of sale contained in the mortgage. There are two lines of decisions upon this question, but the weight of authority seems to be against the contention of the plaintiffs in error, and we follow the weight of authority in support of the judgment of the court below. In 2 Jones on Mortgages (8th Ed.) § 1782, it is stated that: "Under a power in default of payment to 'enter and take possession of said premises immediately, and sell and dispose of the same,' the entry and possession are not generally considered a condition precedent to the exercise of the power of sale." The following authorities support the text above quoted: Vaughn v. Powell, 65 Miss. 401, 4 South. 257; Kiley v. Brewster, 44 Ill. 186; Jones v. Hagler, 95 Ala. 534 (3), 10 South. 345; Williams v. Dreyfus, 79 Miss. 245, 30 South. 633 (2); Hamilton v. Halpin, 68 Miss. 99, 8 South. 739. And to the same effect is the text in 27 Cyc. 1464 (c) and cases cited. We hold that the taking of possession of the land sued for in this case was not a condition precedent to the exercise of the power of sale under the mortgage, and, while the language quoted would authorize, it did not require, the assignee of the mortgage to take possession before the sale. The general rule is that a power of sale in deeds of trust, mortgages, and other instruments must be construed strictly. Civil Code 1910, § 4620; Callaway v. People's Bank, 54 Ga. 450. But it will be noted that the language of the mortgage is that the holder is "authorized" to foreclose or take possession and sell. The right to do both does not exclude the right to do either. That the assignee is authorized to proceed in either manner does not mean, we take it, that he must do both. Nor do we think, because he is "authorized" to sell the land "by taking possession," that it would destroy the power of sale if he failed to take possession of the land as a condition precedent to the sale.

[2] We think the assignee was authorized, but not required, to take possession of the land before the sale, and that the sale, without his taking possession, was legal, and passed the title in the land to the purchaser at the sale. The court did not err in over-ruling the motion for a nonsuit and directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

CENTRAL GEORGIA POWER CO. v.
PRESTON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 10, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

There was sufficient evidence to support the verdict.

2. REQUESTS TO CHARGE—SUFFICIENCY OF GENERAL CHARGE.

The requests to charge, in so far as they were legal and pertinent, were sufficiently covered by the general charge.

3. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 262*)—PROCEEDINGS TO TAKE PROPERTY—VERDICT.

While in the trial of cases of this character this court has recognized it as the correct practice for the trial court to instruct the jury that in case their finding should be for the owner of the land in any amount as consequential damages, as well as actual damages, they should include both in one lump sum, the fact that the court below departed from this practice, and instructed the jury to state the amount of actual damages and consequential damages, in case their finding included both, is not such error as to require the grant of a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 262.*]

4. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 223*)—FORM OF VERDICT—INSTRUCTION.

The evidence in this case demanded a finding in some amount for consequential damages, and consequently the court did not err in charging the jury as follows: "The form of your verdict will be: 'We, the jury, assess the value of the property taken at so many dollars, and find so many dollars as consequential damages for property not taken.' You can state the amount in figures or letters."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 223.*]

5. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 203*)—PROCEEDINGS TO TAKE PROPERTY—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

The court did not err in refusing to allow a witness for the movant to answer the following question: "State in what way the company proposes to control this land." Nor was this testimony rendered admissible by the statement, made by counsel for the movant at the time the question was propounded, to the effect that "the witness, if permitted to answer, would state that it was the intention of the plaintiff company to operate and maintain these lines so as not to injure the defendant's property, and that said land and said lines would not be patrolled by wagons and autos, but same would be patrolled prudently and skillfully."

6. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 222*)—PROCEEDINGS TO TAKE PROPERTY—INSTRUCTIONS.

In view of the entire charge, the jury were sufficiently instructed as to the meaning of the expressions "value," "compensation," and "compensatory damages," as used in the charge.

Error from Superior Court, Butts County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Central Georgia Power Company against W. M. Preston. From the judgment, the Central of Georgia Power Company brings error. Affirmed.

Walter T. Johnson and Greene F. Johnson, for plaintiff in error. O. L. Redman and O. M. Duke, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. The Central Georgia Power Company condemned certain lands belonging to W. M. Preston, for the purpose of erecting and maintaining towers and transmission lines on and across the same. From the award of the assessors, Preston appealed to a jury in the superior court. To the verdict awarded by the jury the Power Company excepted and moved for a new trial, and upon the court's refusal to grant the same the case was brought here for review.

[1] 1. While the jury seem to have accepted as true the very highest estimate made by any witness as to the actual damages resulting from the erection of certain towers and the "clearing up" of a strip across the defendant's tract of land, we cannot say that their verdict was unauthorized by evidence, and that it is so excessive as to shock the moral sense and show bias and prejudice upon the part of the jury trying the case.

[2] 2. The court was requested in writing to give the following charge: "In estimating the value of the land taken by the plaintiff in this case, I charge you that under the law the plaintiff company is entitled to have this land at its fair market cash value, unaffected by the fact that it needs it or desires it. It is not a question of the value of the property to the owner, nor can the value be increased by his unwillingness to sell. On the other hand, the compensation cannot be measured by the value of the property to the party condemning it, nor by its need of the particular property. The market value of property is the price which it will bring when it is offered for sale by one who desires, but is not obliged, to sell it, and it is bought by one who desires, but is not obliged, to buy it. It is what the property would bring, if sold in the market under ordinary circumstances for cash, and not on time, and assuming that the owners are willing to sell, and the purchaser willing to buy."

In the case of Central Georgia Power Co. v. Mays, 137 Ga. —, 72 S. E. 900, this court, speaking in reference to the rule for fixing the compensation to an owner whose property is taken for a public use, said: "Lewis on Eminent Domain (3d Ed.) § 706, well states the rule as follows: 'In estimating the value of property taken for public use, it is the market value of the property which is to be considered. The market value of property is the price which it will bring when it is offered for sale by one who desires, but is not obliged, to sell it, and it is bought by one who is under no necessity of having it. In estimating its value, all the uses to which it may be applied, or for which it is adapted, are to be considered, and not merely the condition it is in at the time, and the use to which it is then applied by the owner. * * * All the facts as to the condition of the property and its surroundings, its improvements and capabilities, may be shown and considered in estimating its value.' " Generally speaking, says the same author: "The true rule seems to be to permit the proof of all the varied elements of value; that is, all the facts which the owner would properly and naturally press upon the attention of the buyer to whom he is negotiating a sale, and all other facts which would naturally influence a person of ordinary prudence desiring to purchase. In this estimation the owner is entitled to have the jury informed of all the capabilities of the property, as to the business or use, if any, to which it has been devoted, and of any and every use to which it may reasonably be adapted or applied. And this rule includes the adaptation and value of the property for any legitimate purpose or business, even though it has never been so used, and the owner has no present intention to devote it to such use."

The request to charge states a part of this rule; but upon a comparison of the written request with the true rule, as stated by the text-writer and approved by this court, it will be observed that the request to charge was incomplete, in that it omitted certain very essential elements of the rule as stated in the quotation made by Mr. Justice Hill in the course of his opinion. It fails to include in the definition of market value, as given, the very material qualification that, "in estimating its value, all the capabilities of the property and all the uses to which it may be applied, or for which it is adapted, are to be considered, and not merely the condition it is in at the time and the use to which it is then applied by the owner." With this essential principle omitted from the request to charge touching the subject of market value and actual damages, we do not think that the request contained such a complete statement of the law upon the question dealt with as would render the refusal to give it error upon the part of the court.

The other requests to charge, in so far as they were legal and pertinent, and not of a merely cautionary nature, were sufficiently covered by the general charge.

[3-5] 3-5. The rulings made in headnotes 3, 4, and 5 require no discussion.

[6] 6. In one ground of the motion for a new trial it is complained that the court erred "in failing to instruct the jury that the plaintiff company was entitled to the property taken at its fair market value, and erred, further, in nowhere giving in charge to the jury any definition of what constituted market value in the eyes of the law and in contemplation of such condemnation proceedings as the jury were then and there trying." While the court did not use the expression "market value" in his instructions to the jury in discussing the amount of compensation to be allowed to the landowner, he did instruct the jury that "damages which the law allows to be assessed in favor of a landowner whose property has been taken or damaged under the right of eminent domain are purely compensatory. No remote, fanciful, or speculative damages can be allowed, but only such damages as are the necessary and connected effect of the company's act, in taking this land and using it for its purposes. * * * You ascertain from the evidence in the case what is the value of the property taken by this company, used for its purposes, and then the value of the crops destroyed, if any were destroyed or injured, and the value of the timber or trees cut or injured, if any, or destroyed, if that has been shown, and the reasonable value of the same. He would be entitled to recover that in addition to the actual value of the land taken." We are of the opinion that in view of these portions of the charge, in the absence of a pertinent and apt written request to charge that actual value was the market value of the property, it was not error for the court not to further instruct the jury as to the meaning of the terms "value," "compensation," and "compensatory damages," as used by him in his charge.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

VARN v. CHAPMAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—REVIEW—ABANDONMENT OF ERROR.

Failure of counsel for plaintiff in error to refer in his brief to an assignment of error amounts to an abandonment of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4256-4261; Dec. Dig. § 1078.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 17*)—PROCESS TO SUPPORT—ATTACHMENT—PERSONAL JUDGMENT.

Where a defendant in attachment, at the time it was issued and levied, resided in the county where it was returnable, but prior to the filing of the declaration changed his domicile to another county, the court wherein the attachment was pending did not have jurisdiction to render a general judgment against the defendant; he not having appeared and made defense, nor replevied the property levied upon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 25-33; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

3. COURTS (§ 37*)—JURISDICTION OF PERSON—WAIVER OF OBJECTION—ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF SERVICE OF NOTICE.

In such a case, a written acknowledgment, made after the filing of the declaration, of due and legal service of notice of the pendency of the attachment and of the proceedings thereon, did not amount to a waiver of jurisdiction as to the defendant's person.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 147-151; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 252*)—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 57*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE—INSOLVENCY OF GRANTOR.

On the trial of the traverse to the grounds of the attachment, after the plea to the jurisdiction had been stricken, the court erred, under the facts of the case, in instructing the jury as follows: "If, at the time the conveyance [a deed of gift from the defendant to his wife and children] was made, it appears that some portion or all of this indebtedness [alleged to be due plaintiff by defendant] was then in existence, and it further appears that the defendant is insolvent, then the law presumes that the conveyance was made for the purpose of defeating that indebtedness. If you find that is true, then you will find in favor of the plaintiff, and against the traverse."

5. COURTS (§ 37*)—JURISDICTION OF THE PERSON—WAIVER OF OBJECTION.

Where a plea to the jurisdiction of the court to render a general judgment against the defendant in attachment was on the trial stricken by the trial judge, and the Supreme Court holds that he erred in so doing, the defendant cannot subsequently urge defenses to the merits of the case, without waiving the objection to such jurisdiction.

Error from Superior Court, Jeff Davis County; C. B. Conyers, Judge.

Action by A. B. Varn against G. W. Chapman. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings two writs of error. Reversed.

H. A. King and W. W. Bennett, for plaintiff in error. F. Willis Dart, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. On September 26, 1908, an attachment was issued in favor of Chapman against Varn, on the ground that defendant was a fraudulent debtor. In the petition for attachment it was alleged that the defendant was a resident of Jeff Davis county. On the 30th day of the same month the attachment was levied on a described parcel of land situated in the county of Jeff Davis. The attachment was returnable to the February term, 1909, of the superior court of that county. At that term, and on February 22d, the plaintiff filed his declaration in attachment, and on the succeeding day the defendant acknowledged "due and legal service" of notice by plaintiff of the suing out and levying of the attachment and of the filing of the declaration. Defendant, on February 23d, and at the same term of the court at which the declaration was filed, entered a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, in so far as plaintiff sought in his declaration to recover a general judgment, in which plea it was in effect set up that at the time of the filing of the declaration, and at the time of the acknowledgment of notice by the defendant, he did not reside in Jeff Davis county, but in the county of Appling, Ga., and that therefore the superior court of Jeff Davis county had no jurisdiction to render a general judgment against him, but that the jurisdiction for such purpose was in the superior court of Appling county. During the term to which the attachment was returnable, and on February 26, 1909, the defendant filed a traverse to the attachment, in which he not only denied the truth of the grounds of the attachment, but also specifically denied all the allegations of the petition for attachment as to the indebtedness claimed by the plaintiff to be due him by the defendant. The case went to trial at the September term, 1910, and at that term the defendant moved to dismiss the plaintiff's case, in so far as it was sought therein to obtain a general judgment against defendant, upon the ground that it appeared from the declaration that, at the time of the filing of the same and the service of notice, the court was without jurisdiction to render a general judgment against defendant. The declaration alleged: "That A. B. Varn was, at the date of issuing, levying, and filing of the attachment herein referred to, a resident of said state and county [Jeff Davis], but is now a resident of Appling county, Georgia." The court, on motion of the plaintiff, struck the plea to the jurisdiction, and overruled the defendant's motion to strike from the declaration so much thereof as sought to recover a general judgment against him. An answer to the declaration was filed by the defendant at the trial term, one paragraph of which was, on motion of the plaintiff, stricken by the court. The matter of the answer is not now material. The traverse was first separately tried. A verdict was rendered against the traverse. The court in the main case directed a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant for given amounts as principal and interest, as alleged in the petition for attachment and in the declaration to be due and owing to the plaintiff by the defendant, with a special lien in favor of the plaintiff for such amounts on the property attached, and judgment was entered in accordance with this verdict. The defendant moved for a new trial as to the traverse, which motion was overruled. The defendant, in a direct bill of exceptions, assigned error upon the ruling of the court in striking his plea to the jurisdiction, and in refusing to dismiss so much of the declaration as sought a general judgment, and also excepted to the direction of a general verdict against him. He subsequently filed another bill of exceptions, in which error was assigned upon the overruling of his motion for a new trial as to the traverse. No point of practice as to the suing out of the two writs of error has been made.

[1] 1. Counsel for plaintiff in error, in the brief filed in this court, does not refer to the assignment of error as to the striking of the portion of the answer to the declaration, and such assignment must therefore be considered as abandoned.

[2] 2. In such brief it is insisted that the trial court erred in striking the plea to the jurisdiction, in overruling the motion to strike therefrom so much of the declaration as sought a general judgment, and in directing a general verdict in the main action, upon the ground that all such rulings were erroneous for the one reason that, under the facts of the case, the court was without jurisdiction of the defendant's person, and that for such reason no personal or general judgment could be rendered against him. Therefore the question here raised is whether, under the facts of the case, the court had jurisdiction of the defendant's person, so that a general judgment might be rendered against him. The ground of the attachment was that the defendant had conveyed, by deed of gift to his wife and children, a described parcel of realty liable for the payment of his debts, for the purpose of avoiding the payment of the same, and was based upon the provisions of Civil Code, § 5088. A judge of the superior court of the circuit wherein such debtor resides, if qualified to act, and, if not, the judge of an adjoining circuit, may grant an attachment on such grounds, to be issued in the usual form and directed as usual, and which shall be executed as existing laws provide, and subject to existing laws as to traverse, replevy, demurrer, and other modes of defense. Id. § 5090. And such attachment, when issued and served, shall be returned and disposed of as attachments are now returned and disposed of, and be subject to the same defenses. Id. § 5092. The general rule governing the return of attachments returnable to the superior court is that they shall be returned to the next term of such court of the county where the defendant resides. Id. § 5063. When the attachment is returnable to the superior court, the plaintiff shall file his declaration at the first term, and the subsequent proceedings shall be in all respects the same as in cases where there is personal service. Id. § 5102. "The plaintiff, his agent, or attorney at law may give notice in writing to the defendant of the pendency of such attachment and of the proceedings thereon, which shall be served personally on the defendant by the sheriff, his deputy, or a constable of the county in which said attachment is returnable by giving him a copy of said notice at least ten days before final judgment on said attachment, and returning said original notice with his service entered thereon to the court in which said attachment is pending, which being done, the judgment rendered upon such attachment shall have the same force and effect as judgments rendered at common law; and no declaration shall be dismissed because the attachment may have been dismissed or discontinued, but the plaintiff shall be entitled to judgment on the declaration filed, as in other cases at common law, upon the merits of the case." Id. § 5103. "The defendant may appear by himself or attorney at law, and make his defense at any time before final judgment is rendered against him." Id. § 5104. "In all cases of attachment the defendant may traverse the truth of the affidavit in relation to the ground upon which the attachment issued, at the return of the attachment; and if said attachment is returnable to the superior court, the issue formed upon such traverse shall be tried by a jury at the same term, unless good cause is shown for a continuance; and if the final verdict upon such issue shall be in favor of the defendant said attachment shall be dismissed at the cost of the plaintiff." Id. § 5106. "No traverse of the plaintiff's attachment, affidavit or other proceeding of the attachment shall delay judgment on the declaration where personal service has been perfected, but judgment may be had thereon, subject to the rules of the common law, as well before the trial of the issue made on the attachment proceedings as afterward." Id. § 5107.

It appears, therefore, that an attachment may become a sort of dual proceeding—that is, one quasi in rem in its nature, wherein only a judgment against the property seized in attachment can be rendered; and another, which is of a somewhat supplementary character, wherein by personal notice, served upon the defendant as provided by statute, a general judgment may be obtained against him as in a suit at common law. No general judgment can, however, be obtained, unless the defendant be notified in accordance with the statute, or unless he appears and makes defense, or replevies the property levied upon. The attachment in the present case was properly issued, was levied upon described realty as the property of the defendant situated in the county of his then residence, and was returned to the superior court of the county where he then resided. So no question could be raised as to the jurisdiction of the court as to the property seized. Did the court, at the time of the filing of the declaration in attachment, have jurisdiction of the defendant's person? The plea challenging the jurisdiction of the court over the defendant's person, and which was stricken by the court, set up that after the issuance and levy and return of the attachment, which was in September, 1908, and before the declaration was filed in February, 1909, the defendant had removed from Jeff Davis county, where he resided when the attachment was issued and levied, to Appling county, in this state, where he has since retained his domicile. Where it is sought to obtain a general judgment against the defendant, after the filing of the declaration, the service of the notice provided by the statute is in the nature of a new or supplemental proceeding; and, in order that such a judgment may be rendered, the court must then have jurisdiction of the defendant's person. The service of such notice of pending proceedings quasi in rem in the manner prescribed takes the place of an ordinary suit and service of process. The statute, in requiring a written notice to be given to the defendant of the pendency of the attachment and the proceedings thereon, which notice "shall be served personally on the defendant by the sheriff, his deputy, or a constable of the county to which said attachment is returnable," clearly contemplates that the defendant, at the time of the service of such notice, shall be a resident of the county where the attachment has been returned; for, if the defendant did not then reside there, neither the sheriff, his deputy, nor a constable of that county, would have any authority to serve him with the notice. The Constitution of this state provides that all civil cases, other than in certain instances, shall be tried in the county where the defendant resides. They must, of course, therefore, be brought in such county. The proceedings to obtain a general judgment against the defendant in attachment, by giving him the statutory notice, does not fall within any of the exceptions specified in the Constitution to the general rule. The seizure under attachment of the defendant's property is not process or notice which will authorize the rendition of a general judgment against him. The statute prescribed the notice to be given in lieu of process. From what has been said, we are quite clear in our conclusion that the court had no jurisdiction of the defendant's person at the time of the filing of the declaration, in which it was sought to obtain a general judgment against him, and that it was error to strike the plea to the jurisdiction.

[3] 3. No notice of the pendency of the attachment and the proceedings thereon was served upon the defendant, but he acknowledged "due and legal service" of such notice prior to the filing of his plea to the jurisdiction. If the court had no jurisdiction of the defendant's person at the time the declaration was filed, the acknowledgment of notice of its filing would not amount to a waiver of jurisdiction. Jackson v. Hitchcock, 48 Ga. 491 (2); Hartsfield v. Morris, 89 Ga. 254, 15 S. E. 363. See, also, Moss v. Burch, 99 Ga. 94, 24 S. E. 865, and citations; Shearouse v. Morgan, 111 Ga. 858, 36 S. E. 927.

[4] 4. On the trial of the traverse the court gave the following instruction to the jury: "If at the time the conveyance [the deed of gift made by the defendant to his wife and children to the realty levied upon] was made, it appears that some portion or all of this indebtedness [the sums alleged by the plaintiff to be due him by the defendant on certain promissory notes] was then in existence, and it further appears that the defendant was insolvent, then the law presumes that the conveyance was made for the purpose of defeating that indebtedness. If you find that is true, then you will find in favor of the plaintiff and against the traverse." This was excepted to in the motion for a new trial. The instruction was erroneous for two of the reasons assigned: Because (1) there was no evidence that the defendant was insolvent at the time he made the conveyance; and (2) the financial condition of the defendant at the time of the trial would not necessarily affect the validity of the conveyance, but his insolvency at the time the voluntary conveyance was executed is what would render it fraudulent and void.

We deem it unnecessary to specifically deal with any of the other grounds of the motion for a new trial; it being sufficient to say that none of the errors therein assigned, except as they are included in what is said above, were of sufficient materiality to require the grant of a new trial.

[5] 5. The defendant, in his traverse, not only denied the grounds of the attachment—that is, that he had conveyed his property liable for the payment of his debts, for the purpose of avoiding the payment of the same—but also denied specifically the various paragraphs of the petition for attachment, in which the nature and amounts of the various indebtedness were alleged to be owing by him to the plaintiff. He also, in his answer to the declaration, pleaded to the merits of the case. The filing of such traverse and answer, in which defenses to the merits of the case were set forth, would not of itself amount to a waiver of his plea to the jurisdiction of the court to render a general judgment against him; for such traverse and answer would be considered as filed subject to the plea to the jurisdiction. Nor would the fact that the defendant, after the striking of such plea, upon the trial of the traverse, submitted evidence to sustain his answer in denial of the indebtedness alleged to be due the plaintiff, amount to a waiver of his plea to the jurisdiction. The defendant, however, cannot insist upon his plea to the jurisdiction, and have it sustained, and then plead to the merits, without subjecting himself to the jurisdiction of the court, so as to enable it to render a personal judgment against him. In other words, as we have held that his plea to the jurisdiction of the court to render a personal judgment against him was good, and should not have been stricken, he cannot hereafter stand on his defense to the merits of the case, without waiving his objection to such jurisdiction and authorizing the rendition of a personal judgment against him.

McWILLIAMS et al. v. CITY OF TALLAPOOSA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 284*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—ASSESSMENT FOR TAXATION.

An act approved December 23, 1896 (Acts 1896, p. 247), constitutes the charter of the city of Tallapoosa. Section 9 of that act contains provision for the making of tax returns by property owners, and for the assessment for taxation of all the lots and parcels of land within the city at their reasonable and just value. It provides, further, that the council of said city shall make out, between the 1st days of April and July in each year, a complete list of all lots of land in the city, which list shall show the names of the owners and matters of description, as well as the value of each lot or parcel of land as assessed by the city council; and it further provides: "If the owner of any real or personal property conceives that said city council have placed too great a value on such property, such owner or his agent may have such assessment reviewed by the mayor and council of said city, who shall assess such property at its reasonable and just value, and their decision shall be final in the premises; and if any taxpayer in said city think that said city council have placed too low an estimate on any property therein, such person shall have the right to have such assessment reviewed by the said mayor and council, whose action shall be final as aforesaid. The list of all real estate assessed as herein provided, and all personal property returned by the owner, or assessed as herein provided, shall be completed by said city council on or before the 15th day of August, and within 15 days thereafter said mayor and council shall ascertain and declare the rate to be levied and collected from such assessment and returns." The remainder of said section relates to the time when the taxes so levied shall become due and to the collection of the same. Held, that section 9 of the quoted act is not violative of the provisions of the Constitutions of the United States and of the state of Georgia, which declare that no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law, on the ground that the section under consideration "attempts to make final the action of said mayor and council in the assessment of property for taxation, whatever may be the value at which they may assess the property, and irrespective of whether their action in the premises is done in good faith or fraudulently, and attempts to deny to property owners any right of review of the justice and fairness of such assessments, and attempts to confer on the mayor and council of said city authority to confiscate property in said city under the guise of assessing the same for taxation, and in that said section does not provide for notice to property owners of the assessment of their property, nor does said charter elsewhere provide for such notice, nor does said charter, or said section thereof, provide them a reasonable opportunity to be heard, nor does said charter, or said section thereof, provide for any notice whatever of the time

BAUGHMAN AUTOMOBILE CO. v. EMANUEL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 10, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

BAILEMENT (§ 18*)—MECHANICS' LIENS—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—RIGHT TO LIEN.

A court of equity will not entertain jurisdiction to enjoin the owner of personal property from asserting his title by appropriate remedy at law to recover the property, as against one who is seeking to subject it by the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien for labor performed and material furnished to repair the property at the instance of the vendee, who had not paid the purchase price thereof, and where the vendor had retained the title to the property, and the contract of sale was duly recorded, although the vendor knew of the labor performed and the repairs being made on the property, and that the vendee was insolvent.

(a) The mechanic's remedy in such case is by paying the vendor the balance of the purchase price of the property due by the vendee, and then subjecting the property to the mechanic's lien for the labor and material furnished, as the property of the vendee.

(b) Where labor and material are furnished to improve personal property at the instance of the vendee, in such a way that the vendor has no choice but to accept them, such acceptance would create no liability against the vendor, or his property so improved.

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; Frank Park, Judge.

Action by the Baughman Automobile Company against J. H. Emanuel and another. Judgment for defendant Emanuel on demurrer, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The Baughman Automobile Company filed its equitable petition in the superior court of Decatur county against J. H. Emanuel, of that county, against whom it prayed substantial relief, and J. Douglas Harrell, formerly of Decatur county, but now living in Florida, and alleged the following: J. H. Emanuel is the owner of a certain Buick automobile, and some time prior to May 20, 1910, he made a contract in which he agreed to sell the automobile to Harrell for a named price, and, in order to secure the purchase price of the same, "took a retention of title to the automobile, which was properly recorded." After Harrell had used the automobile for some time, it became badly out of repair, and he took it to the plaintiff, requesting it to put the machine in thorough repair and do everything necessary to put it in thorough running order. In compliance with this request the plaintiff proceeded to rebuild the automobile and put it in thorough condition, putting into the machine material (an itemized statement of which is set forth in the petition) amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $330.16. When the machine was brought to the plaintiff, it was practically worthless, would not run, and would not have brought $300; but after it was repaired it was practically as good as new. Harrell is insolvent, and was insolvent at the time the repairs were made, and the defendant Emanuel knew this fact, and that the only hope the plaintiff had of getting its money was out of the machine, which has been claimed and is now in possession of Emanuel under bail trover proceedings against the plaintiff. Plaintiff was unable to get Harrell to settle the bill for repairs, and on August 5, 1910, it sued out a mechanic's lien for work and material furnished on said automobile against Harrell; and, an order to sell said machine having been obtained, Emanuel filed claim thereto. Emanuel and Harrell both knew that plaintiff was repairing the automobile, and was expending large sums for material, labor, etc.; but Emanuel remained silent, did not object, and has accepted the fruits of the plaintiff's labor and material, and neither has ever paid nor offered to pay therefor, though requested so to do. The suit is not brought on the contract made with Harrell, but for the value of the material and labor necessary to put the automobile in proper condition, all to the value of $330.16. The prayers of the petition are: (1) That defendant Emanuel be restrained and enjoined from entering up judgment against the Baughman Automobile Company on the bail trover proceedings instituted by him, and from proceeding with said bail trover suit in any way until the further order of the court. (2) That said defendant either be enjoined from using said automobile and impairing the value of the material furnished and repairs made by the plaintiff, or, in lieu thereof, that said defendant be required to give bond in such sum as will be sufficient to secure plaintiff against loss. (3) For general relief. To the petition the defendant Emanuel filed a general demurrer and moved to dismiss the case: (1) Because the petition sets forth no cause of action, legal or equitable, against him. (2) Because it is not alleged that the plaintiff ever tendered to defendant the amount due by Harrell to him on the purchase of the automobile described. The court, at the appearance term, after argument had, sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition, at the cost of the plaintiff. To this judgment the plaintiff excepted.

Erie M. Donalson, for plaintiff in error.
M. E. O'Neal and Russell & Custer, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). The general demurrer filed to the equitable petition was properly sustained by the court. The plaintiff's remedy was not by equitable petition, but by paying the balance of the purchase price due by Harrell to Emanuel, in whom the title to the automobile was, and then proceeding to subject the property to the mechanic's lien as the property of Harrell, the vendee, at whose instance the improvements were made. It is insisted, however, that this rule would work a hardship where the mechanic is not financially able to pay the balance of the purchase money due on the machine in order to subject it to the mechanic's lien for labor and material furnished in repairing and improving it. But the reply is that, in the present case at least, the plaintiff knew, at the time the labor was performed and the material furnished, as appears by the petition, that the title to the property improved was in another person than the one for whom the work was being done and the material furnished, and that that person was insolvent. The plaintiff, therefore, furnished the labor and material to repair the property with full knowledge of the insolvency of the vendee, for whom the work was being done, and that the title to the property was in the vendor, J. H. Emanuel. It would be a hardship, also, to one who had parted with personal property by conditional contract of sale, and who had taken the necessary legal steps to protect the title by taking a written contract reserving title in himself, and put the world on notice of that fact by having the contract duly recorded, to have the property subjected to the debts of other creditors, who have not thus secured themselves.

It is also contended by the plaintiff in error that the vendor, Emanuel, knew of the improvements being made on the machine, and accepted them, and therefore that this created a liability which would subject the vendor's property to the mechanic's lien. The petition which alleged the above facts shows that, as soon as the vendor of the automobile had notice that an effort was being made to subject it to the foreclosure of the mechanic's lien, he filed his action in bail trover to recover the property. There are authorities to the effect that, where services are of such a nature that one has no choice but to accept them, it cannot be said that the party accepted them voluntarily, and such acceptance would create no liability. WASHINGTON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 14, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMICIDE (§§ 203, 215*)—EVIDENCE—"DYING DECLARATIONS"—ADMISSIBILITY.

It is not necessary for the state to show affirmatively that a person who has been shot said he was in a dying condition, in order to admit proof of his declarations, if in point of fact he was in articulo mortis, and the circumstances were such that he must have known that he was in a dying condition, so that the jury might be instructed by the court as to whether the statements made by the deceased were spoken, knowing of the immediate prospect of death.

(a) It is not error for the court to allow a witness to testify that the deceased, under the circumstances detailed in the foregoing headnote, said that "he [meaning the defendant] shot me for nothing," over objection that this was a mere expression of opinion by the deceased, and not a declaration of the fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 430, 456; Dec. Dig. §§ 203, 215.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2297, 2298.]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—MANSLAUGHTER—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Where a defendant is on trial, charged with murder, and the court refuses to charge the jury on involuntary manslaughter in the commission of a lawful act without due caution and circumspection, such refusal is not error, where the evidence shows that the charge is not applicable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 652; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 825*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

Where, on the trial of a defendant charged with the crime of murder, the defense relied on is that the homicide was the result of accident or misfortune, and the court has correctly charged the jury the law in relation thereto, it is not error for the court to omit to define what would constitute accident or misfortune, in the absence of a request so to do.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2005; Dec. Dig. § 825.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 804*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—ACCIDENT.

It is not error for the court to charge the jury, on the trial of a defendant charged with murder and relying on the defense of accident or misfortune, that "while he [defendant] admits that he did the shooting as alleged by the state, on or about the time alleged by the state," where the court follows that language immediately with the words: "He [defendant] contends that the shooting was without malice aforethought, express or implied, and contends that it was not his intention to kill, but was entirely an accident or misfortune, and that he would not be guilty of any offense under the law and evidence in this case."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 636; Dec. Dig. § 304.*]

5. HOMICIDE (§ 219*)—EVIDENCE—DYING DECLARATIONS—IMPEACHMENT.

Where the state relies mainly upon the dying declarations of the deceased to the effect that the defendant "shot him for nothing," it is reversible error for the court to refuse to allow a witness for the defendant to testify that, shortly after deceased was shot by the defendant, the deceased told the witness that he and the defendant had had no difficulty, and that the shooting was an accident; the defense relied on by defendant being that the shooting was accidental, and the testimony being admissible for the purpose of impeaching the dying declarations of the deceased.

Error from Superior Court, Jasper County; Jas. B. Park, Judge.

Richard Washington was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

Eugene M. Baynes, for plaintiff in error. Jos. E. Pottle, Sol. Gen., A. Y. Clement, and T. S. Felder, Atty. Gen., for the State.

HILL, J. Richard Washington was indicted in Jasper superior court for the offense of murder, and at the August term, 1911, of said court he was found guilty by the jury trying him, with the recommendation that his punishment be life imprisonment in the penitentiary. A motion for a new trial was made on the general grounds, which was afterwards amended. The motion, as amended, was overruled by the court, and the defendant assigns this ruling as error.

The case made by the state is substantially as follows: On the night of the homicide defendant and deceased were at the house of William Smith. "There was no frolic there that night." Neither deceased nor defendant had had any previous difficulty, so far as the evidence discloses, just before the shooting, but were sitting down, laughing and talking. Just before the pistol fired the deceased asked the defendant for a cigarette, and the defendant asked the deceased if he wanted it "rolled hard or soft, and shot him." The witness who testified to these facts was standing behind the defendant, in another room, and did not see the defendant when he fired, and did not know where he got the pistol. But one shot was fired. The defendant did not say anything after he shot the deceased, but "stood out there in the floor with his head hung down, and then went out of the door with his head hung down."

The deceased just said, "O Lordy!" This witness and the deceased were sweethearts, and were to be married at Christmas. She was also a niece of the defendant, and had never heard of any trouble between the defendant and the deceased; but defendant always told her "he thought a lot of Sidney Roberts," the deceased. Two other witnesses, Margaret and Nellie Folds, also testified to substantially the above facts, except that one of them, Nellie Folds, said that defendant got his pistol out of his front pocket. "Didn't see defendant bring anything else out with his pistol. After defendant asked deceased if he wanted it rolled hard and tight, he shot immediately. * * * Richard [the defendant] did not point any pistol at him to make me expect that he was going to shoot. I did not hear Richard make any remark afterwards, nor anybody else." Mr. Will Reid testified: "The night Sidney Roberts was killed, Richard Washington came over to my house, which was 400 or 500 yards from William Smith's house. Richard called me, and woke me up, and told me he had shot Sidney Roberts. He walked up on the porch and called me, and said he had shot Sidney, and I asked him what he shot him for, and he said he didn't know, and I told him to go home, and he said he was scared to go home. Richard [defendant] did not say what he shot him for, and said he didn't know. Richard stayed in the cotton seed hulls on my place that night, and I woke him up next morning. I went to see Sid, and when I came back Richard was standing on the doorsteps. I said I didn't believe Sid would live until dinner; and Richard told his wife to get his clothes, he was going to leave. I told him not to do that. I gave him his pistol. Richard did not say what he intended to do." Mr. W. F. Persons testified that he made an effort to arrest the defendant after the homicide was committed. "I arrested him three weeks ago in Florida. I had been searching for him and trying to find him before that." Dr. J. H. Bullard testified that he was called to attend Sid Roberts, the deceased; did not probe for the ball, as "the man's condition did not justify it. The wound on his body was from a pistol ball, I suppose." The wound was right in front of his body, and caused his death. If two men of about the same size were facing each other, and one fired a pistol at the other, the ball would enter about as this one did. When he got there "the man was suffering greatly, and was sinking rapidly, not in a comatose state, but showing extreme weakness and pain; and I stated to him I couldn't do him any good—could probably give him a little relief; and he was speaking about the occurrence, and said the man shot him for nothing, that he had not done a thing to him; and he gradually grew weak."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

er and weaker. I remained around there for some time, and he went into a state of coma."

The theory of the defense was that the homicide was accidental. In his statement to the jury the defendant said that he and the deceased had been joking around the fireplace and playing, and, when the deceased asked him for a cigarette, he asked deceased if he wanted it rolled hard; that the deceased replied, "Yes," and defendant said he would roll it for him; that he intended to get the tobacco out of his pocket, and when he pulled the pistol out he did not know that there was a cartridge in it; that the pistol must have been already cocked in his pocket. He didn't remember putting any finger on the trigger, "and after the thing fired, it hurt me so bad; it almost burst my heart." He stood there a few minutes, and went over to Mr. Reid's, and told Mr. Reid about it, and asked if he could stay there that night. "I knew I done this thing accidental, and couldn't help it, and didn't want to meet none of his folks." The accused further stated that he did not get his pistol out of his front pocket, but out of his hind pocket; that his pistol, tobacco, and a rule were all in his overalls pants pocket; that he had no idea in the world that the pistol was going to shoot; that he had never had a cross word with deceased, or any of his folks; that the reason he left was that the next morning he went to Mr. Mobley and told him about it, and the latter said, "Stay out of the way three or four days, to keep Lucius Roberts from hurting you," and until Mr. Mobley got well, and he would settle it; that he went off, as Mr. Mobley told him to do, and when he heard Mr. Mobley was still sick he "went on"; that he told Mr. Henderson that morning in the room that he did not feel like going off, because he did not do the thing intentionally; that he did not try to hide, but wrote back home twice every week, and he left home because Mr. Mobley said he would settle it, and keep defendant from "having trouble with the boy's folks, and Mr. Mobley hasn't got able to settle it yet."

[1] 1. The court permitted Dr. Bullard, the attending physician, to testify, over the objection of the defendant's counsel, that "when I got there the man was suffering greatly, and was sinking rapidly, not in a comatose state, but showing extreme weakness and pain; and I stated to him I couldn't do him any good—could probably give him a little relief, and he was speaking about the occurrence, and said the man shot him for nothing, that he had done nothing to him; and he gradually grew weaker and weaker. I remained around there for some time, and he went into a state of coma. I stayed some little time after I had this little conversation. I don't know that he died the next day or the day following. I don't know the hour he died." Movant objected to the foregoing testimony on the grounds that it was irrelevant and immaterial: (a) That the circumstances of the case did not show that the declarations of the deceased were dying declarations, and in order for them to be admitted as such the deceased must be "in extremis"; (b) that the statement made by the deceased that "he shot me for nothing" was a mere expression of opinion by the deceased. We think the evidence was material and admissible. This court has held that, in order to render dying declarations admissible, it is not necessary for the state to show that the deceased affirmatively said that he was in a dying condition, or used language of similar character. It is proper to allow the declarations to be proved, if the deceased was in fact in articulo mortis, and the circumstances were such as that he must know this to be so, that the jury may be instructed by the court as to whether the statements made by the deceased were conscious utterances in the apprehension and immediate prospect of death. Young v. State, 114 Ga. 849, 40 S. E. 1000; Perdue v. State, 135 Ga. 278 (8), 69 S. E. 184; Darby v. State, 79 Ga. 63, 3 S. E. 663. Nor was it error, under the facts of this case, to allow the witnesses to testify that the deceased said that "he shot me for nothing," over objection that this was a mere expression of opinion by the deceased, and not a declaration of the fact. White v. State, 100 Ga. 659 (2), 23 S. E. 423; Darby v. State, 79 Ga. 63 (2), 3 S. E. 663.

[2-4] 2-4. Under the facts of this case it was not error for the court to refuse to charge the jury the law of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of a lawful act without due caution and circumspection. If the defendant desired a fuller charge on the subject of a homicide alleged to have been committed by misfortune or accident, such a request should have been made to the court. The court did charge the jury: "As I said to you just now, the defendant contends that he is not guilty of any offense. While he admits he did the shooting, he contends that the shooting was an accident or misfortune, without any malice, either express or implied, and without any intention to kill whatever, and that under the law and facts in this case he would not be guilty of any offense whatever. The law says a person shall not be found guilty of any crime or misdemeanor committed by misfortune or accident, and where it satisfactorily appears that there was no evil design or intention, or culpable neglect." We think this clearly states the rule, and that there is no merit in the contention that the court omitted to define what would constitute accident or misfortune. We do not see how the jury could have misunderstood the language; but, if the defendant wanted the charge to be more full and explicit, a request to that effect should have been made. And this ruling applies to the other ground of the motion, that "the charge of the court is correct as far as it goes." If the charge is not full enough, a request should be made to amplify it.

We do not think there is any merit in the tenth ground of the motion, and that the construction placed upon the language in the charge is not fairly inferable from the language itself, when fairly understood. The court charged the jury that "the defendant, on the other hand, contends that he is not guilty of any offense. While he admits that he did the shooting, as alleged by the state, on or about the time alleged by the state, he contends that the shooting was without malice aforethought, either express or implied, and contends that it was not his intention to kill, but was entirely an accident or misfortune, and that he would not be guilty of any offense under the law and evidence in this case." We do not think that this charge is susceptible of the construction contended for by the plaintiff in error, to the effect that the charge misstated the contention of the defendant, because "defendant did not contend or admit that he did the shooting as alleged in the indictment; for, if such admission had been made, he would be guilty of murder." Taken in connection with the context, it is clear that the court did not so intend, nor could the jury have reasonably so understood.

[5] 5. It is also insisted by the plaintiff in error that the court erred in refusing to allow the witness John Henderson to answer the following: "You and several other white men went down to see Sidney Roberts right after he was shot; and didn't Sidney at that time tell you that he had no trouble with Richard Washington, and the thing was an accident?" The plaintiff in error contends that the witness, if permitted, would have answered "Yes" to this question, and that the presiding judge was then and there informed what would be the answer of the witness. We think the court erred in excluding this question and answer from the jury. It was not admissible as a dying declaration, or as a part of the res gestæ; but where the state relied largely upon the dying declarations of the deceased to convict the accused, it is admissible to show that after the deceased was shot he made statements in conflict with such dying declarations. Battle v. State, 74 Ga. 101. In other words, it was admissible for the purpose of impeachment. In addition to other methods, a witness may be impeached by proof of contradictory statements. And this court has held that dying declarations may be impeached by proving contradictory statements made by the deceased. In the case of Battle v. State, supra, this court said: "It cannot be easily seen, if the dying declarations of the deceased, made ex parte, in the presence of his own friends and relatives, and not in the presence of the accused or his friends, without a cross-examination, and testified to by his friends and relatives, are to be admitted against the accused from the necessity of the case, why the declarations of the deceased after the mortal blow is given, to other persons and at other times, different from the dying declarations, should not be admitted in evidence to impeach the dying statement. If the one is admitted contrary to the general rule, why should not the other likewise be admitted? The former is admitted in favor of public justice; why not the latter in favor of life and liberty?" See, also, Bates v. State, 4 Ga. App. 486, 61 S. E. 888; Columbus R. Co. v. Peddy, 120 Ga. 589 (2), 48 S. E. 149; Jordan v. State, 120 Ga. 864, 48 S. E. 352; Cox v. State, 124 Ga. 95, 52 S. E. 150.

The dying declaration of the deceased, relied on for conviction by the state, was that the defendant had "shot him for nothing." In reply to this, the defendant sought to show by the testimony excluded that, soon after the deceased was shot, he said that he had had no trouble with the defendant, and "the thing was an accident." This statement is at variance with the dying declaration, and utterly inconsistent with it; and the defendant was entitled to show, if he could, that, soon after the shot was fired, the deceased said that the shooting was accidental, as being in conflict with his dying declarations. As the defendant was entitled to this testimony, for the purpose stated, and the same having been excluded from the jury, we think that the court erred in so doing, and that the judgment of the court below, overruling the motion for a new trial, should be reversed.

Where, in a plea to a suit on account, the only defense set up is a denial of the account, it is not error to exclude the testimony of the defendant "that the account sued on by the plaintiff had been fully paid, and that in the last settlement he had with the plaintiff that plaintiff was indebted to him about $1.80, and that defendant derived his knowledge from his book of account, which he kept himself." This is so, because there was no plea of payment, or of accord and satisfaction, and because the defendant only offered to swear to the contents of his account book, which was the primary evidence of what it contained. *Birmingham Lumber Co. v. EVANS, P. J. [1] This is an action of ejectment on the several demises of W. M. Barton, C. W. Barton, H. S. Barton, and Fannie Barton, against A. E. Johnson, J. C. Johnson, and W. R. Johnson, to recover the east half of lot No. 130, the east half of lot No. 129, and the west half of lot No. 131, in the Fifth district of formerly Houston, now Bibb, county, Ga. The defendants in their plea set up title by judicial sale, title by adverse possession, and res adjudicata as to three of the plaintiffs, and equitable estoppel as against all. Upon the conclusion of the evidence a verdict was directed for the defendants, and the plaintiffs excepted.

The case as made by the evidence was as follows:

It was admitted that John Barton was the common propositus. John Barton on July 16, 1864, executed his will. The material parts, as affecting this case, are the second and third items thereof: "(2) My will and desire is, and I so desire and bequeath, that all my property, real, personal, and mixed, shall remain together under the control and management of my wife, Frances F. Barton, for the joint support and maintenance of herself and my child or children during her widowhood, with these qualifications, viz.: Upon the arrival of my present son, John F. Barton, at 21 years, he is to have one undivided half of my property, unless I leave a posthumous child; or if there be one and it be a daughter, then John Francis is to have the half as stated. If there be a posthumous son, he is to take his one third on reaching 21 years, and the other third to belong to my wife during her life or widowhood—in each of which events her part of the property is to belong equally to my children or child in life. It will be seen that I make this will in view of the uncertainty of my return from the army, where I expect to go in a few days. I also desire here to explain that the provision made in the event of a second marriage is done in no unkind spirit towards my wife, but simply because I prefer my children to have all my property rather than any of it should go to the support of or be managed by a stepfather. (3) In case my wife shall outlive my children or child, they leaving no issue, then at her death I will and bequeath all my property equally to be divided between my brothers and sisters."

John Barton died in May, 1879, leaving a widow and four children, the plaintiffs' lessors. The child, John F. Barton, mentioned in the will, died before his father. The will was admitted to probate, and letters testamentary issued to Frances F. Barton. In 1879 a 12 months' support was duly set apart in the sum of $1,200 in money to Frances F. Barton and her four minor children out of the estate of John Barton. An execution issued on this year's support judgment, and was levied upon the east half of lot 129 and the east half of lot 130, and these two lots were purchased at sheriff's sale by one Thomson, as trustee for Mildred Johnson. The land was pointed out by Frances F. Barton, and the purchaser at sale was put in possession of the east half of lot 129 and the west half of lot 131, under the impression that the latter lot was the east half of lot 130, and the land was bid off by the purchaser under this mistake. The widow and the plaintiffs were in possession of the east half of lot 130 until the year 1893, when they sold it to Mrs. Satira R. Grace; all of them joining in the conveyance. The present defendants are privies in estate with the purchaser at sheriff's sale, and have been in the continuous adverse possession of the east half of lot 129 and the west half of lot 131 since the sheriff's sale in 1881. In 1893 W. M. Barton and C. W. Barton brought their several suits against J. O. Johnson to recover the east half of 129, which suits resulted in verdicts for the defendant, upon which judgments were duly entered by the court. In the same year Fannie Barton brought suit against Mrs. A. E. Johnson to recover the west half of lot 131, alleging in her abstract of title that her mother and brothers had conveyed their interest in this lot to her. This suit terminated in a verdict for the defendant, upon which a judgment was entered in 1895.

[2] Under the will of John Barton it is clear that he contemplated his early demise, and intended to devise his property to his wife and son, John F., and an expected posthumous child. John F. predeceased his father and there was no posthumous child. It was argued that the will could not be relied on as a muniment of title, because it was revoked by the birth of children, which contingency was not provided for in the will. The statute provides that the birth of a child to the testator subsequently to the making of the will, in which no provision is made in contemplation of such event, shall be a revocation of the will. Civil Code 1910; § 3923. It may be that the birth of other children than those referred to in the will would operate to revoke the same; yet the proper place to determine that question is in the ordinary's court on a motion to vacate the judgment of probate. After the will has been probated, the judgment of probate cannot be collaterally attacked. We do not find it necessary to decide what interest, if any, the plaintiffs in error take as devisees of their father. It is clear that, until the will is set aside, the mother would take at least a one-third interest in the property, which would pass to the plaintiffs in error upon her death; and they would be entitled to recover at least her interest, unless they are barred by some of the defenses averred in the plea and cross-petition. We will therefore immediately take up the several defenses and discuss their merits.

As to the east half of lot 129, there can be no doubt that the defendants acquired title by virtue of the sale of the same under the year's support fi. fa. in favor of Frances

F. Barton and her four minor children. The year's support proceedings and the sale all appear regular upon their face, and no attack is made thereon by the plaintiffs in error. Besides, as against three of the plaintiffs, that title has been confirmed by judicial decree. As to the east half of lot 130, there is no contention that the defendants or their predecessors in title from the purchaser at the sheriff's sale ever entered into possession of it, and the defendants neither claimed possession of it nor title to it.

[3] As to the west half of lot 131, we think that the plaintiffs are equitably estopped from claiming title to it. It appears that the land was pointed out to the sheriff for levy by Mrs. Barton, and was misdescribed by the wrong number. It was sold by the sheriff, and purchased by the successful bidder at the sale, under the belief that it was the west half of lot 131. The purchaser was put into possession of the west half of lot 131, as being the lands conveyed to him by the sheriff, and he and his grantees have remained continuously in the possession of the land for nearly 30 years prior to the institution of this suit. The deed from the sheriff was promptly recorded. In 1893 Mrs. Barton and three of the children, who were then of full age, joined in the conveyance to Mrs. Grace; and three years thereafter, upon the arrival at age of the other plaintiff, she ratified the conveyance. Mrs. Grace went into possession of the land purchased by her, and, as there is nothing in the record impugning her good faith, her adverse possession for more than 7 years has ripened into a prescriptive title as against the defendants to the east half of lot 130. There is no dispute that the east half of lot 130 and the west half of lot 131 were of equal value. In their pleadings the defendants prayed that the sheriff's deed be reformed, so as to correct the misdescription of the land, and the sheriff and his grantee were made parties to the suit.

The ground for equitable estoppel consists in the sale of two adjacent lots of equal value, where the purchaser is put in possession of one lot, when the other lot was the one described in the sale. The owners of these two lots have received the full value of both of them, one in the proceeds of the sheriff's sale and the other in the purchase money from Mrs. Grace. Under these circumstances the plaintiffs, even if they, with their mother, were clothed with the entire title to the land, would be estopped from asserting title against the defendants in error. Swatts v. Spence, 68 Ga. 496. We have not alluded to the 30 years' adverse possession of the defendants, more than 7 years of which continued after the majority of the youngest plaintiff in error, for the reason that so long as the judgment of probate stands they were not entitled to the interest which their mother took under the will until after her death in 1908, and for the further reason that the plaintiffs in error are equitably estopped from recovering the land.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

HAYES v. TOWNS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 123*) — PROCEEDINGS—NONSUIT.

Upon the trial of an action for the specific performance of a parol contract relating to the purchase of land, the evidence submitted in behalf of the plaintiff tended to show the following facts: Plaintiff and defendant entered into a parol agreement, under the terms of which they were to purchase from a third person a described lot of land, plaintiff and defendant each to pay one-half of the purchase price. Defendant was to negotiate the purchase, take from the seller a bond for title to both plaintiff and defendant, and to make the payments, one of which was to be cash, and the balance in one and two years thereafter. Upon payment of all of the purchase price to the seller, plaintiff was to get a deed to the south half and the defendant to the north half of the lot. Defendant took a bond for title in his own name, informing plaintiff, who was unable to read, that the bond was in the names of both himself and plaintiff. Thereupon plaintiff paid to defendant half of the first payment, which defendant paid to the seller. Plaintiff, upon the maturity of the second payment, offered to pay his half of the same to defendant; but defendant refused to accept the same, saying that he was unable to pay his half, and would arrange with the seller in reference to the second payment. Upon maturity of the last payment, plaintiff tendered to defendant the balance due by plaintiff as his half of the remaining purchase money, which defendant refused to accept, and for the first time denied that he had made any contract for the purchase of the land with plaintiff, and claimed that the contract had been made between plaintiff and defendant's wife. Defendant had lived on the north half of the land several years, cleared 10 acres thereon, and had leased the timber on the whole lot for sawmill purposes. The amounts received by defendant for the timber, when added to the amount of money plaintiff had paid defendant, amounted to more than plaintiff's half of the purchase price. Held, that a nonsuit was properly granted, for the reason that there was no evidence tending to show that the seller had conveyed the land, or any portion thereof, to defendant, or that the seller had been paid all of the purchase price of the land, or that defendant had title to the land, or any portion thereof, from any source.

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 83*)—TEMPORARY ADMINISTRATOR—"REPRESENTATION."

The appointment of a temporary administrator does not constitute "representation" upon the estate of a decedent, within the purview of Civil Code 1910, § 4376, which provides that "the time between the death of a person and representation taken upon his estate * * * shall not be counted against his estate, provided such time does not exceed five years," so as to cause the statute of limitations to begin to run against the estate upon the appointment of such temporary administrator.

2. TEMPORARY ADMINISTRATOR.

The decision in Scott v. Atwell, 63 Ga. 764, upon review, is affirmed.

Certified Question from Court of Appeals. Action between Fred Baumgartner and S. T. McKinnon, as administrator. From the judgment, Baumgartner appealed to the Court of Appeals, which certified the question to the Supreme Court. Question answered.

See, also, 73 S. E. 519.

The Court of Appeals certified to the Supreme Court the following question: "Does the appointment of a temporary administrator constitute 'representation' upon the estate of the decedent, within the purview of Civil Code 1910, § 4376, which provides that 'the time between the death of a person and representation taken upon his estate * * * shall not be counted against his estate,' for the purposes of the statute of limitation of actions? In this connection counsel for plaintiff in error has requested the right to review the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Scott v. Atwell, 63 Ga. 764, for the purpose of having the same modified or overruled."

R. D. Meader, for plaintiff in error. Harry F. Dunwoody, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. It is true that the Code declares that a temporary administrator may sue to recover debts due the estate (Civil Code 1910, § 3937); and upon the general analogy of the law, that where a person has the capacity to sue, and fails to exercise the right, the statute of limitations will run against him, an argument may be based that, on account of the provision of this section, the right and duty are correlative, and the statute runs against the estate. But, on the other hand, the section of the Code to which reference has been made arose, not from legislative enactment, but from the codification of the decision in Ewing v. Moses, 50 Ga. 264. The decision in that case was rendered before the one in Scott v. Atwell, 63 Ga. 764. The opinion in the case last cited expressly referred to the fact that the court had held that temporary administrators had the right to sue in certain cases, but nevertheless construed the statute suspending the running of the statute of limitations against an estate until "representation taken," provided the time elapsing was not greater than five years, to refer to the grant of permanent letters. The members of the court doubtless had before them the decision in 50 Ga. 264, supra, as well as other cases, at the time this construction was placed upon the statute; and we do not think the codification of the decision in 50 Ga. 264, and the adoption of the Code containing that provision, is sufficient to change the ruling thus made.

A temporary administrator occupies a somewhat peculiar position. He is appointed to act only until a permanent administrator is appointed, for the purpose of collecting and taking care of the effects of the deceased; and from the order appointing him no appeal is allowed. Civil Code 1910, § 3935. By Civil Code 1910, § 3936, he is required to give a bond for double the amount of the personal property; but it has been held that no action can be brought on the bond until the appointment of a permanent administrator. Webster v. Thompson, 55 Ga. 431. His duties are principally of preservative character. Banks v. Walker, 112 Ga. 542, 37 S. E. 866; Neal v. Boykin, 129 Ga. 676, 682, 59 S. E. 912, 121 Am. St. Rep. 237. A permanent administrator is required to give bond in a sum equal to double the amount of the estate to be administered. Civil Code 1910, § 3972. A temporary administrator may take steps with a view of collecting and preserving the estate, including certain litigation; but he is not clothed with the full power of a permanent administrator. Thus, he cannot sue for the recovery of land. Banks v. Walker, 112 Ga. 542, 37 S. E. 866. He cannot distribute the estate; nor will notice to him of an application for dower be sufficient. Langford v. Langford, 82 Ga. 202, 8 S. E. 76. Section 3997 of the Code of 1910 declares that an administrator shall be allowed 12 months from the date of his qualification to ascertain the condition of the estate, and that creditors falling to give notice within that time lose all rights to an equal participation with creditors of equal dignity to whom distribution is made before notice of such claim is brought to the administrator. Evidently this did not contemplate a temporary administrator, who had no right to make any distribution. The language of Civil Code 1910, § 4377, touching the suspension of the statute in favor of an estate, is the same as that relating to the running of the statute against it. If the estate could practically be wound up by litigation pro and con with a temporary administrator, and the statute of limitations be applied to such administrator, as well as to a permanent one, section 3997 would be of little avail to the estate. Moreover, a judgment against an administrator is conclusive evidence that he has in his hands assets of the decedent, if he fails to plead plene administravit or plene administravit præter. Neither of these pleas could be filed by a temporary administrator. It will thus be seen that, comparing the functions of a temporary administrator with those of a permanent administrator under the statutes of this state and the decisions construing them, it would produce much confusion and conflict to hold that the estate should be barred by the omission of the temporary administrator to sue.

The ruling announced in the first headnote follows the decision in Scott v. Atwell, 63 Ga. 764, and that decision answers the question propounded by the Court of Appeals, unless, upon review, it is overruled or modified by this court. Upon request of counsel, the Court of Appeals has certified the question to this court, so that application may be made for such a review. The decision mentioned was rendered in 1879, and has stood unquestioned from that time until the present. Upon a review of it, we decline to modify or overrule it. All the Justices concur.

"As a general rule, the debtor has a right to appropriate payments. If he does not, the creditor may. If neither does, the jury will make the application under the direction of the court." Newton v. Nunnally, 4 Ga. 357; Civ. Code 1895, § 3722 (Civ. Code 1910, § 4316). A surety cannot claim a release from liability to pay a promissory note, which he indorsed, upon the ground that the payee, who was also the payee of notes junior in date and maturity, executed by the same maker, to the notes which he had indorsed, failed to apply payments made by the principal debtor (without direction as to their application) to the oldest note. Error from City Court of Brunswick; D. W. Krauss, Judge.

Action by L. T. McKinnon, as administrator, against Fred Baumgartner and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Baumgartner brings error. Affirmed.

It appears from the record that P. W. Fleming borrowed $500 from John A. Ward, and gave therefor the promissory note which is the subject-matter of this suit, dated February 6, 1903, and due one year after date, with interest from date at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. This note was indorsed by B. A. White, Jr., M. Elkan, and Fred Baumgartner. On May 1, 1903, Fleming borrowed $200 from Ward on his (Fleming's) note indorsed by George R. Krauss, and $300 on his (Fleming's) note indorsed by R. R. Hopkins and C. D. Ogg. Both of these latter notes fell due May 4, 1903. Thus Fleming owed Ward $1,000 in all (exclusive of interest), payable in three notes, each indorsed by different parties. So far as appears, Fleming paid Ward nothing until March 2, 1906, when a payment of $80 was made, and this was followed by various other payments, up to the death of the creditor, aggregating $736.60, and one payment of $5-credited upon the note after the death of the intestate. Of these payments $217.50 only was applied toward the satisfaction of the note indorsed by White, Elkan and Baumgartner, and on April 12, 1910, suit was instituted for the remainder of the debt evidenced by this note. Neither the maker, Fleming, nor White, filed a defense. Elkan was not served, and Baumgartner alone set up a defense.

Baumgartner pleaded that he was only an accommodation indorser, or guarantor, on the note, and had heard nothing about it from the time he indorsed it, which was February 6, 1903, up to the time he was served with copy of the suit, and he naturally supposed it had long since been paid. He further alleged that, Fleming having borrowed the $500 on the two notes, as stated above, and having paid Ward in all $741.60 on his general indebtedness, it was the duty of Ward to apply all of the payments to the note indorsed by himself; it being the oldest item in Fleming's indebtedness, and that the note would thereupon have been paid, whereas, as he alleged, Ward credited the note indorsed by Hopkins and Ogg with the sum of $334.50, and the note indorsed by Krauss with the sum of $189.60, and only credited the note indorsed by the defendant with $217.50; that this act of the creditor injured him (Baumgartner) as a security on the note, and increased his risk thereon, and exposed him to greater liability, and he was thereby discharged. This portion of the plea was stricken by the court, and exception is taken to this ruling.

The defendant also pleaded that the note was barred by the statute of limitations at the time suit was filed, for the reason that more than six years had elapsed since the maturity of the note, and that during the period which had elapsed, to wit, on April 23, 1909, a temporary administrator was appointed, with power and authority to bring suit upon the note. It was contended that his failure to bring suit caused the bar of the statute to attach. According to the evidence the plaintiff's intestate died April 16, 1909, and no permanent letters of administration were granted until July 7, 1909, but temporary letters of administration were granted on April 23, 1909. Upon a trial before the court, without intervention of a jury, the court, finding against the plea of the bar of the statute of limitations, rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant surety along with the other defendants, who interposed no defense. Exception was taken to this judgment.

R. D. Meader, for plaintiff in error. Harry F. Dunwoody, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). Inasmuch as a finding in favor of the defendant in the court below upon the plea of the statute of limitations would have worked a total disposition of the case, regardless of the ruling upon the plea of release, and in view of the fact that this court requested the instruction of the Supreme Court upon that branch of the case, we shall consider in inverse order the defenses as presented by the pleas of the defendant in the court below. The decision of the Supreme Court (73 S. E. 518), in answer to the certified question, which follows, disposes of the defendant's plea of the statute of limitations, and sustains the final judgment of the trial judge, unless the judge erroneously struck that portion of the plea wherein the defendant attempted to set up his release as surety; and it is only upon this phase of the case that this court will be called to pass.

[1] The question certified to the Supreme Court was as follows: "Does the appointment of a temporary administrator constitute 'representation' upon the estate of the decedent, within the purview of Civil Code 1910, § 4376, which provides that 'the time between the death of a person and representation taken upon his estate * * * shall not be counted against his estate,' for the purposes of the statute of limitation of actions? In this connection counsel for plaintiff in error has requested the right to review the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Scott v. Atwell, 63 Ga. 764, for the purpose of having the same modified or overruled." And the instruction is contained in the following opinion, delivered by Justice Lumpkin:

[This opinion is published in full at 73 S. E. 518.]

[2] 2. As to whether the action of Ward in failing to credit all of the payments made upon the general indebtedness due him by Fleming, and evidenced by the three notes to which we have referred (in the absence of any direction upon Fleming's part as to the application of the payments), effected a release of Baumgartner as a surety, it is contended by learned counsel for plaintiff in error that, though ordinarily a creditor, in the absence of instruction or direction from the debtor, generally has the right to apply payments made to him, as he may see fit, to any one or more of different obligations due him by the same debtor, still this rule is varied where the rights of others are affected, and the creditor in this case should have applied a larger proportion, if not all, of the payments made by Fleming to the note indorsed by Baumgartner. The rulings in Cofer v. Benson, 92 Ga. 794, Newton v. Nunnally, 4 Ga. 353, Rushin v. Shields, 11 Ga. 636, 56 Am. Dec. 438, Simmons v. Cates, 56 Ga. 609, and Hughes v. Johnson, 38 Ark. 285, and Jones on Chattel Mortgages, § 640 are cited in support of the principle that the rights of third persons must be considered by a creditor in making application of payments made by his debtor.

It is further insisted that the intention of the parties in making the payments is a question for a jury to pass upon, and that in rendering his judgment the court did not give effect to this circumstance, as required by the ruling in Pritchard v. Comer & Co., 71 Ga. 18. In the case last cited it was held that when the debtor fails to make a direction as to how payments shall be applied, and the creditor applies the payments to suit himself, the question of intention in making the payments should have been submitted to the jury. But in that case there were circumstances developed from the very nature of the transaction itself which evidenced the intention of the parties, and which the Supreme Court held was "equivalent to a direction of the application of the money." Judge Blandford, in making this ruling, said: "To hold otherwise would operate as a fraud upon the indorser, as he made this indorsement with the full knowledge that his principal had made the mortgage to secure the payment of the $1,500 note upon which he gave his indorsement." In the case now before us there is no evidence of any kind to indicate an intention on the part of Fleming, who made the payments, that these payments should be applied to any one of the notes in preference to the other, and so the point seems to be without merit. We do not think there is anything in the allegations of the plea which would take the case out of the general rule, which gives a creditor the right to apply payments as he sees fit, in the absence of a direction on the part of the debtor as to how the payments should be applied. Certainly no reason is found in the statement that the other notes held by Ward were junior in date to the one which Baumgartner indorsed, nor, in fact, that the amount of both of these later notes only equaled the first one. Even if Ward had applied all of the payments made by Fleming to the junior notes, this would not have been such an act, within the contemplation of the law, as injured the surety, Baumgartner, or increased his risk, or exposed him to greater liability, so as to discharge him.

Section 3722 of the Civil Code of 1895, now section 4316 of the Civil Code of 1910, relating to the application of payments is as follows: "When a payment is made by a debtor to a creditor holding several demands against him, the debtor has a right to direct the claim to which it should be appropriated. If he fails to do so the creditor has a right to appropriate at his election. If neither exercise this privilege the law will direct the application in such manner as is reasonable and equitable, both as to parties and third persons. As a general rule the oldest lien and the oldest item in an account will be first paid, the presumption of law being that such would be the fair intention of the parties." As we construe this section, its latter portion imposes no limitation on the right of either of the parties, as previously stated, if either has exercised the option conferred by law, the debtor having first the privilege of directing the application of the payment he makes, for the direction by law occurs only "if neither exercise this privilege." Of course, where a fund is brought before the court for distribution according to law, and it is discovered that by reason of a legal priority the rights of a third person are involved and are superior to those of the creditor who has received a payment the previous disposition of that fund, whether it has been applied upon the creditor's demand at the instance of the debtor, or in the absence of such direction by the creditor himself, becomes immaterial, and the provisions of section 3722 have no application to the case. As said by Judge Lumpkin in Newton v. Nunnally, 4 Ga. 357:

"As a general rule, the debtor has a right to appropriate payments. If he does not, the creditor may. If neither does, the jury will make the application under the direction of the court." And as the Newton Case was a case in which the priority of liens was involved, he quotes from Chief Justice Marshall in Rankin & Schatzell v. Scott, 12 Wheat. 177, 6 L. Ed. 592: "The principle is believed to be universal that a prior lien gives a prior claim, which is entitled to satisfaction."

In all of the authorities cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error it appears that there was outstanding some superior lien in the hands of some third party which was entitled to a priority over the indebtedness to which the payment in question was sought to be applied, and as the answer of the defendant, which was stricken, distinctly states "that in making said payments to said Ward said Fleming paid them on his general indebtedness, which consisted of said three notes aforesaid, and did not advise or request that same be applied to any particular note," it is manifest that these decisions have no bearing, but that the case is rather controlled by the provisions of section 3722 of the Civil Code. The note that Baumgartner indorsed had no superior right to the money paid by Fleming which would, under the law, have required its application to that note, rather than to the other two notes, which Baumgartner had not indorsed. When Fleming did not direct the application of the payments, Ward had the right to apply them as he pleased.

So much of the defendant's plea as attempts to set up the defense that the plaintiff was guilty of laches, in that he did not bring suit earlier, and thereby increased the risk of the surety, was properly stricken, because there was no allegation that there was a consideration for the postponement, nor an averment that the security had given a written notice to sue. Under the ruling in Thomas v. Clarkston, 125 Ga. 78, 79 (3), 54 S. E. 77, 81 (6 L. R. A. [N. S.] 658): "The surety could not, at common law, be discharged by failure of the payee to sue, and the plea setting up such defense was necessarily without merit." "A mere failure by the creditor to sue as soon as the law allows, or negligence to prosecute with vigor his legal remedies, unless for a consideration, will not release the surety." Civil Code 1895, § 2972.

There was plainly no merit in the defenses which were stricken by the court, and the answer of the Supreme Court to the certified question, and its affirmation upon review of the decision in Scott v. Atwell, 63 Ga. 764, sustains the judgment of the lower court.

Judgment affirmed.

MONK-SLOAN SUPPLY CO. et al. v. QUITMAN OIL CO. (No. 3,630.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL (§ 331*)—VERDICT—DEFINITENESS.

Verdicts are not to be set aside for indefiniteness, if they are capable of being reduced to reasonable certainty by an application of the ordinary canons of construction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 783; Dec. Dig. § 331.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 336*)—VERDICT—CERTAINTY—SURPLUSAGE.

The maxim, "utile per inutile non vitiatur," authorizes the rejection of surplusage, and saves from the implication of uncertainty a verdict which is definite, complete, and certain, upon the rejection of the surplusage in which indefiniteness inheres.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 789; Dec. Dig. § 336.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 327*)—VERDICT—CONSTRUCTION—DESIGNATION OF PARTIES—SINGULAR FOR PLURAL.

Under the common canon of construction, that the singular or plural number each includes the other, unless the contrary plainly appears from the context, a verdict finding in favor of "the defendant" will be construed as a finding in favor of all the defendants, where the suit is against two or more persons.

Error from City Court of Moultrie; J. D. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by the Quitman Oil Company against the Monk-Sloan Supply Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

T. W. Mattox and W. F. Way, for plaintiffs in error. Shipp & Kline, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The Quitman Oil Company brought suit against the Monk-Sloan Supply Company (a corporation, of which one Sloan was president) and C. E. Whitfield. The jury rendered the following verdict: "We, the jury, find for the defendant our verdict for Sloan and Whitfield"—signed by the foreman. During the same term, the plaintiff moved to set the verdict aside on the grounds (1) that it is ambiguous and uncertain; (2) because it is in favor of only one defendant, when there are two defendants in the case. The court granted the motion, and the defendants have excepted.

[1] 1. A verdict so uncertain as to be void may be set aside on motion. But "verdicts are to have a reasonable intendment, and are to receive a reasonable construction, and are not to be avoided unless from necessity." Civil Code 1910, § 5927.

[2] 2. A canon of construction, often applied to verdicts, is that all surplusage may be disregarded. The maxim, "utile per inutile non vitiatur," saves a verdict from the taint of any ambiguity or uncertainty brought about by rejectable surplusage. See, for example, the case of Southern Ry. Co. v. Oliver, 1 Ga. App. 734, 58 S. E. 244, and the instances there cited of the perfecting of verdicts by the rejection of surplusage or the application of other cognate canons of construction. The words, "We, the jury, find for the defendant," are a full, definite, and complete verdict. If the added words, "our verdict for Sloan and Whitfield," relate to the defendants named in the pleadings, as they probably do, no harm is done by rejecting them, as they add nothing to the legal effect of the verdict. If the jury, in using these words, were referring to persons outside of the record, their reference to the outsiders is rankest surplusage, and, of course, is to be rejected; for the only meaning which could then be given to the added words would be that the jury intended their finding in favor of the defendants also to operate in favor of certain outsiders—a matter as to which they had no concern. So, by construing the added words as referring to the defendants, or as not referring to them, the legal effect is the same. The added reference is mere surplusage.

[3] 3. The point that the verdict is bad, because the jury used the word "defendant," when there were two defendants, is not well taken. It is a common canon of legal construction that "the singular or plural number shall each include the other, unless expressly excluded." Civil Code 1910, § 4 (4).

Judgment reversed.

RAWLINGS v. SHEPPARD. (No. 3,525.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 19*)—INTERFERENCE WITH RELATION—RIGHT OF ACTION—ELEMENTS.

To establish a right to recover under the act of December 17, 1901 (Acts 1901, p. 63), as amended by the act of August 2, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 91), now contained in Civil Code 1910, §§ 8712-8715, giving damages to a landlord for wrongful interference by an outsider with his contract with his tenant, the plaintiff must prove (1) a valid, definite contract, duly executed with the formality prescribed in the statute (Polk v. Thomson, 130 Ga. 542, 61 S. E. 123; Orr v. Hardin, 4 Ga. App. 382, 61 S. E. 518); (2) the fact that the defendant employed the tenant for such a period and in such a manner as that injury resulted to the landlord from the giving of the employment, or that the defendant rented lands to the tenant or furnished him lands "to be cropped"; (3) the amount of the damages, except in so far as the statute fixes them. To prove that the defendant allowed the plaintiff's tenant to move into a house on his place is not sufficient. Pearson v. Bass, 132 Ga. 117, 63 S. E. 798.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 19*)—INTERFERENCE WITH RELATION—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE.

The plaintiff in the case at bar offered no direct proof that the defendant employed the tenant or rented lands to him, but relied on circumstantial evidence to prove that element of his case. The jurors were authorized to find against the theory of the evidence contended for by the plaintiff, though the defendant offered no proof. A verdict is not necessarily demanded for the plaintiff, because he makes such a prima facie case as to make the refusal to grant a nonsuit proper, though the defendant introduces no evidence.

SMITH v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. CO.
(No. 3,163.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 226*)—REGULATION—ACCOMMODATIONS AT DEPOTS.

A rule or regulation promulgated by the Railroad Commission of this state relating to the reception of passengers by railroad companies and the keeping open of their depots and stations must be presumed to be just and reasonable, and whether such rule or regulation is reasonable or not is a question of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 740; Dec. Dig. § 226.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 226*)—REGULATION—ACCOMMODATIONS AT DEPOTS.

The fact that a rule or regulation prescribed by the Railroad Commission for the conduct of the railroad companies with reference to the keeping open of their depots and stations and the reception of passengers therein may in a particular case result in hardship or injury is not a criterion by which to test the reasonableness of the rule. If the rule or regulation conduces to the interest of the railroad company and works no hardship to the traveling public generally, it must be considered as reasonable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 740; Dec. Dig. § 226.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 247*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—WHO ARE PASSENGERS—PERSONS AWAITING TRANSPORTATION.

A person coming to a railroad station with the intention of taking the next train is in contemplation of law a passenger, provided his coming is within a reasonable time before the departure of the train.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 984-993; Dec. Dig. § 247.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 238*)—RAILROADS (§ 226*)—REGULATIONS—ACCOMMODATIONS AT DEPOTS—"PASSENGER."

Rule No. 10 of the Railroad Commission of Georgia, which provides: "At junction points railroad companies shall be required to open their depot waiting room, for the accommodation of the traveling public, at least 30 minutes before the schedule time of the arrival of all passenger trains. At local or nonjunction points all such waiting rooms shall likewise be opened, provided that the same shall not be required to be opened nor kept open after 10 o'clock p. m., except for delayed trains due before that hour, in which case such rooms shall be kept open until the actual arrival of such delayed trains"—is reasonable; and one who comes to the depot for the purpose of taking a train is not a "passenger," unless his coming is within the limitations of the rule.

5. CARRIERS (§ 314*)—TRANSPORTATION OF PASSENGERS—INJURIES—ACTIONS—PLEADING.

The allegations of the petition, construed in the light of the above-quoted rule, set up no cause of action, and the trial judge properly sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition.

Russell, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Liberty County; P. E. Seabrook, Judge.

Action by Ida Smith against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Plaintiff in error brought suit in the county court of Liberty county against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company to recover damages for a tort. The court sustained a general demurrer to the petition, and the plaintiff petitioned for a writ of certiorari. On the hearing of the certiorari in the superior court the judgment of the lower court was affirmed, and on exceptions to this judgment the case is here for review. The petition makes in substance the following case:

At 8 o'clock at night the petitioner, in company with two other persons, went to the railway station at Riceboro, Ga., for the purpose of becoming passengers on the Seaboard Air Line train going to Savannah and due at Riceboro at 10 minutes after 10 o'clock on said evening. The night was extremely cold, and the waiting room at the station was well heated by a large fire, and the petitioner and her friends went into this room. The train due to arrive at 10:10 o'clock was delayed, and did not arrive until 1:15 o'clock that morning. A little after 9 o'clock the station agent, acting within the scope of his authority in the discharge of his official duties, notified the petitioner and her friends that it was time for him to go home, and he closed the station, and they could not remain in the waiting room. Petitioner informed him that they intended becoming passengers on the train for Savannah, and protested against being turned out into the cold, and begged the agent, if he must close the office, to permit the waiting room to remain open, so they could stay therein and be comfortable while waiting for the arrival of the delayed train. This request he refused, and put the petitioner out into the cold. As there was no other shelter, she was compelled to remain out in the cold from 9 o'clock to 1:15 o'clock a. m. This exposure to cold made her ill. She contracted a severe cold, which compelled her to go to bed, where she suffered greatly from aches and pains in her chest and from annoyance attendant upon the cold. She alleges that under the circumstances above detailed she had a right to remain in the station room until the overdue train arrived; that the defendant owed her the duty to permit her to remain therein, where it was warm and comfortable; and that the company, through its employé, violated its direct duty to her in denying her the legal right to remain in the waiting room, where comfort was already provided, and in compelling her to vacate this room, and to go out in the intense cold, resulting in the personal injuries narrated. She left the waiting room only under the order and demand of the station agent, and after doing so did everything in her power to protect herself from the cold, and in no way consented or contributed to her injuries. She charges that her injuries were directly and proximately due to a breach of duty on the part of the defendant. She sues to recover damages for a breach of the public duty which the railway company owed to her as a passenger, which resulted in the personal injuries to her above set out. She charges, also, that the action of the agent was willful and wanton, in utter disregard of her right, and she also sues to recover punitive damages.

In support of a demurrer the railway company relied upon rule No. 10 of the Railroad Commission of Georgia, of which the courts take judicial cognizance, and which is as follows: "At junction points railroad companies shall be required to open their depot waiting room for the accommodation of the traveling public at least 30 minutes before the schedule time of the arrival of all passenger trains. At local or nonjunction points, all such waiting rooms shall likewise be opened, provided that the same shall not be required to be opened nor kept open after 10 o'clock p. m., except for delayed trains due before that hour, in which case such rooms shall be kept open until the actual arrival of such delayed trains." It is insisted that under this rule there was no duty upon the railway company to open or heat its waiting room at the hours stated in the petition, when the plaintiff entered the waiting room, and when she was directed to leave by the station agent, for the reason that the train which she intended to take was scheduled to arrive after 10 o'clock p. m.

The plaintiff, to overcome the effect of this rule, insists that it is unreasonable and void, and consequently that the company would not be protected under its provisions; that, even if valid, it is not applicable in the present case, for the reason that the company having heated and opened its waiting room, and having received therein passengers intending to take a train scheduled to arrive after 10 o'clock p. m., the provisions of this rule were waived; that at common law it is the duty of a railway company to provide a comfortable waiting room for its passengers a reasonable length of time before the arrival of its trains; that it was beyond the power of the Railroad Commission of Georgia to change the common law by the promulgation of a rule; and that, irrespective of the rule, the railroad company owed a common-law duty to plaintiff, which it violated, and for which a recovery may be had, since there is no legislative action changing the common-law duty.

Twiggs & Gazan, for plaintiff in error.
Thos. F. Walsh, Jr., and Anderson, Cann & Cann, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The basic principle of liability for negligent torts is a breach of duty, and in this case the plaintiff sues the railroad company to recover damages for a breach of its public duty as a carrier of passengers. If the railroad company, under the allegations in the petition, owed her any duty which was violated, and without any fault on her part damages thereby resulted to her, she would have a right to recover. Did the railroad company owe her any duty? Learned counsel for the plaintiff contends that at common law it was the duty of railroad companies to provide comfortable waiting rooms for passengers a reasonable length of time before the arrival of trains. Learned counsel for the defendant insists that this was not so at common law; that under the common law railroad companies were under no duty to maintain comfortable waiting rooms at their stations for persons proposing to become passengers.

There is authority for both contentions, the weight of authority being in favor of the latter proposition. This is immaterial, however, for in this state, in so far as cities of 1,000 inhabitants are concerned, the statute makes it the duty of railroad companies operating passenger trains to have station accommodations for passengers, and to keep them open at least one hour before the arrival of and a half hour after the departure, according to the scheduled time for the arrival of and departure of said trains, and to keep the waiting room lighted and comfortable between the hours of 6 o'clock a. m. and 6 o'clock p. m., for the comfort and convenience of passengers. Civil Code 1910, § 2727. This statute law applies only to towns and cities of more than 1,000 inhabitants. The law of this state, however, as declared by the Supreme Court, makes it the duty of railroad companies to provide accommodations at their stations for passengers, and makes them liable for such damages as proximately flow from a violation of this duty. In Brown v. Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway Company, 119 Ga. 90, 46 S. E. 71, Mr. Justice Lamar announces the general rule on this subject as follows: "Railroad companies are bound to provide reasonable accommodations at their stations for passengers who are invited to travel on their roads; and will be liable for such damages as proximately flow from a violation of this duty. The character of the accommodations required, of course, varies with the amount of business done at a particular point; and the company might be relieved altogether of the obligation to furnish depots at flag stations, or points where trains stop for the accommodation of occasional travelers. But even where waiting rooms are maintained, the company is only required to keep them open for a reasonable time before and after the departure of trains." The learned justice cites many authorities in support of this proposition. It cannot be doubted that the railroad company was under a duty to keep open and in a comfortable condition the waiting room at Riceboro for the comfort and convenience of passengers.

[3] Was the plaintiff in this case a passenger when she was turned out of the waiting room by the agent of the defendant? If she was, the railroad company owed her extraordinary diligence in taking care of her. If she was not, the defendant owed her no duty in connection with the waiting room. Elliott, in his admirable work on Railroads, lays down the true rule for determining whether or not the plaintiff was a passenger, under the allegations of her petition. In volume 4, § 1579, he uses the following language: "We think it safe to say that a person becomes a passenger when, intending to take passage, he enters a place provided for the reception of passengers, as a depot, waiting room, or the like, at a time when such a place is open for the reception of passengers intending to take passage on the trains of the defendant." And he cites many decisions in the notes in support of this general rule. He makes, however, to this general rule the following material qualification: "Where, however, by reasonable rules or regulations a railroad company designates the times at which places will be ready for the reception of passengers, a person cannot become a passenger by entering such places in violation of the rules, or at an unreasonable time." He cites many authorities in support of this qualification to the general rule. As stated by the Supreme Court in the case of Riley v. W. & T. Railroad Co., 133 Ga. 417, 65 S. E. 890, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 879, a person going to a station has no absolute right to require the waiting room to be kept open and in comfortable condition for passengers an unreasonable length of time before that fixed for the departure of trains, or for using the rooms for lying down and sleeping. The Supreme Court of North Carolina in Phillips v. Southern Ry. Co., 124 N. C. 123, 32 S. E. 388, 45 L. R. A. 163, announces the general rule with the qualification as follows: "A person coming to a railroad station with the intention of taking the next train is in contemplation of law a passenger, provided his coming is within a reasonable time before the departure of the train."

[4] Was the plaintiff, under the allegations of the petition, a passenger a little after 9 o'clock, when she was turned out of the waiting room by the station agent? It is wholly immaterial to consider whether she was a passenger when she went to the station at 8 o'clock and went into the waiting room, for the time when her rights should be determined is the time when she was deprived of the privilege and comforts of the waiting room, and not when she first entered into it. The train which she intended to take was due at 10:10 p. m. She was in the waiting room, intending to be a passenger, about one hour before the train was due, according to its schedule. In the absence of any express rule on the subject by the railroad, or Railroad Commission of this state, we would be inclined to hold that she was in the waiting room at a reasonable time before the arrival and departure of the train on which she intended becoming a passenger; at least, that the question should be determined by the jury. But the Railroad Commission of Georgia has promulgated a rule exactly in point, and this rule provides that railroad companies shall only be required to open their depot waiting rooms for the accommodation of the traveling public at least 30 minutes before the schedule time for the arrival of passenger trains. Under this rule the railroad company was not required to open its waiting room at Riceboro, Ga., for the accommodation of passengers until 30 minutes before the arrival of the train, which is due at 10:10 p. m. It was immaterial that it opened the waiting room before that time. That was a mere voluntary act on its part. The rule provides, further, that the railroad company shall not be required to open or keep open its waiting room after 10 o'clock p. m., except for delayed trains due before that hour. The train in this case was delayed, but it was not scheduled to arrive before 10 o'clock. It was scheduled to arrive at 10 minutes after 10 o'clock. Therefore it was not within the terms of this rule. We are compelled to conclude that the petitioner was not a passenger when she was turned out of the waiting room by the station agent.

[5] It is insisted by counsel for plaintiff in error that, without any reference to the rule promulgated by the Railroad Commission on the subject, the railroad company as a matter of fact had its waiting room open and warm and comfortable at 8 o'clock, when the petitioner came to the station for the purpose of becoming a passenger, and she was received into the room by the company, and that this conduct amounted to a waiver of the conditions and terms of the rule, and that, having received her into the room, it had no right subsequently to turn her out into the cold, knowing that she intended to take passage on the delayed train, and that in doing so it was guilty through its agent of a willful and wanton tort. There is no allegation in the petition that the station agent knew at what hour she came into the station room, or for what purpose she had entered, until he went to her a little after 9 o'clock and told her that he must close and she must get out. Of course, it cannot be said that railroad companies receive every person who goes into their waiting rooms at unreasonable times as passengers. She had no right in the waiting room as a passenger until she went there at the time when, under the rules, it was the duty of the company to keep open the waiting room for the accommodation of passengers.

[1] Was the rule relied upon by the railroad company and promulgated by the Railroad Commission a reasonable rule or regulation on the subject? Whether a rule or regulation of the character in question is or is not reasonable is to be determined as a matter of law by the court. Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Motes, 117 Ga. 923, 43 S. E. 990, 62 L. R. A. 507, 97 Am. St. Rep. 223; 1 Elliott on Railroads, § 199. And especially is this true where, as in this state, the rules and regulations are intrusted by the Legislature to the wisdom of the Railroad Commission. Every presumption must be indulged in favor of the reasonableness of a rule or regulation prescribed by the Railroad Commission. A rule or regulation of the Railroad Commission relating to passengers, or the reception of passengers at depots or elsewhere, should be manifestly unjust to the general public and its enforcement a hardship to the traveling public or to the railroad company before it should be declared unreasonable.

[2] The fact that the rule worked a hardship in a particular or individual case, under the peculiar facts of that case, is not a criterion by which to judge of its reasonableness. In this case, according to the allegations of the petition, the operation of the rule resulted in great discomfort and injury to the plaintiff. It seems to us that this hardship might have been avoided, or greatly alleviated, by the exercise of some discretion on the part of the agent of the railroad company. In view of the circumstances, it would have been a wise exercise of discretion on the part of this agent to have permitted the plaintiff to remain in the station room; but the rule did not require him to do so, and his obedience to the rule, although it resulted in hardship and damage to the plaintiff, was not such a tort on his part as would make the company responsible. Certainly it cannot be said that railroad companies are required to keep their waiting rooms open all night for the reception of passengers at stations of the character of Riceboro. They could only be expected and required to keep their station open a reasonable length of time before and after the departure of trains. In the case of Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Motes, supra, in the body of the opinion, Mr. Chief Justice Simmons says: "It seems reasonable to assert that a railway company could not be considered unreasonable if it adopted a regulation whereby a passenger was not admitted to its waiting room until an hour or so before the departure, on schedule time, of a train the passenger desired to take. Nor would it appear more unreasonable for the carrier to actually keep its waiting room open all night for the accommodation of its patrons, permitting them to enter it at any time they choose."

But it would be profitless to extend the discussion. The rule or regulation in question has been prescribed by the Railroad Commission of this state, and no reason is shown why the rule in its operation as regards the business and interest of the railroad company and the convenience and comfort of the general public is not a reasonable rule; and this court, although in the particular case the operation of the rule may have worked a hardship, is not willing to condemn a rule as unreasonable which has been promulgated by the Railroad Commission presumably with due regard to both the interest of the railroad company and the traveling public. We therefore hold that the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition.

Judgment affirmed.

RUSSELL, J. (dissenting). With all due respect to the rule of the Railroad Commission, and without being prepared to declare unreasonable the rule which permits railroad companies to close their offices and waiting rooms in towns of less than 1,000 inhabitants at 10 o'clock p. m., except for delayed trains which are due before that hour, and leaving entirely out of consideration the fact that in the particular case the train was due to arrive only 10 minutes after 10, I feel compelled to dissent from the opinion of the majority of the court in this case.

It is plain to me, from the allegations of petition, that the defendant, by the conduct of its agent, waived the rule in this case. He knew, or by the exercise of ordinary diligence could have known, that the plaintiff was intending to take passage on the train to Savannah; and as it is alleged in the petition that the train was not expected to arrive until quarter past 1, he also knew that the train was several hours behind time. Therefore, to my mind, the keeping open of the waiting room in the earlier portion of the night was an invitation to her to use the waiting room, and the case does not differ materially from that of Riley v. W. & T. R. R. Co., 133 Ga. 413, 65 S. E. 890, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 379, where the agent of the railroad invited the plaintiff to enter, and thereafter forced her to leave the waiting room. See Riley v. W. & T. R. R. Co., 133 Ga. 417, 418, 65 S. E. 890, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 379, supra; Phillips v. Southern Railway Co., 124 N. C. 123, 32 S. E. 388, 45 L. R. A. 163. To my mind the entry of this plaintiff into the depot (which must be construed to have been permitted by the company's agent, because the depot was warmed and lighted, and because it is the duty of the agent to know who is in the depot) constituted her a passenger; and a tacit invitation was equivalent to the express invitation set forth in the Riley Case. The conduct of the agent implied a promise that in this instance the rule, which permitted the railroad company to close the office, would be waived for her benefit.

Furthermore, in my opinion, the railroad company owed the plaintiff a common-law duty, irrespective of the rule. It is the duty of a railroad company to provide a comfortable waiting room for its passengers a reasonable length of time before the arrival of trains. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Doolan (Tex. Civ. App.) 120 S. W. 1118. The defendant railroad company having received Mrs. Smith in their waiting room, which was heated and lighted, and thereby waived the regulation of the Railroad Commission in its favor, thereafter violated the common-law duty in not providing a comfortable place for the passenger while waiting for her train, irrespective of the Railroad Commission's rule. Any other rule, in my opinion, would in many instances enable railroad companies, where trains are delayed, to take advantage of their own wrong.

We have been unable to find a copy of Sayles' Annotated Civil Statutes of 1897, so as to examine the statute cited in the foregoing case; but we can fairly determine its contents by the reference made to it in the decision in the Doolan Case. In fact, it is stated in the tenth headnote of the decision that that article requires carriers to keep passenger stations warmed for at least one hour before and after the departure of trains, and yet it is stated in the eleventh headnote in the Doolan Case that it is the duty of carriers to keep their passenger stations comfortably heated during all the time passengers are reasonably authorized to use the same irrespective of the statute. Upon the authority of the Doolan Case, as well as the natural inference arising from the ruling in the Riley Case, supra, it seems to me that the plaintiff in the present case suffered an actionable wrong when she was ejected from the railroad station after being tacitly invited to occupy it, and that if she was damaged by being exposed at night to the rigors of winter in a place where she could not obtain a shelter, the carrier is liable for these damages.

HIGDON v. WILLIAMSON. (No. 3,589.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 700*) — CONCLUSIVENESS — JUDGMENT AGAINST FIRM.

In this state a judgment on a suit against a partnership binds all partners, so far as the partnership property is concerned, and also binds individually such of the partners as are served. The execution issued on the judgment may be levied either on partnership property or on individual property of the partners served. If all the partners are served, the judgment stands just as an ordinary judgment against joint debtors, except that the partnership assets are also subject to levy under the execution issued thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1225; Dec. Dig. § 700.*]

2. EXECUTION (§ 348*) — PAYMENT BY ONE PARTNER—CONTRIBUTION—"JOINT DEFENDANT."

The right given by the Code of Georgia to one joint defendant in execution, paying off the execution, to control the judgment and execution against his codefendants, for the purpose of compelling contribution by having the fact of payment entered thereon by the collecting officer, applies to judgments against partners based on service upon all of them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1065; Dec. Dig. § 348.*]

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 135*)—PAYMENT BY JOINT DEBTOR—CONTRIBUTION—"COLLECTING OFFICER."

A justice of the peace is a collecting officer as to debts sued in his court, and may make upon an execution issued from his court against joint defendants the entry of payment by one of them, which is required that he may control the judgment against the others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Dec. Dig. § 135.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1026*)—HARMLESS ERROR.

No judgment will be reversed for mere harmless error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4029; Dec. Dig. § 1026.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fannin County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Action by the Southerland Medicine Company against Higdon & Williamson. Judgment for plaintiff, and on payment thereof by Williamson, who caused the execution to be levied on property of the other defendant, on filing of an affidavit of illegality, judgment was rendered for Williamson, and Higdon brings error. Affirmed.

The Southerland Medicine Company obtained a judgment in a justice's court against Higdon & Williamson. After execution was issued, Williamson, one of the partners, paid off the debt; and the justice of the peace who had issued the execution entered thereon a recital of the fact of Williamson's having made the payment, and thereupon transferred the execution to him. Williamson then caused the execution to be levied on certain property of Higdon's, whereupon Higdon filed an affidavit of illegality; the substantial points raised by it being that the execution could not lawfully be levied on his individual property, since there was in existence sufficient partnership property to pay off the debt, and that the payment made by Williamson operated to satisfy the judgment and discharge its lien. At the trial before the magistrate Williamson moved to strike the affidavit of illegality as being insufficient in law, and the magistrate overruled the motion. Higdon then moved to dismiss the levy, because it appeared that Williamson, one of the defendants, had paid the judgment, and that the justice of the peace who made the entry transferring the judgment to him had no authority to do it, it being contended that a justice of the peace is not a collecting officer; and the magistrate sustained this motion. Williamson obtained certiorari. While the matter was thus pending in the superior court, counsel for Williamson filed a writing in which they stated that they credited the execution with one-half of the amount due under it and claimed against Higdon only the other half. Upon this being done, the court sustained the certiorari and granted a new trial. To this judgment of the court, as well as to the action of the court in allowing counsel for Williamson to file the paper crediting the execution with half of the amount due under it, Higdon brings error.

A. S. J. Hall, for plaintiff in error. Wm. Butt and T. A. Brown, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. In this state a judgment against partners binds the partnership and such of the individual partners as are served; and the execution that issues upon it authorizes levy upon the property of the partnership or upon the individual property of such of the partners as are served, to the same extent as if they were ordinary joint defendants. Civil Code 1910, § 5592. The rationale is that the law does not look upon the partnership as a completely distinct and separate legal entity, but as somewhat so, the partners as to partnership debts are joint contractors, and each is the agent of the other to a limited extent. When suit is brought for a debt due by the partnership, the plaintiff may hold the individual partners liable by serving them. If there be two partners, and one is served and the other is not, the judgment stands as any other personal judgment so far as concerns him who is served. As to the other partner, the service, and consequently the judgment, is only partially binding; that is to say, it is binding only so far as the partner served is the agent of the partner unserved, and that is only so far as concerns the property devoted to the purposes of the partnership. If both partners are served, the judgment is a personal judgment against each and both of them, and the execution thereon may be levied upon either partnership or individual property. In the case at bar there is no contention that both partners were not served; hence the judgment stands just as if they were ordinary joint debtors.

[2] 2. It is provided by Civil Code 1910, § 5971, that, "when judgments have been obtained against several persons and one or more of them has paid more than his just proportion of the same, he or they may, by having such payment entered on the fl. fa. issued to enforce said judgment, have full power to control and use said fl. fa. as securities in fl. fa. control the same against the principals, or cosecurities, and shall not be compelled, as heretofore, to sue the co-debtors for the excess of payment on judgment." The language, "power to contract and use said fl. fa. as securities in fl. fa. control the same against principals or cosecurities," has reference to Civil Code 1910, § 3558, which provides that any person standing in the relation of surety, who shall have paid off or discharged a judgment against himself and others, may "have the fact of such payment by him entered on the execution by the plaintiff, or his attorney, or the collecting officer," and thereupon shall have the right to control the execution and judgment against the other defendants to the same extent as if he were the plaintiff therein, so far as is necessary to his just reimbursement.

The language of section 5971, supra, seems fully broad enough to include the case where one partner has paid off a judgment binding personally on himself and a copartner. Indeed, this section, taken in connection with the other section to which it refers (section 3558), would seem to give to the partner paying off the judgment the right to enforce it to its full amount against the partnership assets, though there may be something growing out of the general rule that a partner cannot sue the partnership, except in equity (see Paulk v. Creech, 8 Ga. App. 738, 70 S. E. 145, and citations), which would forbid him having direct recourse at law upon the partnership assets. As between the two partners themselves, the rendition of the judgment subjecting each and both of them to individual liability takes the transaction out of the partnership relation to such an extent as to make it one of those exceptions referred to in the Paulk Case, supra, wherein one partner may proceed at law against the other. In Neel v. Morris, 73

Ga. 406, it is held that equity has jurisdiction to compel contribution in a case such as the one at bar. Undoubtedly this is true; but, in our opinion, that jurisdiction is concurrent, and not exclusive. In the Neel Case, supra, it is stated in the course of the opinion that some members of the court leaned to the view that the statute now contained in Civil Code 1910, § 5971, does not apply to executions issued upon judgments against copartners. However, no decision of the question was made. As intimated above, there may be reasons for refusing an application of the statute to cases where only one of the partners is served; but we see no reason why it is not applicable to cases like this, where both partners have been served and have become jointly and individually bound by the judgment. The affidavit of illegality presented no defense and should have been stricken. Upon like reasoning, it follows, also, that the magistrate erred in dismissing the levy, so far as his ruling was based on the proposition that payment by one of the partners operated to discharge the judgment in toto.

[3] 3. As to the point that the magistrate was not such a collecting officer as could receive payment and make the entry required by the Code, in order to give the paying defendant control of the fl. fa. against the other defendant, it is necessary only to refer to the case of Bryan v. Meaders, 9 Ga. App. 326, 71 S. E. 491, where it held (with a citation of the authorities) that as to debts sued in justice courts the magistrate is a collecting officer.

[4] 4. The exception that the court allowed the plaintiff to file a writing while the certiorari was pending in the superior court, whereby he disclaimed any right to collect from his partner more than half the amount due on the execution, amounts to nothing. From a technical standpoint the court should not have considered the paper, as the judge on the hearing of the certiorari has no right to consider aliunde matters, or to allow additions or amendments to the pleadings or the proof; but since this writing which was filed declared no more than the law recognized as being the legal status in its absence, and since the judgment sustaining the certiorari was absolutely correct, this harmless error is of no moment.

tionari the judgments of all inferior judicatories, including municipal police courts, and a general statutory scheme regulating the procedure by certiorari has been provided, but no specific provision has been made as to the review of judgments of police courts in cities the territorial limits of which extend into two or more counties. In such cases, the person convicted in the police court has the right of certiorari established in his favor, and the fact that the Legislature has not made the remedy specific and definite will not operate in derogation of this right. Therefore, wherever the Legislature creates a municipality out of territory located in more than one county, and does not make any provision as to which of the superior courts of the respective counties involved shall have jurisdiction for the purpose of review by certiorari of a conviction in the police court of such a city, the certiorari may be brought to the superior court of any of the counties in which the municipality is located; and it is error to dismiss it on the ground that it was not brought to the superior court of the particular county in which the officer presiding in the police court happened to sit at the time he tried the case to be reviewed.

Error from Superior Court, Gwinnett County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

Reuben Moore was convicted of crime in the police court of the city of Winder. From a judgment dismissing certiorari to review the conviction, he brings error. Reversed.

Lewis C. Russell, for plaintiff in error. G. A. Johns, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The corporate limits of the city of Winder include in their territory parts of three counties, Walton, Gwinnett, and Jackson. The plaintiff in error was convicted in the police court of that city, and sought certiorari. The petition was addressed to the judge of the superior court of Gwinnett county, and was filed in the office of the clerk of that court. It appears from the testimony in the record that the municipal offense of which the plaintiff in error was convicted was committed in that portion of the city which lies in Gwinnett county. It also appears that the police court sat for the trial of the case in that portion of the city which lies in Jackson county. The charter of the city makes no provision as to where the police court shall sit, or where the principal office, so to speak, of the municipality shall be, or as to what court shall have jurisdiction for the purpose of suits against the city, or for the purpose of reviewing proceedings had in the municipal court. When the certi-orari came on for hearing, the judge of the superior court dismissed it, on the ground that it had been brought in the wrong county; that it should have been brought in the county of Jackson, in which the police court sat at the time of the trial which the certiorari was brought to review.

[1] This presents a situation without a precedent. There are in this state a number of municipalities with territorial limits located in two or more counties, and in some cases (e. g., Arlington, in Calhoun and Early, counties) lying in two different judicial circuits; but, so far as we can find, the point here presented has never previously been before any court for decision. There is no statute specially covering such cases. The question is to be determined entirely by general principles of law, and by the application of statutes which do not have this particular case especially within their purview. Article 6, § 4, par. 5, of the Constitution of Georgia (Civ. Code 1910, § 6514), confers upon the superior courts of this state the "power to correct errors in inferior judicatories, by writ of certiorari," and there is a general statutory scheme set forth in Civil Code 1910, § 5180 et seq., regulating and prescribing the procedure by certiorari. It has been held that this right of reviewing judgments of inferior judicatories by certiorari, being constitutionally given, cannot be taken away from the superior courts by the General Assembly, either by direct enactment to that effect or by omission to provide for it in special cases; and even where another method of review is provided, it is cumulative only, and does not exclude the right of certiorari. Hayden v. State, 69 Ga. 731; Maxwell v. Tumlin, 79 Ga. 570, 4 S. E. 858.

The maxim of the common law, "Ubi jus ibi remedium" (there is no wrong without a remedy), may originally have been a platitude, a mere boast as to the scope and adequacy of the particular writs and remedies that had been provided; but when this maxim was given, not only a more beneficent construction, but also new life and broader scope, by the statute of Westminster II (13 Edw. I, c. 24), which required that a writ should be framed to enforce each new right as it might arise, though there might be no precedent, it became a fundamental legal principle of English law, in effect declaring that no man should be deprived of any legal right which was given him because of any failure to provide a remedy to meet its particular circumstances. We have placed this principle in our Code in the following language: "For every right there shall be a remedy, and every court having jurisdiction of the one may, if necessary, frame the other." Civ. Code 1910, § 5506. There is another legal maxim, "Quod remedio destituitur ipsa re valet ei culpa absit" (that which is without remedy avails of itself, if there be no fault in the party seeking to enforce it. "The benignity of the law is such," observed Lord Bacon, "that when, to preserve the principles and grounds of law, it deprives a man of his remedy without his own fault, it will rather put him in a better degree and condition than in a worse; for if it disable him to pursue his action, or to make his claim, sometimes it will give him the thing itself by operation of law without any act of his own; sometimes it will give him a more beneficial remedy." Broom's Legal Maxims (7th Ed.) 171. This principle has not been specifically codified in this state, but it is nevertheless a part of our law. It has never been given specific application to just such a case as this, and we do not now mean to say that by its terms it covers this case; but reference has been had to it as showing that lack of a previously formulated remedy never diminishes an established right, or the ability of the courts to enforce it, or to give such redress as is appropriate; that the man for whom a particular remedy has not been framed may be in even a better position than ordinarily, so far as what may be called flexibility or choice of remedy is concerned.

Now, here is a case in which the right of certiorari from this municipal court is thoroughly established—is even constitutionally given. The general provisions of the law relating to the form of remedy and modes of procedure by certiorari have made no particular provision for the enforcement of the right. As to those municipalities whose police courts have jurisdiction to try for municipal offenses throughout territorial limits of a city or town lying in more than one county, there is no provision as to where the certiorari shall be filed. The right to apply for and to file the certiorari must nevertheless be recognized and enforced, and the failure of the Legislature to provide for the particular case must not diminish the right of the applicant. In the argument of counsel for the respective sides of the case, two conflicting theories have been presented. Counsel for the petitioner in certiorari addressed his petition to the superior court of Gwinnett county (and filed it in that county), on the theory that, since the municipal offense was shown by the proof to have been committed in that county, the review proceedings should also be filed there. He also argued that, since the Constitution of this state fixes the venue for the prosecution of crimes in the county where the crime is committed, analogy would fix the jurisdiction in cases such as this in the county where the proof shows the municipal offense to have been committed.

[2] It must be remembered, however, that these municipal offenses are not crimes within the purview of the constitutional provision. Loeb v. Jennings, 133 Ga. 796, 67 S. E. 101; Pearson v. Wimblish, 124 Ga. 701, 52 S. E. 751. Besides, to lay down the rule that the proceedings to obtain certiorari from police courts located in municipalities, where the territorial limits extend over more than one county, must be brought in the county where the alleged offense was shown by the proof to have been committed, would at once be subject to the objection that a large class of cases would still be left unprovided for. An examination of the reports of this court and of the Supreme Court will show that perhaps no ground of certiorari is more frequent than that the proof failed to locate the place where the alleged offense was committed; and if the rule contended for were adopted, it would follow that in cases where the proof failed to show venue, no petition for certiorari could be brought.

Counsel for the defendant in certiorari present the view (and the judge of the superior court acted upon this theory) that the superior court of the county in which the police court happened to sit has exclusive jurisdiction. This seems more tenable, and still is not satisfactory. No statutory provision so regulates the procedure. Generally appellate proceedings are to be filed, not in the county where the judicial officer who rendered the judgment may have happened to be presiding at the time he rendered his judgment, but in the county where the court or judicatory is located in contemplation of the law. For example, a judge of the superior court may lawfully hear and decide in Fulton county an injunction, a motion for a new trial, or any similar matter not involving the use of a jury, though the matter is a court proceeding of another county, say Chatham; and in that event a bill of exceptions filed to review his judgment should be filed, not in the county where the judge physically sat and rendered judgment, but in the county where the court of which he was acting as the judicial officer is located by law. This point was decided long ago. See Rowell v. Neves, 21 Ga. 125. In that case a demurrer to a petition filed in Baker superior court was heard by Judge Perkins at Albany, in Dougherty county. The bill of exceptions to his judgment on the demurrer was filed in Dougherty county. The Supreme Court dismissed the case, holding that the record should have come through the office of the clerk of Baker superior court. Other examples may be given to show that the place where the judge whose decision is to be reviewed physically sits does not govern the bringing of review proceedings. If Judge Crossland, judge of the city court of Albany, should be presiding for Judge Harrell in the city court of Bainbridge, but should actually render his decision in his home in Albany, and the losing party should decide to obtain certiorari, of course, he would file his petition in the superior court of the county of Decatur, in which Bainbridge is located.

Now, if the charter of the city of Winder had fixed the place of holding the municipal pal court in one of these counties, it might be that the superior court of that county would alone have jurisdiction; but, as has been said, the charter is silent on this subject. It seems to us that the right of certiorari in cases such as this would be abridged if we confined the jurisdiction of review to any one of the counties in which the municipality is located, unless the Legislature first makes the matter certain by specifying one of the counties. We therefore hold that proceedings by certiorari brought to review judgments of the police court of Winder may be brought to the superior court of any one of the three counties in which the city is located. Consequently we hold that the judge erred in dismissing the certiorari on the ground that it was brought in the county of Gwinnett, and not in the county of Jackson, where the police court sat.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 832*)—CHANGE OF GRADE—FLOODING CONTIGUOUS LOT—NUISANCE—LIABILITY.

If a municipal corporation, in grading a street, so changes the natural flow of the drainage from a contiguous lot as to create a pond, and to render a street drain necessary to prevent the hurtful accumulation of standing water, and in pursuance of its duty the municipal corporation opens a ditch necessary for the discharge of this water, but thereafter permits it to become obstructed, and fails to remove the obstruction, though requested to do so, and if, by reason of the filling of this ditch, which is in the street, and under the control of the municipality, a nuisance is created, the municipality would be liable for the damages caused by the continuance of the nuisance, even though the pond might be located on private property. The liability for the damages caused by a nuisance rests primarily upon the party whose act created the nuisance, and especially is this true where it is within the power of such party to discontinue the condition which gave rise to the nuisance.

Action by J. H. Harris against the City of Rome. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

RUSSELL, J. The present case is distinguished by its facts from Mayor of Dalton v. Wilson, 118 Ga. 100, 44 S. E. 830, 98 Am. St. Rep. 101. In the Wilson Case the ditch on private property contained the obstruction that caused the injury. The owner of the hotel controlled the hotel, sewer, ditch, obstruction, and pond, and was consequently responsible for the nuisance. Neither the nuisance nor its cause was under the control of the city, nor on city property. In the case at bar the petition, with the amendments, alleged that the nuisance was created by the city's having raised the sidewalk and cut ditches along, in, and through the sidewalk and street for the purpose of letting the surface water escape, and that, after having cut the ditches for this purpose, the city permitted and allowed the ditches in the street to fill up, and that by reason of the filling up of the ditches in the sidewalk and street a pond of foul and fetid water, alleged to be a nuisance, accumulated; that the obstruction was permitted to gather in the ditch, so that there was no outlet for the water through the embankment, which the city itself had made, in raising the street, and that the city, with knowledge of this fact, allowed the obstruction to remain, refusing the plaintiff's demand that it be removed, and the pond be allowed to drain. It will therefore be seen that the two cases are not identical. In the Wilson Case the cause of the obstruction and nuisance was that the hotel permitted foul and fetid matter to accumulate in a ditch and pond on its own private property. The hotel controlled the ditch made for the purpose of outlet, and which was allowed to fill up and furnish the matter which accumulated. In other words, the city of Dalton did not create the nuisance, but only stood by and failed to abate it. In the case at bar the ditches are in the street and under the control of the city, according to the allegation of the petition, and it is alleged that after these ditches, which it is the duty of the city to keep open, are filled up, the city refuses to abate the nuisance for which it is responsible.

According to the allegations of the petition, the place where the nuisance is now said to exist and the raising of the sidewalk by the city caused the necessity for the digging of the ditch through the sidewalk and street. This ditch upon the city's property, which the city's act rendered necessary, and which it is the city's duty to keep open, is the ditch in which the obstruction, which has caused the pond to form, exists and is permitted to remain, according to the allegations of the petition. In the Wilson Case the cause of the nuisance was on a private lot. In the case at bar the cause of the nuisance is in the street and sidewalk. In the Wilson Case the owner of the lot could have abated the nuisance; but the owner of the lot in the present case would have no right to go into the street and dig open ditches, or otherwise drain the pond by excavations upon the street. While it is true the pond was on private property, as in the Wilson Case, the sole and only cause for the formation of the pond is traceable to the act of the city. The judgment was reversed in the Wilson Case because it did not appear that the municipality was in direct control of the property upon which the alleged nuisance existed, or the ditch or sewer; in other words, because it was not alleged in terms that the municipality maintained, controlled, or operated the alleged nuisance. In the case at bar it is distinctly alleged that the city controls the ditch that brought about and continues the nuisance.

The petition as originally filed was, perhaps, subject to demurrer; but under the amendment, showing that the pond was due solely to the fill made by the city in the street, and that the city undertook, as was its duty, to prevent a nuisance by running a ditch across the sidewalk into the main gutter of the street, the municipality would clearly be liable, if it is shown that a nuisance was created by the fact that the city allowed the only outlet for this water, which was through its sidewalk, to become obstructed, so as to create a nuisance with consequent damages. We therefore think that the trial judge erred in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition. If a municipal corporation, in grading a street, so changes the natural flow of the drainage from a contiguous lot as to create a pond, and to render a street drain necessary to prevent the hurtful accumulation of standing water, and in pursuance of its duty the municipal corporation opens a ditch necessary for the discharge of this water, but thereafter permits it to become obstructed, and fails to remove the obstruction, though requested to do so, and if, by reason of the filling of this ditch, which is in the street and under the control of the municipality, a nuisance is created, the municipality would be liable for the damage caused by the continuance of the nuisance, even though the pond might be located on private property. The liability for the damage caused by a nuisance rests primarily upon the party whose act created a nuisance; and especially is this true where it is within the power of such party to discontinue the condition which gave rise to the nuisance.

1. CHARGE OF COURT—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE—NO ERROR.

The charge, considered in its entirety, presented the law applicable to the issues made by the pleadings and evidence clearly and correctly, and most favorably to the contentions of the defendant. Portions of the charge, to which exceptions are taken, when considered separately from the context, contain slight inaccuracies but could not have confused or misled the jury, and, when considered in connection with the charge as a whole, are without any material error.

2. RAILROADS (§ 299*)—OPERATION—ACCIDENTS AT CROSSINGS—CARE REQUIRED.

Persons crossing the track of a railroad company at a public road crossing are entitled to the protection of the statutes regulating the approach of locomotives and cars to the crossing, no matter how the road or crossing came into existence; and there was evidence from which the jury could have inferred that the plaintiff was injured at a public crossing by the negligence of the defendant in the violation of these statutes.

3. OPERATION OF RAILROADS—SPEED OF TRAIN.

Irrespective of the question whether the plaintiff was injured at a public crossing, or at a private crossing, there was evidence that he was injured by the defendant in running at too high a rate of speed, and in failing to exercise ordinary care and diligence at the place of the injury, especially in view of the proof that it was frequently used by the public with the knowledge of the defendant company.

The act of December 20, 1899 (Acts 1899, p. 74), providing that notice of the time, place, and extent of injury to persons or property claimed to have been inflicted by a municipal corporation shall be given to its officers before suit is brought, is sufficiently complied with where information is given in the notice with sufficient definiteness to locate the property alleged to have been injured, the amount of damages claimed, and sufficient data to enable the city authorities to examine into the alleged injuries and determine whether the claim should be adjusted without suit. In other words, a substantial compliance with the statute is enough, and exactness of description or nicety of pleading is not required. Smith v. City of Elberton, 5 Ga. App. 286, 63 S. FLAHIVE v. STATE. (No. 3,843.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FORMER DECISIONS CONTROLLING.

The legal questions raised by the assignments of error in this case in the main are of the same general character as those dealt with by this court in the cases of Cassidy v. State, 72 S. E. 939, and Jackson v. State, Id. 941, decided November 20, 1911, and are fully controlled by the decisions in these cases.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 865, 1174*)—DELIBERATIONS OF JURY.

After the jurors had been out for some time considering of their verdict, it was not error for the trial judge to have them brought into court, and to inquire if they were likely to make a verdict, and how they stood. While the practice of asking a jury in a criminal case how they stand is not approved by a majority of this court, yet where the trial judge says nothing by way of intimation or expression of an opinion on the facts, or to induce the jury to make a verdict, the mere inquiry would be presumptively harmless and especially so in a case like the present one, where the evidence for the prosecution demanded the verdict of guilt. Ball v. State, 9 Ga. App. 162, 70 S. E. 888.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2069, 3170-3178; Dec. Dig. §§ 865, 1174.*]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 139*)—KEEPING LIQUORS ON HAND AT "PLACE OF BUSINESS."

The following charge of the court, not only embodied a correct principle of law, but was concretely applicable to the evidence in the case: "I charge you that if one lives at or near his place of business, and keeps on hand alcoholic, spirituous, or intoxicating liquors in his dwelling house, and said dwelling house is used in connection with his place of business as part of the place of business, and the purpose of keeping such liquors in said dwelling is to have such liquors conveniently located to the immediate place of business, such dwelling house would be in law a part of the 'place of business,' and such keeping on hand with such purpose would be a violation of the law, and would be having and keeping on hand alcoholic, spirituous, and intoxicating liquors at one's place of business."

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 139*)—KEEPING LIQUORS ON HAND AT PLACE OF BUSINESS.

The following excerpt from the charge contains a correct principle of law and one pertinent to the evidence in the case: "I charge you that all parts of one's place of business, including rooms, closets, stairs, yards, and courts used in connection with the place of business itself, are a part and parcel of the place of business."

No error of law appears and the evidence strongly supports the verdict.

QUEEN INS. CO. v. PETERS. (No. 3,402.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. REMOVAL OF CAUSES (§ 109*)—REMANDING CAUSE TO STATE COURT—EFFECT.

The judgment of the United States Circuit Court, remanding a case to the state court from which it has been removed, is final, and it is the duty of the state court to receive jurisdiction and proceed with the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Removal of Causes, Cent. Dig. § 235; Dec. Dig. § 109.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 156*)—VALIDITY OF CONTRACT—DECEASED PERSON AS INSURED.

Courts will draw every reasonable deduction to uphold contracts of insurance. A contract of insurance issued in the name of a dead man as the insured will not for that reason alone be held invalid. Unless it appears to the contrary, the company will be presumed to have known the fact that the person named as the insured was dead, and that the contract was made for the benefit of the person or persons representing the estate. And especially is this true where the policy itself expressly provides that, "wherever in this policy the word 'insured' occurs, it shall be held to include the legal representatives of the insured."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 156.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 624*)—ACTION ON POLICY—PARTY.

The administrator on the estate of the insured is the proper personal representative of the insured intestate to sue on a policy contract issued in the name of the insured intestate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 624.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 675*)—ACTIONS ON POLICIES—ATTORNEY'S FEES AND DAMAGES.

Where the amount of the verdict is substantially less than the amount claimed in the proofs of loss and sued for, a verdict for attorney's fees and damages was unauthorized. Besides, the question of law involved in the present case was sufficiently doubtful and important to rebut the existence of bad faith on the part of the company in its refusal to pay the policy and in contesting its validity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 875.*]

Error from City Court of Moultrie; J. D. McKenzia, Judge.

Action by Beulah Peters, administratrix, against the Queen Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed, with directions.

King, Spalding & Underwood, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Wilkes and Shipp & Kline, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Mrs. Beulah Peters, administratrix of M. Mathis, sued the Queen Insurance Company upon a policy of insurance issued in the name of M. Mathis, covering a building and the furniture therein. The verdict was for plaintiff for $1,300 on the building, $250 as attorney's fees, and 12½ per cent. damages. At the proper time application was made to remove the case to the Circuit Court of the United States upon the ground of diversity of citizenship. The judge of the state court refused to pass an order of removal, being of the opinion that the attorney's fees sued for under Civil Code 1910, § 2549, were part of the costs and could not be computed in calculating the necessary jurisdictional amount. There was no exception to this judgment of the state court. Subsequently the record was filed in the United States court, and on a hearing before the judge of that court the case was remanded for trial to the state court, Judge Speer concurring in the view of the former court, and over objection by the defendant the case proceeded to trial in the state court. The evidence is not in conflict, and briefly stated is as follows:

The policy of insurance sued upon was issued by the Queen Insurance Company January 2, 1908, in the name of "M. Mathis" as the insured; no other person being mentioned, nor any words of description added. The fire which destroyed the property covered by the policy took place on December 8, 1909. The policy was in force at the time of the fire. On February 1, 1909, the plaintiff, Mrs. Beulah Peters, was duly appointed administratrix upon the estate of M. Mathis, who was dead when the policy was issued, having died in January, 1897. He left surviving him a widow and six children, the plaintiff being one of them, and the widow was still in life when the suit was filed. M. Mathis left no debts, and left other property besides that covered by the policy. No other administration was ever had upon his estate. Except proof of the value of the property insured and destroyed, and what would constitute reasonable attorney's fees, no oral testimony was introduced. The documentary evidence consisted of exemplified copies of letters of administration, deeds showing title to the property in M. Mathis, the policy of insurance declared upon, proofs of loss by the administratrix, agreed statement as to the removal proceedings, and admissions of death of M. Mathis, relationship, etc., recited above. While there are several grounds of error in the motion for a new trial, all of them can be properly condensed into two: (1) As to the jurisdiction of the court; (2) as to the validity of the policy contract.

[1] 1. We do not deem it necessary to decide the question of jurisdiction, or to determine whether the attorney's fees claimed should be regarded as costs or as damages. In view of the language of the statute of this state in allowing the recovery of 25 per cent. on the liability in addition to the loss, and the decisions of this court and the Supreme Court, we are inclined to think that attorney's fees allowed in such cases are a substantive part of the damages, and are not "costs." Civil Code 1910, §§ 2549, 5992; Missouri Insurance Co. v. Lovelace, 1 Ga. App. 449 (6), 58 S. E. 93; Traders' Insurance Co. v. Mann, 118 Ga. 385, 45 S. E. 426. Irrespective of this question, however, the decision of the learned judge presiding in the United States Circuit Court is final on the subject of jurisdiction. Peters v. Queen Ins. Co. (C. C.) 182 Fed. 112. Even if the judge of the state court had granted an order of removal when the application was made to him, when the federal court remanded it to the state court, it was the duty of the state court to receive jurisdiction and proceed as if the erroneous order of removal had not been granted. 4 Fed. St. Ann., pp. 258, 259, and citations. In other words, the jurisdiction of the state court would not have been lost, but only suspended, and when the case was remanded the question of jurisdiction was finally settled. We do not mean to say that the defendant, when the application was made in the state court to remove and was refused, could not have preserved exceptions pendente lite, or that, when the judge of the federal court remanded the case to the state court for trial, an appeal could not have been had to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals. But neither was done, and the question of jurisdiction is settled by the decision of the federal court, remanding the case for trial to the state court.

[2] 2. Was the contract valid? The plaintiff in error says not, because M. Mathis was dead when the policy was issued, and a dead man cannot contract, and there must be "parties able to contract, a consideration moving to the contract, the assent of the parties to the terms of the contract, and a subject-matter upon which it can operate." Civil Code 1910, § 4222. Certainly the insurance company made a contract of insurance with some one. It received from some one the premium as a consideration for the contract, and there was the property insured as the subject-matter. It may be conceded that a "dead person" cannot make a contract. But cannot a person having an insurable interest in the property make a contract of insurance in the name of the dead person, for the benefit of his estate or some one having an insurable interest in the property covered by the contract? Would not the "other party" to the contract, who had paid the company the premium, or the party having an interest in the property, be the applicant for the insurance? As matter of common knowledge, we know that business is frequently continued in the names of individuals or firms long after the individuals, or all the members of the original firm, have died. Is it unusual, unreasonable, or illegal for the heirs of an estate, before division, or the legatees before distribution, or the legal representatives of an estate, to continue the business and to make contracts in the name of the testator or intestate? It cannot be doubted that if the insurance company in the instant case had knowledge when the policy was issued that "M. Mathis" was dead, and knew who were the real parties at interest, it would be bound. It could not in good faith with such knowledge make the contract and receive the premium, and then deny the validity of the contract.

Every reasonable intendment and every reasonable presumption must be indulged in to uphold the contract. Is it unreasonable that the company should be deemed to know with whom it contracted, and whether M. Mathis was then alive, or, if dead, whether the person who paid the premium was presumptively interested in the property? The evidence does not positively disclose who did in fact take out this policy, or who paid the premiums. Probably M. Mathis during his life took out the original policy, and his children and heirs renewed it from year to year in his name. There had been no division of the estate. We hold it fairly inferable that some person with an insurable interest in the property made the contract with the company and paid the premiums, in the absence of positive evidence to the contrary, and we are unwilling to declare the contract of insurance invalid at the instance of the insurance company. It was alive, made the contract, received consideration therefor in the premium, and the loss insured against admittedly occurred. To declare the contract invalid would certainly damage the "other party." To uphold it cannot damage the company, for it agreed to pay the loss to the one having an insurable interest in the property or to his personal representatives, and the contingency insured against happened.

Besides, we think the provisions of the policy contract itself cover the very question now discussed. The policy expressly provides:

"Whenever in this policy the word 'insured' occurs, it shall be held to include the legal representatives of the insured." We are aware that this provision is inserted in policies of insurance to meet any change in the title caused by the death of the insured; but it is broad enough to embrace the facts of the present case. Under this provision the contract was made, not only for the benefit of the "insured," but for his "legal representatives." Here the facts show that the plaintiff is not only the "legal representative" of the insured, but is part owner of the property insured, in both capacities having an insurable interest. This clause in the policy establishes a privity between the company and the legal representatives of the insured. Where no hurtful fraud is proved in the procurement of a contract of insurance, and the premiums are paid at the time of the loss, the company should be held to performance, unless some reason stronger than mere technical objection is presented, and one demanded by substantial justice and clear law. We conclude that the trial judge did not err in holding that the contract was valid.

[3] 3. Neither do we think that there was any necessity to reform the contract, or that the administratrix was not the right party plaintiff. We presume, from the fact that an administratrix was appointed, in view of the admission that the intestate left no debts, that the estate had not been settled by consent of the heirs. The administratrix was the personal representative of the intestate, to collect debts due the estate. Indeed, we think the insurance company could legally have required the appointment of an administrator before paying the loss. Under Civil Code 1910, §§ 3657, 3929, and 3933, and the decision in Greenfield v. McIntyre, 112 Ga. 691, 38 S. E. 44, the heirs of the intestate insured could not bring suit on the policy without alleging and proving that there was no administration.

[4] 4. The verdict for attorney's fees and damages was not warranted, for two reasons: First, the amount claimed to be due on proof of loss and sued for was $1,500, and the verdict was for $1,300. This was equivalent to finding that the company was justifiable in resisting the claim. Southern Mutual Insurance Co. v. Turnley, 100 Ga. 303, 27 S. E. 975; Insurance Co. v. Ellington, 94 Ga. 785, 21 S. E. 1006; Insurance Co. v. Shepherd, 85 Ga. 765 (2), 12 S. E. 18. The evidence did not show bad faith in refusing to pay the loss, and the legal questions made were sufficiently doubtful and important to warrant the company in contesting the suit.

The judgment is affirmed, with direction that the plaintiff write off from the judgment the amount received as attorney's fees and damages.

Judgment affirmed, with direction.

MAYOR, etc., OF CITY OF MACON v. MORRIS. (No. 3,423.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1001)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

The evidence, though apparently preponderating against the verdict, is nevertheless not legally inadequate to make the finding of the jury conclusive on this court as to the facts of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3922, 3928-3934; Dec. Dig. § 1001.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§§ 759, 821*)—TORTS—DEFECTS IN STREETS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where territory is lawfully annexed to a city, the new area becomes "a part of the city for all municipal purposes," and the public highways therein become streets of the city, and the city becomes chargeable with the duty of using reasonable diligence in seeing that they are placed and kept in such condition as will make passage thereon reasonably safe. As to defects existing in the highway at the time of the annexation, the city does not become chargeable with liability until it has discovered them, or, in the exercise of ordinary and reasonable diligence, should have discovered them, and until it has then had a reasonable opportunity to remedy them.

(a) What is a reasonable time or opportunity in these respects is ordinarily a question for the jury, to be determined upon a consideration of all the illustrative facts as they may appear.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1595-1600, 1745-1757; Dec. Dig. §§ 759, 821.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 790*)—TORTS—DEFECT IN STREETS—NOTICE OF DEFECT.

Policemen, unless what may be called their common-law duties have been enlarged, are mere peace officers, not chargeable with the duty of observing or inspecting the condition of the city highways, and in such cases are not channels for the communication of implied notice to the city of defects in a street; but the city may enlarge their powers by ordinances, rules, or instructions affecting their employment, and putting on them the duty of inspecting for, and of reporting as to, defects, and in that event notice and negligence may be implied through them.

(a) A like rule applies as to employees of the sanitary department. Primarily they would be concerned only with matters relating to the public health; but the city may put on them the duty of observing and reporting the condition of other things (e. g., the condition of drains and sewers in the highways), and in that event notice and negligence may be implied through them.

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by Ruth Morris against the Mayor and Council of the City of Macon. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

On March 4, 1910, certain contiguous suburbs of considerable area were annexed to the city of Macon, as a result of an election held under a special act of the General Assembly. In this new territory there were a number of highways previously kept up by the county authorities; and one of these was known as Giles street. Early in the night of March 11, 1910, Mrs. Morris, plaintiff, started to the home of her sister, who lived on Giles street. She had never previously been on the street. She left the street car at a nearby point, and as she was going down Giles street on what was not, strictly speaking, a sidewalk, but was a part of the street (on its edge nearest the property line) which was commonly used by pedestrians, she fell into an unguarded sewer opening and was injured. The contour of the street surface was such as to hide the opening from any one approaching from the direction she came, especially at night, but could easily be seen by any one traveling the street in the opposite direction. The danger of the situation was inherent in the method of its original construction, which was done by the county authorities. She sued the city for damages because of her injury, and recovered a verdict of $1,000. No negligence on the plaintiff's part is asserted. It is also practically conceded that the sewer was originally constructed and maintained by the county authorities in a negligent way. The defense of the city is that it did not know of this defect in the highway, and that it had not had control over this new territory long enough for negligence to be imputed to it for not discovering and relieving the dangerous situation. The case comes to this court on exceptions filed by the city to the overruling of a demurrer to the petition and to the refusal of a new trial.

Lane & Park, for plaintiff in error. J. F. Urquhart, Jno. P. Ross, and Akerman & Akerman, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. If we had the power of a trial judge as to granting a new trial on the facts of a case, we would grant one in this case. If we had been on the jury, we would not have found the city liable. There are in the record complete photographs of the scene of the injury, and when we look at them, and see how little there was to attract any immediate attention to the danger incident to the method in which this sewer had been located and constructed, when we consider what short time the city had had to look over its vast newly acquired area, and to discover and remedy such previously existing conditions as were likely to cause hurt therein, when we ask ourselves if any body of prudent men, situated as the municipal body of Macon was situated, would likely have discovered and remedied this particular defect in the mere week's time that had elapsed between the date of the annexation of the territory and the date of the injury, it seems to us that the jury's finding of negligence rests on a very meager basis. But it is nothing new for us to say that the jurisdiction of the jury to settle the facts is as final as is this court's jurisdiction to determine the law, and their finding of fact is entitled to the same respect from us as our decision on the law is entitled to receive from them. And no doubt, if a reciprocity of criticism were allowable, some of our decisions as to the law would seem as absurd to the jurors as their finding of facts seems to us in this case. There is a point at which facts cease to be issuable and the jurisdiction of the jury is withdrawn for the lack of anything for them to decide, when all the evidence and all the inferences to be drawn therefrom so irresistibly point to only one way as to leave no "scope for legitimate reasoning by the jury," and the only conclusion deducible from the facts is a matter of law, which the court may declare; but we cannot say that that point has been reached in this case. Hence we must abide by the finding of the jury, as much as it may shock us.

[2] 2. When the borders of the city of Macon were so enlarged as to take in new territory, that territory became at once "a part of the city for all municipal purposes," and such public highways as had been previously maintained thereon became city streets, and the city became chargeable with the duty of using reasonable care and diligence to place them in reasonably safe condition for public passage. City of Columbus v. Ogletree, 102 Ga. 293, 29 S. E. 749. As to dangerous and defective conditions existing in the highways at the time of the annexation, the city did not become chargeable with liability until after it had discovered them, or until after such a length of time had elapsed that in the exercise of ordinary diligence it should have discovered them, and after it had then had reasonable opportunity to take the necessary steps to remedy them. The case of City of Richmond v. Mason, 109 Va. 546, 65 S. E. 8, is relied on by the plaintiff in error. The decision in that case is very strongly written, and runs along the line that a city does not become immediately liable for the defective condition of highways in annexed territory, that it must have a reasonable time in which to discover and then to remedy such conditions, that even five months may not be an unreasonable length of time for that purpose, and that what is a reasonable time is a mixed question of law and of fact. It is to be seen that the ruling there is perfectly consistent with what we are now deciding. In that case the verdict in the plaintiff's favor was set aside because the trial court refused to allow the city to show the recency of the annexation and the extent and condition of the new area, and to show what it had done to remedy conditions therein. In the present case proof of all these things was allowed by the trial court, and was passed on by the jury under full, fair, and appropriate instructions.

[3] 3. The other serious question in the case is as to how far the city was responsible for the failure of its sanitary inspectors and its policemen to acquire knowledge of the dangerous condition of this sewer, which was not a part of the city's system of sanitary sewerage, but was used for surface drainage. As to the sanitary inspectors, the City Code put on them the duty of daily general sanitary inspection of "the condition of streets, sidewalks, pavements and street gutters, and the relative level of lots and streets and the system of drainage and sewers, in every lot, street and alley." Also in a book which denominated itself on its title page as the "Rules and Regulations Adopted by the Mayor and Council of the City of Macon for the Government of the Department of Police of said City," and which according to the testimony was the official book of rules kept in the headquarters of the police department and furnished to the policemen by the mayor and council for their guidance, were two rules requiring policemen to observe the condition of streets, sidewalks, and alleys, and to report anything likely to produce danger. In City of Columbus v. Ogletree, 96 Ga. 177, 22 S. E. 709, it is decided that, unless the city has enlarged what may be called the common-law powers of its policemen, they are mere peace officers, charged with no duty respecting the condition of streets and sidewalks, and that, therefore, they were no such agents of the city as to be channels for the communication of implied notice of defects in the streets. In the same case, as reported in 102 Ga. 293, 29 S. E. 749, it is held that "an ordinance making it the duty of policemen to report to the lieutenants of police all footways, bridges, and sidewalks requiring repairs necessarily renders it incumbent on the lieutenants to report upon the same to the authorities whose duty it is to have the needed repairs made, and therefore under such an ordinance notice to a policeman or a lieutenant of a defective or dangerous place in a sidewalk is notice to the city." It seems that a like rule should apply as to sanitary inspectors. Primarily the sanitary department is concerned only with matters affecting the public health, but its officers may be charged by action of the city council with the further duty of observing and reporting other matters.

Now, the city cannot discharge the duty it owes the public of being reasonably diligent to discover defects in its streets without having some agents or agent to perform the service of observation and inspection. It is a very appropriate service to place upon the police department. Likewise, so far as the safety of the streets for public passage is affected by the location and condition of drains, sewers, and culverts, it is an appropriate service to require of the employés in the department having drains and sewers in charge. We do not think that the court erred in allowing these ordinances and rules to be read in evidence, or in submitting to the jury the question as to whether through these employes notice to the city and negligence were to be implied. A distinction is asserted between ordinances placing the duty of inspection on policemen, and mere rules or instructions issued to the police department to the same effect. We see no reason for making a difference. The important thing is that this was one of the methods resorted to by the city of performing its duty of acquiring knowledge of the condition of its streets. It is plain from the evidence that policemen in Macon were employed with respect to these rules, and that the governing body of the city was accustomed to act upon the reports made under them. No one can read the testimony on this subject in the record, and doubt that the policemen of Macon are more than mere peace officers.

There are some assignments of error in the record which we have not taken up for discussion; but they are either controlled by the points that have been discussed, or are of too small importance to justify the grant of a new trial, even if they are well taken.

Judgment affirmed.

Action by L. G. Doughty against the Illinois Central Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming, for plaintiff in error. O. H. & R. S. Cohen, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. A dealer in cotton at Granada, Miss., caused a compress company to deliver on his behalf to the Illinois Central Railroad Company a lot of cotton for shipment to Savannah, Ga., and received therefor a bill of lading describing it as 100 bales of cotton, weighing 51,990 pounds, marked "PAYK." This bill of lading was transferred to the plaintiff, Doughty, who took it as a bona fide holder for value. He demanded the 100 bales of cotton of this weight and marking. The delivering company at Savannah (the Illinois Central Company having undertaken to deliver it through connecting carriers) was unable to find any such cotton, but tendered 100 bales, marked "PARK," and of some 200 pounds less weight. Under an agreement between the plaintiff and the railroad company, he accepted this cotton without prejudice and sold it for the benefit of whom it might concern. He showed that he had bought the cotton as being of a certain grade, though he had no information as to the grade, except what the seller represented, and the seller, it appeared, had not actually graded the cotton before shipment. The railroad company undertook to show that the cotton which was delivered to it was marked "PARK," and not "PAYK," and that the cotton which it received was the identical cotton which it tendered in delivery (indeed, contended that the letters designated as "PAYK" in the bill of lading were not the letters "PAYK," but were the letters "PARK," and that what the plaintiff claimed to be a "Y," was in fact an "R"; but as the judge who tried the case without the intervention of a jury found that the bill of lading contained the "Y," that finding is binding on this court).

The showing, under the defendant's proof, which was first tentatively admitted and then ruled out, was very conclusive that it tendered in delivery the same cotton which it had received. The court ruled out this evidence, on the ground that its admission was forbidden by a statute of the state of Mississippi, where the shipment was made, which is contained in the Mississippi Code (section 4851), as follows: "Every bill of lading or other instrument in the nature or stead thereof, acknowledging receipt of property for transportation, shall be conclusive evidence in the hands of a bona fide holder for value, whether by assignment, pledge, or otherwise, as against the person or corporation issuing the same, that the property has been so received." It was conceded that the marking of the cotton was immaterial, except for purposes of identification; that it neither added to nor detracted from its value in any sense; that it designated neither weight nor grade.

We think that the court erred in ruling out the testimony offered by the defendant. The bill of lading was conclusive upon the company, both as to the number of bales and as to the weight, and, so far as these things tended to fix value, bound the company to deliver to the bona fide holder of the bill of lading cotton of that value. The proof which was offered was, therefore, not admissible for the purpose of contradicting the bill of lading in these respects, but was admissible to show the other element—that the cotton which the plaintiff shipped was not of the grade he represented it to be—and this was a material element in fixing the liability of the carrier. The bill of lading made no representation as to the grade of the cotton, and it was essential as a part of the plaintiff's case for him to prove what the grade was. The mere fact that the person who sold to him represented that it was of a certain grade would not supply that element of the case. And even if there had been testimony from him that the cotton which he delivered was in fact of a certain grade, it, nevertheless, would have been permissible for the company to show that it delivered this identical cotton, and that it did not come up to the grade which the plaintiff's testimony had tended to establish.

The rejected testimony should have been admitted; and, under the law as applied to this bill of lading, the carrier should have been held liable for the deficiency in weight, but not liable for the deficiency in grade. We think this is in harmony with the decisions of the Supreme Court of Mississippi, construing the statute of that state. See Yazoo Ry. Co. v. Bent, 94 Miss. 681, 47 South. 805, 22 L. R. A. (N. EXECUTION (§ 194*)—CLAIMS OF THIRD PERSONS—EVIDENCE.

The presumption of ownership, arising from the recital made by the levying officer in the entry of the levy that the property levied upon was in the possession of the defendant in fi. fa. at the time of the levy, was fully rebutted by the undisputed evidence in behalf of the claimant. The verdict in the justice's court finding the property subject was contrary to law, because it was without any evidence to support it and in direct conflict with the undisputed evidence. should have been sustained by the judge of the superior court.

In cases where two or more acts of negligence, or other wrongs, are set forth, either one of which alone, or in connection with others alleged, caused or contributed to the injury for which suit is brought, the plaintiff is not required to elect upon which alleged act of negligence or wrong he will go to trial, but he can recover such damages as he has sustained, whether the damages arise from one or from all of the acts of negligence or wrongs alleged, provided the evidence shows that the injury was proximately caused by some one of the acts of negligence or other wrongs; that is, the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages either for negligence or willful misconduct as alleged on the part of the defendant, according to the proof.

Error from City Court of Richmond County; W. F. Eve, Judge.

Action by W. F. Finley against the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. K. Miller, for plaintiff in error. Isaac S. Peebles, Jr., and Sidney Smith, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. W. F. Finley, employed by the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company as a freight train hand running from McCormick to Anderson, S. C., sued to recover damages for personal injuries received June 14, 1907, at a station called Hesters, in South Carolina. A verdict was returned in his favor for the sum of $1,500, and the company's motion for a new trial was overruled. The petition alleged, in substance, that the injury for which suit was brought was received by the plaintiff in the following manner: The freight train stopped at a station called Hesters for the purpose of unloading freight; part of the freight consisting of a barrel of kerosene oil weighing about 600 pounds. The conductor of the train entered the freight car which contained the barrel of oil at a point opposite to where the freight was usually unloaded, and rolled this barrel of oil to an open door of the freight car, and ordered the plaintiff, who was standing on the ground at the door of the car, to take hold of the barrel of oil and place it upon the ground; that on giving this order the conductor pushed the barrel of oil half clear of the threshold of the car door, so that one end of the barrel was held by the plaintiff and the other was resting on the door sill of the car. While the barrel was in this position, the plaintiff objected to the order of the conductor, and complained that the barrel was too heavy, and that he could not lift and handle it alone. Thereupon the conductor, repeating his order with an oath, without warning pushed the barrel of oil clear of the side of the car, upon the plaintiff. He attempted to get from under the barrel, but its weight was on him before he was aware of the intention of the conductor to push the barrel out upon him. The barrel, falling upon him, caused the injury for which he seeks to recover damages, and he alleges that the proximate cause of this injury was the negligent act of the conductor in pushing the barrel of oil upon him without giving him time to get from under the same, and without warning him of his intention. He also alleges that this act of the conductor in pushing the barrel of oil upon him without giving him warning of his intention, so that the plaintiff could escape the consequences of the conductor's act, was wanton conduct, for which the company is liable in punitive damages. He alleges, further, that the defendant company was negligent in failing to furnish a sufficient number of hands to handle the freight; the regular complement of a freight train consisting of four brakemen or train hands, and there being at the time only two employed by the company. He also alleges that the company was negligent, in that it failed to furnish proper appliances, such as planks or skids, with which to handle and unload this heavy barrel of oil from the box car.

The defendant filed a demurrer, on general and special grounds, which was overruled, and exceptions pendente lite were preserved. The general demurrer was based upon two grounds: (1) That the allegations of the petition failed to show a cause of action; and (2) that the allegations affirmatively showed that the injury was caused by an assumed risk of the employment. The special demurrer was based upon the two grounds that the plaintiff failed to allege why he alone took hold of the barrel of oil, when he saw its size and voluntarily assumed a position of danger, and that he failed to allege the names of the train crew who were absent.

[1] 1. There was no error in overruling the demurrer. The allegations plainly set forth a cause of action resulting from the conduct of the conductor as specifically described. The act of the conductor in pushing the barrel of oil without warning upon the plaintiff was not an assumed risk of the plaintiff's employment. The petition alleges plainly that the plaintiff took hold of the barrel of oil, notwithstanding its size, in obedience to the order of the conductor, assuming that he would have the assistance of the conductor in rolling the barrel from the car to the ground. The names of the two absent members of the train crew were wholly immaterial, if in fact four were needed, as alleged, and only two were furnished. Counsel for the plaintiff in error contends that, whatever danger there was in the unloading of this heavy barrel of oil, it was open and obvious to the plaintiff; that he was not misled, and therefore he cannot recover, either under the laws of Georgia or of South Carolina, where the injury occurred; and that it was simply a case where the plaintiff made a miscalculation as to his strength or as to the weight of the barrel; and he relies in support of his position upon those cases decided by the Supreme Court which hold that under such facts no cause of action is shown, such as Worlds v. Georgia Railroad, 99 Ga. 283, 25 S. E. 646, where the employé was ordered to lift and carry cross-ties unaided some 100 yards, Central Railway v. Henderson, 6 Ga. App. 459, 65 S. E. 297, where the employé was ordered to work under a crossbar resting on two posts, and the crossbar fell on him, and Freeman v. Savannah Electric Co., 130 Ga. 449, 60 S. E. 1042, where the employé attempted to work a defective brake. The present case is clearly distinguishable from these cases and kindred cases, in that the petition alleges that the proximate cause of the injury was the conduct of the conductor in pushing the heavy barrel of oil, without warning, upon the plaintiff, and without giving him an opportunity of getting from under it.

[2, 3] 2, 3. Certain excerpts from the charge are assigned as error. These excerpts relate to the allegation that the master was negligent in failing to supply a sufficient force of workmen for the operation of the train, and in failing to supply its employées with suitable machinery and appliances for unloading heavy freight. It is insisted that these instructions were not applicable to the case, in that the plaintiff's positive evidence proved that the proximate cause of his injury was the act of the conductor in pushing the barrel of oil directly upon him without warning, and thus excluded the other allegations of negligence. Unquestionably the excerpts objected to contain correct principles of law. They were certainly applicable to the allegations of the petition. But, even if they were wholly inapplicable to any of the evidence, we do not think that the defendant was injured thereby, or that the jury were misled in thinking, from the fact that these principles were charged, that there was evidence in the case to which they applied.

As a matter of fact the plaintiff testified that there was an insufficient number of hands, and that there was a failure to furnish proper appliances to enable to unload safely the heavy freight. But, regardless of these allegations of negligence, it is manifest that the jury were authorized to find a verdict for the plaintiff, if they believed his testimony as to the act of the conductor in pushing the barrel of oil upon him without warning, irrespective of all the other allegations. In other words, where the evidence shows that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount of damages awarded him under one of the allegations on which he relied for recovery, we do not feel that we are required to grant a new trial because there were other allegations as to acts of negligence which he did not prove were the proximate causes of his injury. If the jury believed the evidence of the plaintiff, and they had a right to believe it, he was entitled to recover, notwithstanding the fact that there were other allegations on which there was no proof. In our opinion, where two or more causes of negligence are set out in a petition, and damages are also claimed because of the willful and wanton act done by an employé in the scope of his employment, the plaintiff would have a right to recover, either upon one or more of the acts of negligence alleged, or upon the willful and wanton act, according to the proof. He would not be required to elect between the acts of negligence and the willful and wanton conduct; but he could submit his whole case to the jury, and if he proved either one, and this one was the proximate cause of the injury, either alone or in connection with the others, it would be sufficient to sustain a verdict in his behalf.

It is not necessary for the jury to agree on one act of negligence, or on the willful and wanton act. Some of the jury might believe one, and some the other, and the verdict would be authorized, although in arriving at it the jurors pursued different routes. And in such case certainly the defendant would have no right to complain because the judge in his general instructions charged the jury separately as to the rights and defenses relating to the allegations of negligence, and as to the claim of willful misconduct. This, we think, is what is meant by the decisions of this court in Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Moore, 5 Ga. App. 564, 63 S. E. 642, and the Supreme Court in Southern Ry. Co. v. Davis, 132 Ga. 812, 65 S. E. 131. See, also, the case of Boggero v. Southern Ry. Co. (Supreme Court of South Carolina) 64 S. C. 104, 41 S. E. 822, relating to the statute of South Carolina applicable to the present case. In this latter case the following charge substantially was approved: "I charge you that, in all cases where two or more acts of negligence or other wrongs are set forth in a complaint as causing or contributing to the injury for which suit is brought by plaintiff, the plaintiff is not required to elect upon which alleged act of negligence or wrong he will go to trial, but he is entitled to submit his whole case to the jury, under the instructions of the court, and recover such damages as he has sustained, whether such damages arise from one or all of such acts of wrong alleged in the complaint, provided the jury believe from the evidence that plaintiff was injured, the result of which was due to the negligence of the plaintiff, which was the proximate cause of any or all of the alleged acts of negligence or wrong; that is, the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages both for negligence and willful misconduct on the part of defendant or its agents according to proof." What we have said here is applicable to all the excerpts from the charge which are objected to.

[4] 4. The plaintiff in error insists that the employé was not injured to the extent that he alleged; that the hernia from which he was suffering was not caused by the heavy barrel of oil being pushed upon him, and by his effort to extricate himself from the danger caused thereby, but that he had previously suffered from this trouble; and to support this allegation it submits, as a part of its motion for a new trial, alleged newly discovered testimony. This question was squarely made an issue on the trial, and the evidence was in direct conflict. The alleged newly discovered testimony would simply be cumulative and impeaching in character, and we do not think it would be likely to produce a different result on another trial. This being so, we cannot hold that the trial judge abused his discretion in refusing a new trial on this ground.

[5] After giving to all the assignments of error a careful consideration, we are satisfied that there was no material error of law committed against the defendant; that, while some of the charge was inapplicable, it was not misleading or prejudicial; that the justice of the verdict rests upon the willful act of the conductor in pushing the barrel of oil on the plaintiff without warning and without giving him an opportunity of escaping the result consequent upon such act. If this was the proximate cause of the injury, the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages, and the jury had the right to believe the evidence of the plaintiff on this subject. The amount of the verdict is not excessive, in view of the injury shown by the testimony of the plaintiff, and of the further fact that the jury were authorized to find that the wrong complained of was attended by circumstances of aggravation.

Judgment affirmed.

INSURANCE (§ 141*)—ACTION FOR PREMIUM—DEFENSES.

It being undisputed in the evidence that the insured retained in his possession the policy of insurance (with a receipt acknowledging the payment of the first premium attached thereto), and made no effort to return the contract of insurance to the insurer, merely expressing dissatisfaction therewith and inability to pay the note given for the premium, a verdict for the defendant in a suit brought by the insurance company upon a note given for a premium upon the policy was contrary to law.

The insured cannot defeat payment of the premium upon a policy of insurance issued at his instance while he still retains the contract, the very issuance and delivery of which depend upon a cross-obligation that the premiums will be paid.

POWELL, J. The nice questions ably argued by counsel for the respective sides cannot be intelligently passed on by the court, because the allegations of the petition are too indefinite to present these questions clearly. There were special demurrers demanding greater certainty, and the court overruled them, and exception is duly taken. We think it best to leave the question of ultimate liability open till the petition is made more specific.

[2] To aid the court in the further conduct of the case, let us say that, if the decedent was a plain trespasser on the defendant's tracks, no liability exists, unless the petition is made to show by its allegations of fact, and not by mere statements of conclusions, that the engineer acted with wantonness or willfulness. This is the rule in the state where the case arose, as well as in this state. If the plaintiff relies on prior negligence of the defendant in putting the decedent on its tracks, the full circumstances as to this should be disclosed.

[1,3] The third ground of the original demurrer was well taken, so far as it called for the facts showing whether the decedent was a passenger, employe, licensee, or trespasser, and showing what duty the defendant owed him and the facts from which that duty arose. Likewise, the first paragraph of the demurrer to the petition as amended should have been sustained, so far as it calls for further information, and so far as it points out the ambiguity of allegation as to whether the decedent was actually unconscious, or merely helpless, though not unconscious. The second paragraph of this second demurrer should have been sustained, so far as it points out deficiency of allegation as to how or wherein the defendant was negligent in ejecting the decedent, and as to where the ejection occurred, and wherein the ejection at that place was improper. Let these points be brought out with clearness, and then the court can say whether a cause of action is set forth or not.

1. RAPE (§ 53*)—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO RAPE—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE.

Where a negro man is on trial, charged with the crime of making a felonious assault upon a white woman, the jury may, in determining the intent with which the assault was made, take into consideration the difference in race and social customs founded thereon, and, in the absence of any encouragement given by the woman, find that a felonious intent existed, even where the assault was not aggravated, and was immediately abandoned upon show of resentment and indignation.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—REQUEST FOR INSTRUCTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS ALREADY GIVEN.

quests, any error in refusing to charge the latter is harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

3. RAPE (§ 59*)—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO RAPE—INSTRUCTIONS.

On the trial of an indictment for an assault and battery with intent to rape, where the evidence shows that the lesser offense was committed as a part of the felony, it is ordinarily the duty of the trial judge to define the offense of assault and battery; but an instruction to the effect that if the accused, at the time of making the assault and battery upon the woman, did not entertain the felonious intent charged, he would be guilty of the lesser offense of assault and battery, was substantially equivalent to a definition of assault and battery, as pertinent to the evidence.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 554*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—STATEMENT OF ACCUSED.

While the jury may believe the statement of the accused in preference to the evidence, they should do so only in the event that they believe the statement to be the truth of the transaction. A charge to this effect was not error.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 874*)—TRIAL—VERDICT—POLLING JURY.

The right to poll the jury in a criminal case is an important legal right, that should not in any manner be abridged or rendered nugatory by any action of the trial judge. This right must be demanded when the verdict is published, and before the jury disperses, and before sentence is imposed. It cannot be exercised, with justice to the state or the accused, after the jury have dispersed, or after sentence has been passed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2085-2088; Dec. Dig. § 874.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 933*)—TRIAL—VERDICT—POLLING JURY.

In a criminal case, where the evidence did not demand the verdict, and where the jury, after having been out considering of the verdict for some hours, returned into court, and the foreman handed the verdict to the solicitor general, who read it aloud, and immediately upon the conclusion of the reading the trial judge imposed the extreme penalty of the statute, by announcing "twenty years in the penitentiary," before the attorney for the accused had time to demand that the jury be polled, this conduct of the judge requires the grant of another trial. It deprived the accused of the exercise of his right to poll the jury, and the error was not cured by the subsequent permission to poll the jury; for the sentence destroyed the right, or rendered it worthless.

Error from Superior Court, Gordon County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Jerry McCullough was convicted of assault with intent to rape, and brings error. Reversed.

O. N. Starr, for plaintiff in error. T. C. Milner, Sol. Gen., for the State.

HILL, C. J. Jerry McCullough, a negro man, was convicted of assault with intent to rape; the alleged victim being a white woman. His motion for a new trial was overruled, and he brings error.

[1] 1. In view of the fact that we have decided that another trial should be granted on one of the special assignments of error, it is unnecessary to state the evidence. It is not improper, however, to say that the evidence for the prosecution makes a clear case of assault and battery, but leaves in doubt the felonious intent charged. But the intent with which an assault and battery was made is peculiarly a question to be determined by the jury, and under the repeated rulings of the Supreme Court illustrating the question of intent in cases where black men assault white women, with special reference to racial differences and the well-established customs which emphasize these differences, we do not feel authorized to disturb the verdict as being without any evidence tending to establish the felonious intent with which the assault and battery was committed. Carter v. State, 35 Ga. 265; Jackson v. State, 91 Ga. 322, 18 S. E. 132, 44 Am. St. Rep. 25; Watkins v. State, 68 Ga. 332; Darden v. State, 97 Ga. 407, 25 S. E. 676; Dorsey v. State, 108 Ga. 477, 34 S. E. 135. The doubt, however, on this point, which would unquestionably be sufficient to acquit of a felony, but for the decisions above cited, and which, even in the light of these decisions, under the evidence in the case, arises as to the intention of the accused in laying his hands on the woman without actual violence, and in desisting immediately upon the show of resentment on her part, accompanied by the declaration that he intended no harm, makes us the more readily grant a new trial on the assignment of error hereafter considered. If the evidence demanded the verdict as rendered, we would treat this error (which we deem presumptively to have been prejudicial under the facts of this case) as harmless.

[2] 2. Exceptions are made to the refusal of the court to give certain instructions requested, relating to the question of the necessity for the evidence to show the existence of the felonious intent charged in the indictment. These requests substantially state the law and make a concrete application to the facts; but an examination of the general charge shows that the material portions of the instructions requested were substantially given, and were sufficiently applied to the facts to make clear the law to the jury.

[3] 3. Objection is also made to the omission of the trial judge to define the offenses of assault and battery and of simple assault. Under the evidence the charge should have defined the offense of assault and battery, but the judge distinctly told the jury that the accused would not be guilty of the felonious assault charged, unless, at the time he laid his hands upon the female, he intended to commit rape, but would be guilty of the offense of assault and battery, and this instruction was sufficient, in lieu of any more specific definition; for the jury could not have failed to understand, from this charge, that the unlawful laying of the hands upon the female by the accused, without a felonious intent, was in law an assault and battery. The indictment charging an assault and battery with a felonious intent, and the evidence showing an assault and battery, the trial judge could not properly have charged on the subject of simple assault.

[4] 4. Referring to the statement of the accused, the judge charged as follows: "You may believe it in preference to the sworn testimony, provided you believe it to be the truth." It is objected that the use of the word "provided" was an improper restriction of the unlimited right which the statute gives to the jury to believe the statement in preference to the testimony. We do not construe the statute to give to the jury this unrestricted right. The statute in terms says that the jury may believe the statement in preference to the testimony. It is a matter of discretion with the jury; but it would be absurd to claim that it was intended to give the jury the right to credit the statement, unless they believed it to be the truth of the transaction, and the use of the word "provided" did not restrict any legitimate right of the jury.

[5] 5. Several objections were made to the admission of testimony, but it is not deemed necessary to consider these objections, as they will hardly occur on the second trial.

[6, 7] 6. We come now to the assignment of error upon which we think, under the facts of this case, the accused should be granted another trial. As before stated, the evidence did not demand the finding. It was doubtful as to the felonious intent. The jury, if the evidence had been clear as to the intent, would promptly have rendered a verdict of conviction. They were out considering of the verdict for several hours, and the only matter about which there was any doubt, or which would have caused any hesitation on the part of any juror in promptly agreeing to the verdict as rendered, was the existence of the felonious intent charged. When they finally agreed and returned a verdict for a felony into court, the foreman handed the verdict to the solicitor general, who published it. "Immediately" upon the conclusion of the reading of the verdict by the solicitor general, while the jury was still standing, and without giving counsel for the accused time to demand for his client the right to poll the jury, the presiding judge sentenced the accused in the following language: "Twenty years in the penitentiary"—the extreme limit of punishment allowed by the statute. This precipitate and severe sentence could have had but one effect upon the jury, namely, the impression of judicial approbation of the verdict and individual indignation against the accused. The sentence thus imposed deprived the accused of his legal right to poll the jury—at least, it destroyed any possible value which the accused could have acquired by the subsequent polling of the jury; for even if any juror had been reluctant in consenting to the verdict, and had changed his mind and had concluded to withdraw his assent when polled, this strong approval by the court of the verdict would have induced any wavering juror to abandon any intended dissent and to agree to the verdict on subsequent polling.

The manner in which the sentence was imposed was unusual. It was a striking variance from that orderly judicial procedure which has generally characterized the conduct of judges in imposing sentences in cases of such gravity. In a practice of 35 years, 12 years of which was as prosecuting attorney, the writer never knew the presiding judge to impose a sentence of such severity in a case of such grave character without first asking counsel and accused if there was any reason why sentence should not then be imposed, and he has never known the presiding judge in the slightest degree to interfere or prevent the full exercise of the right of the accused to poll the jury after the verdict had been published, or by word or deed to impair the possible value in the exercise of such right. This very unusual conduct of the judge must therefore have made a strong impression upon the minds of each one of the jurors, for it is altogether probable that they had never before seen it occur in court, a place where "justice is judicially administered." The writer does not mean by these remarks to animadvert upon the conduct of the judge in this case. He fully sympathizes with him in the indignation he felt on account of the heinousness of the crime of which the accused had been convicted; nevertheless, above everything else, although convicted, the accused should have been given the full, free, and valuable exercise of any right to which he was entitled under the law.

Practically the act of polling the jury has rarely resulted in beneficial result to the accused. In fact, after the experience above stated, the writer has never seen it result in any practical benefit; but, if there ever was a case in which it might possibly result in benefit, it would be a case where, under the evidence, there was doubt as to the felonious intent, and where the jury had for several hours considered the evidence before arriving at a satisfactory conclusion as to the existence of such intent; for it must be conceded that nothing short of grave doubt would have caused hesitation in arriving at a verdict and a delay of several hours. The law of this state places a high value in criminal cases upon the right of the accused to poll the jury. In civil cases the right is discretionary with the presiding judge; but in criminal cases polling is not a privilege to be granted in the discretion of the judge, but is a legal right, and it has always been held to be a material and reversible error to refuse the free exercise of this right. Tilton v. State, 52 Ga. 478; Russell v. State, 68 Ga. 788; Blankenship v. State, 112 Ga. 402, 37 S. E. 732. Did the judge deprive the accused of this legal right or impair its value? For the reasons given above, we think that he did, because it made the subsequent exercise of the right which he granted worthless. The polling of the jury amounted to nothing, in the face of what was necessarily implied by the hasty and severe sentence. Besides, no opportunity was given to counsel for the accused to demand the right before the sentence was imposed.

[8] The recital in the bill of exception is that "immediately" upon the reading of the verdict the sentence was passed. The word "immediately" means "instantly; at once." Standard Dictionary. And when the judge verifies this recital in the bill of exceptions, it is equivalent to stating that "instantly," "at once," upon the reading of the verdict, he imposed the sentence.

In support of the views here stated we cite the case of Robinson v. State, 109 Ga. 506, 34 S. E. 1017. In that case the Supreme Court holds that "it is too late to poll a jury after the sentence of the court has been pronounced." In the Robinson Case the jury had not separated and mingled with the public after the verdict had been published. This would destroy the right to poll; but the presiding judge, some minutes after the publication of the verdict, passed sentence, and the reason why it was too late to poll the jury after sentence had been imposed is stated by the court, in the body of the opinion, to be analogous to the reason that the right is lost after the jury have mingled with the public. The language of the opinion is as follows: "The well-settled rule that a request to poll a jury should be made before the members of it disperse and mingle with the bystanders is, of course, based upon the idea that it would be dangerous to allow a juror who might have heard something calculated to change his mind to have an opportunity to recede from a verdict to which he had really agreed. Certainly nothing would be more likely to have such an effect than a sentence of which a juror did not approve. In this case the punishment inflicted was, we are informed, a term of 15 years in the penitentiary, and it would not have done to allow the jury to be polled after they knew what the judgment of the court was. We think it was a proper one, but no man can tell how the jurors may have regarded it, or that, after it was announced, some of them might not have desired to annul a verdict to which they had deliberately assented." The reason here stated by the Supreme Court for making it improper to poll a jury after the sentence had been passed is that some juror might, on account of the severity of the sentence, be induced to recede from his verdict. Logically the same reason applies where not only the severity of the sentence, but the manner in which it was imposed, might have led a reluctant juror to adhere to the verdict, although he had determined to recede therefrom when polled.

We think, under the principle here decided, that the accused in this case must be granted a new trial. In courts of justice, where order and deliberation should characterize every step of judicial procedure, no necessity should be created for an unseemly contest between the presiding judge and counsel for the accused. The attorney should not be required to be acutely on the alert, to precipitately, and immediately upon the reading of a verdict, jump to his feet and demand the right to poll the jury, for fear that the presiding judge might destroy this right by the too quick imposition of sentence. He should rest content in the knowledge that he will be given every opportunity to demand for his client every right to which he is under the law entitled, and that nothing will be done by the presiding judge to deprive him of this right, or to prevent its exercise in such manner as to secure to his client the full value which the law implies in the bestowal of the right. Judgment reversed.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1028*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

The evidence in this case, not only fully authorizes the amount of the verdict which the plaintiff recovered, but shows that he was entitled to a larger verdict than the one found in his favor. Some immaterial errors of law occurred during the trial; but these did not affect the merits of the case, and are not of sufficient gravity to warrant another trial. The material questions raised were issues of fact, on which the jury could only have justly found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. There is no merit in any of the grounds of the motion for a new trial, and the judgment of the lower court must be affirmed.

A trover suit is a civil case, and is not among the exceptions to the general rule. Where, therefore, a timely and sufficient plea to the jurisdiction of the court was filed, on the ground that the defendant was not a resident of the county in which the suit was brought, it was error for the trial judge to strike this plea, and the issue therein made should have been submitted to the jury.

Employers Liability Act," applies to an action for damages brought against a railroad company by one of its employes for injuries received in the service of the company, it must appear (1) that the railroad company is an interstate carrier; (2) that, as to the transaction through which the injury occurred, it was at the time engaged in interstate commerce; and (3) that the injured employe was at the time engaged in interstate commerce.

To such a transaction the federal statute does not apply.

Error from City Court of Richmond County; W. F. Eve, Judge.

Action by J. B. Anchors against the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Anchors sued the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company for the loss of an eye resulting from alleged acts of negligence as set out in the petition. The plaintiff was employed by the defendant as a foreman of a gang of track hands working on the track of said road near McCormick, S. C., over which the defendant operated trains back and forth between Georgia and South Carolina. One of the track hands working under him struck the blow from which the injury to his eye resulted. Paragraph 2 of the petition reads as follows: "Said defendant is a common carrier, owning a line of railroad between the city of Augusta, in the state of Georgia, and the city of Spartanburg, in the state of South Carolina, and on the date of the injury herein complained of was engaging in commerce between the state of Georgia and the state of South Carolina, and between the several states, and the injury hereinafter complained of was sustained by plaintiff while he was employed by said defendant carrier in said interstate commerce, and defendant is liable in damages therefor under the act of Congress of April 22, 1908, which declares that such an employe may recover from such a common carrier for 'injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents or employes of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency due to its negligence in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, boats, wharves or other equipment." It is further stated that the work in which the plaintiff and the other servants of the company were engaged was taking up and replacing one of the rails of the track, and that the work was being rushed so that an interstate train could pass on schedule. The defendant demurred upon various grounds; the chief ground insisted upon being that the petition set out no cause of action under said act of Congress of 1908, because the plaintiff being a track hand engaged in repairing a track in South Carolina at the time of the injury, was not employed in interstate commerce within the meaning of that act, and that the defendant as to the transaction in question was not so engaged. The demurrer was overruled upon all the grounds, and the defendant excepted.

W. K. Miller, for plaintiff in error. Wm. H. Fleming, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] The sole question involved is whether the act of Congress of April 22, 1908, known as the "Federal Employers Liability Act" (35 Stat. 65, c. 149 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1909, p. 1171]), applies to this transaction. That statute, by its terms, relates only to liability of common carriers by railroad "while engaged in commerce between any of the several states" to persons "while employed by such carrier in such commerce." It will be called to mind that the prior act of Congress on the same subject (Act June 11, 1906, c. 3073, 34 Stat. 232 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1909, p. 1148]) was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States in Howard v. Illinois Central R. Co., 207 U. S. 463, 28 Sup. Ct. 141, 52 L. Ed. 297, on the ground that it applied to all carriers who were generally engaged in interstate commerce as to all employes, whether the carrier and the employe were at the time of the injury actually engaged with commerce of that character or not. The present law was enacted with its limitations, with the special object in view of cutting out the constitutional objections for which the prior law had been declared invalid. The present law emphasizes three things, which must concur before its provisions are applicable: (1) The railroad company in question must engage in interstate commerce; (2) it must at the time of the injury in question be engaging in that character of commerce, as contradistinguished from such purely local matters as it may also engage in; (3) the injured servant must also at the time of receiving his injury be engaging in interstate commerce. That the carrier in this case was generally engaged in interstate commerce is not in question. The remaining questions are whether, at the time the injury complained of was received, it was engaging in interstate commerce, and whether the injured employe was engaging in that character of commerce at that time. To narrow the point a little more, the concrete question is whether the work of repairing a defective rail in a track over which a railroad company carries on its transportation, both local and interstate, is of itself an act of engaging in interstate commerce.

It is very difficult to impose the limitations of a definition upon the word "commerce" as used in the federal Constitution. How this term, which originally was considered as almost synonymous in meaning with the word "trade," has been enlarged so as to include contracts, transportation, ways, means, and agencies, and even instrumentalities by which commercial intercommunications are carried on, is a matter of legal history. Still, with all of its enlargement of meaning, the word "commerce" has its limitations, and there are some things which, though touching the field of commercial operation, do not enter into it in such a way as to become of themselves a part of the commerce. The insuring of articles intended for interstate transportation is a matter which touches interstate commerce, but is not "commerce" within the purview of the Constitution. Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. Ed. 357; Hooper v. California, 155 U. S. 648, 15 Sup. Ct. 207, 39 L. Ed. 297; Nutting v. Massachusetts, 183 U. S. 553, 22 Sup. Ct. 238, 46 L. Ed. 324. To manufacture goods with the intention of devoting them to interstate commerce is not interstate commerce. U. S. v. Knight, 156 U. S. 1, 15 Sup. Ct. 249, 39 L. Ed. 325. In the case of Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 9 Sup. Ct. 6, 32 L. Ed. 346, in which it is held that a state may prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors within its borders, notwithstanding that the manufacturer intends to use the liquors when manufactured only for exportation beyond the borders of the state, the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Lamar, draws the distinction between "manufacture" and "commerce" thus:

"No distinction is more popular to the common mind, or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature, than that between manufacture and commerce. Manufacture is transformation—the fashioning of raw materials into a change of form for use. The functions of commerce are different. The buying and selling and the transportation incidental thereto constitute commerce; and the regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense embraces the regulation at least of such transportation. The legal definition of the term as given by this court in County of Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 702, 26 L. Ed. 238, 241, is as follows: 'Commerce with foreign nations and among the states, strictly considered, consists in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities.' If it be held that the term includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future, it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be invested, to the exclusion of the states, with the power to regulate, not only manufacture, but also agriculture, horticulture, stock-raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry. For is there one of them that does not contemplate, more or less clearly, an interstate or foreign market? Does not the wheat grower of the Northwest, and the cotton planter of the South, plant, cultivate, and harvest his crop with an eye on the prices at Liverpool, New York, and Chicago? The power being vested in Congress and denied to the states, it would follow as an inevitable result that the duty would devolve on Congress to regulate all of these delicate, multiform, and vital interests—interests which in their nature are, and must be, local in all the details of their successful management."

Again in Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 6 Sup. Ct. 475, 29 L. Ed. 715, the court held that logs cut in the woods and brought to the landing for the purpose of being transported in interstate commerce did not become a subject of interstate commerce thereby. From these and other cases of the Supreme Court of the United States along the same line, it is clear that a distinction is observed between preparing to engage in interstate commerce and in engaging in interstate commerce. As was pointed out by the United States Supreme Court in Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 481, 8 Sup. Ct. 564, 31 L. Ed. 508: "It is to be remembered that railroads are not natural highways of trade and commerce. They are artificial creations. They are constructed within the territorial limits of the state and by the authority of its laws, and ordinarily by means of corporations exercising their franchises by limited grants from the state." And, as the opinion of the court in that case goes on to point out, there are many matters relating to the preparation of a railroad company to engage in interstate commerce which are of a purely local nature, and are not of themselves a part of interstate commerce. From the reasoning and from the illustrations given in the case of Howard v. Illinois Central R. Co., supra, in which the former employer's liability act was declared unconstitutional, it is plain that the court had in mind that there were necessarily a number of activities which an interstate railroad might engage in which would not constitute engaging in interstate commerce. It is true that in a more or less remote sense every act performed by an employé for a carrier that engages indiscriminately in local and interstate commerce tends to promote the latter form of commerce. The porter who cleans the cuspidors in the general offices of the company for the comfort and convenience of the officers who direct the movement of the trains as they pass from state to state and the other great commercial activities of the carrier is in a certain sense engaged in carrying on that great commerce; but we do not believe that this menial employé in his strictly local duties is within the purview of the act of Congress in question, and we believe that the connection between the services to be performed and the commerce itself must be closer than that.

Just here let us make this point clearer that, wherever this federal statute applies, all state laws give way, and employer and employé alike are bound by its terms. Considering it in its operation throughout the entire United States, and noticing its effect upon the local jurisprudence of the various states, it may be seen that in some states, as to some transactions, and as to some phases of what is commonly known as the "master and servant law," it gives the employé a benefit, while in other states, or as to other transactions, or as to other phases of the master and servant law, it gives the employer the benefit. Whatever it takes from one side it gives to the other, and vice versa. For instance, in the state of South Carolina, where this very injury arose, the federal act is more beneficial to the employé in this particular instance than the state law is, because the defense of fellow service is by the federal act abolished as to the underservant who inflicted this injury upon his foreman; whereas, under the South Carolina statute, the railroad company could have pleaded the doctrine of fellow servant to exempt itself in such a case. And yet in most respects the South Carolina statute on this general subject is more favorable to the servant than it is to the master. So when the court proceeds to lay down the rule that this or that service performed by an employé for a railroad company constitutes engaging in interstate commerce, no person can thereafter enter into the service of an interstate carrier and perform that service for it without surrendering whatever particular benefits may be given him by the state law, so far as they are not also given by the federal law. We mention this in response to the argument presented by able counsel for the defendant in error that this federal statute is one of those beneficent and progressive acts of legislation which should be given the widest possible legal scope, and that the benefit of every reasonable doubt should be given in favor of maintaining jurisdiction under it. Personally we give accord to the sentiment that the federal act is in most respects a wise and beneficent piece of legislation, and a fair and just statute; but that is a matter with which we have no concern at all. All valid statutes enacted by Congress within the scope of its powers are, so far as we as judges are concerned, wise and beneficent and just acts of legislation. On the other hand, every valid state statute is to be considered to be entitled to the same respect and judicial approval, so far as it is enacted within the scope of the state's powers.

After carefully considering the question, and with no other end in view than to give to the act of Congress just such scope as it is legally entitled to, without any prejudice for or against the legislation as such, we cannot see how the act of repairing a broken rail in a railroad track is engaging in commerce at all, nor how the repairing of a part of the physical properties of a railroad, which are in their very nature permanently fixed within the limits of the state, can be regarded as an interstate transaction at all. To our minds, neither the servant who struck the blow nor the servant whose eye was injured through the blow's being struck was engaged in interstate commerce, since the whole object of striking the blow was merely to drive a spike to hold in place a rail that this defendant might have a railroad track upon which it could thereafter, if it so desired, engage in commerce, either interstate or intrastate. If the distinction between preparing to engage in commerce and the act of actually engaging in it is to be observed, this transaction falls squarely within the domain of preparation.

We are aware that the courts, so far as they have passed upon this and cognate questions, have been widely divided in opinion. To support the view that the federal statute would apply in such cases, see Zikos v. Oregon R. & N. Co. (C. C.) 179 Fed. 893; Colasurdo v. Railway Co. (C. C.) 180 Fed. 832 (recently affirmed by the Court of Appeals of the Second Circuit, 192 Fed. 901). On the contrary, see Taylor v. Sou. Ry. Co. (by Judge Newman of the United States Court of the Northern Circuit of Georgia) 178 Fed. 380. Indeed, the conflict in judicial views on the question is such that, notwithstanding what decisions may be rendered in the meantime, the question can be accepted as an open one until the Supreme Court of the United States itself decides it, as it probably will do at some early date.

In the meantime the judgment is reversed.

Assignments of error, which do not direct the attention of the court to the specific error of which complaint is made, will not be considered. Crawford v. State, 4 Ga. App. 789(8), 62 S. E. 501. An assignment of error to a charge not erroneous in the abstract must point out its specific defect, and the attention of the court must be specifically directed to the error in the instruction alleged to be erroneous. A mere general assignment that a portion of a charge excepted to was error presents nothing to the consideration of a reviewing court, except its abstract correctness; and especially is this true when the charge as a whole is not embodied in the record.

2. SALES (§ 480*)—RECOVERY OF GOODS BY SELLER—EVIDENCE.

Error from City Court of Monroe; A. Q. Stone, Judge.

Action by Rothchilds & Co. against Robinson & Johnson. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Napier & Cox, for plaintiffs in error. W. O. Dean, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. The defendants in error sold a piano to W. H. Jackson on the installment plan. Jackson was in arrears in his monthly payments, and correspondence between the seller of the piano and the purchaser ensued. Jackson several times offered to return the piano, stating that it was not such an instrument as he thought it was when he made the contract, and also that on account of the altered state of his financial condition he was unable to pay for it. The correspondence resulted in Jackson's final agreement, acquiesced in by Rothchilds, to ship the piano back to the sellers, forwarding them at the same time a bill of lading from Monroe, Ga., to the factory at Stegar, Ill. Jackson himself was in Athens, but he testifies by interrogatories that he gave instructions to his wife to have the piano shipped, and she obeyed his instructions by employing a man to box and pack the piano, and had it carried by a drayman to the railroad depot. There the piano was levied upon by attachments issued at the instance of the plaintiffs in error and other creditors of Jackson. Prior to the levy the constable had been told by Mrs. Jackson, at her house, that they had been unable to pay for the piano in accordance with the contract, and that it was not Jackson's property, but was the property of the original vendors. No notice of the levy of the attachment was given to Rothchilds & Co., and in due course the piano was sold; the plaintiffs in error being the purchasers. Some time later an agent of Rothchilds & Co., inquiring as to the whereabouts of the piano, and being told by Jackson, in Athens, that he had returned it, discovered that it had been seized by the attachments and sold, and thereupon instituted the present action in trover. Upon the trial the jury found in favor of the plaintiffs.

[1] Exception is taken to the judgment overruling a motion for new trial. The motion for new trial is based upon the general grounds, and upon three additional grounds, which attempt to assign error upon certain quoted excerpts from the charge of the court; but there is no specific assignment of error in any of them, and each is so incomplete as to have presented nothing for the consideration of the lower court in passing upon the motion. Under well-settled rulings of the Supreme Court and this court, these grounds, of course, present nothing for our consideration, because a court of review can pass upon nothing which the lower court did not have fair opportunity to determine. The mere quotation of an extract from the charge of the court, and the general statement that it is error, is an exception to the judge's charge so extremely vague and indefinite as to be fatally defective; and especially is this true in a case in which the charge of the court as a whole is not embodied in the record, so as to enable us to have the opportunity of considering the extract in connection with the context. It is manifest that this court cannot determine from these extracts from the charge whether the trial judge erred in overruling the motion for new trial, in so far as it was based upon the grounds contained in the amendment. Assignments of error which do not direct the attention of the court to the specific error of which complaint is made will not be considered. Crawford v. State, 4 Ga. App. 789 (8), 62 S. E. 501. An assignment of error to a charge not erroneous in the abstract must point out its specific defect, and the attention of the court must be specifically directed to the error in the instruction alleged to be erroneous. A mere general assignment that a portion of a charge excepted to was error presents nothing to the consideration of a reviewing court, especially when the charge as a whole is not embodied in the record.

[2] 2. As to whether the judge erred in overruling the motion for new trial is based upon the general grounds. The testimony might have authorized a finding either way. The trial judge, who heard the testimony and saw the witnesses, approved the finding of the jury. It cannot be said that there is no evidence that there was a rescission of the contract between Rothchilds and Jackson, because every circumstance confirms the statement that there was such a rescission, and Jackson himself, in his interrogatories, testifies that the contract was rescinded. The contract between Rothchilds and Jackson itself provided for the retaking of the piano by Rothchilds, and Jackson consented that he should exercise this privilege without legal proceedings. It is true that, in order to have more effectually protected their rights, the sellers should have recorded the conditional bill of sale under which Jackson held the piano; but this failure on their part was at their own risk. In not giving creditors of Jackson notice by record, they took the risk of other creditors not having notice brought home to them that the title was reserved. The question as to whether the plaintiffs in error in this case had actual notice of the state of the title to the piano, or as to whether the circumstances were sufficient to put them, as prudent men, on such inquiry as would have led to knowledge, was one to be determined by the jury from the facts and circumstances which appear in the record. Our conclusion upon those facts might not have been the same as that reached by the jury in their finding. This, however, does not matter, because we cannot say that the circumstances in proof were not sufficient to authorize the result reached by the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

Where, on the day fixed for the hearing of a motion for a new trial, a brief of the evidence is presented and approved, and the judge takes the matter under advisement, and holds it under consideration for a number of days, and, while considering it, discovers that the brief of the evidence is incorrect, he may cause the correction to be made before he acts on the motion, notwithstanding all of this oc-

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 5*)—PROOF OF LACK OF ADMINISTRATION.

Lack of administration upon the estate of a decedent is adequately shown, where there appears in the record the testimony of a witness that he had examined the records in the office of the ordinary in the county where the decedent resided at the time of his death, and that no administration had been granted. The law presumes intestacy until proof of a will is made. Miller v. Speight, 61 Ga. 460. Hence lack of representation on a decedent's estate is prima facie shown by proof that no administrator has been appointed thereon.

3. DEATH (§ 36*)—ACTIONS FOR CAUSING DEATH—VENUE.

The venue of a cause of action against a railway company for a negligent homicide is in the county in which the fatal injury was inflicted, and not in the county where the injured person afterwards may have died. The cause of action adheres in the wrong as consummated by the injury, and not in the death itself.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 265*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS AND BURDEN OF PROOF.

Under the employer's liability act of 1909, now found in Civil Code 1910, § 2782 et seq., where suit is brought for the death of an employe, the railway company has the burden of proving that its agents and employes have exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, and the plaintiff makes a prima facie case merely by showing that the decedent met his death while discharging the duties of his employment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 265.*]

5. COURTS (§ 217*)—SUPREME COURT—CERTIFICATION OF QUESTION—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES.

The attempt of the plaintiff in error to make an attack upon the act of 1909, for unconstitutionality is ineffectual, because of the general and indefinite manner in which he presents the constitutional question. As to this point, the decision in Davis v. City of Waycross, supra, this day decided, and the cases therein cited, are controlling.

6. STATUTES (§ 279*)—PLEADING—NECESSITY.

Where a statute of this state is applicable to the cause of action set forth in the petition, the plaintiff does not have to plead it, in order to get the benefit of it.

7. DEATH (§ 95*)—ACTIONS—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—"FULL VALUE OF THE LIFE OF THE DECEASED."

The measure of damages for a negligent homicide falling within the purview of the act of 1909, now Civil Code 1910, § 2782, is the "full value of the life of the deceased," which by reference to Civil Code 1910, § 4423, is amplified to mean "the full value of the life of the deceased, without deducting for necessary or other personal expenses of the deceased had he lived."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

8. NEW TRIAL (§§ 104, 105*)—GROUNDS—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the verdict. The grounds of the motion for a new trial based on the alleged newly discovered evidence, so far as formally complete, present matters merely cumulative or impeaching; and no reason appears for disturbing the recovery in the plaintiff's favor.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 537*)—ACTIONS—QUESTIONS OF LAW OR FACT—GOOD FAITH OF PURCHASER.

The law of this state (Civ. Code 1910, § 4291) declares that "any circumstances which would place a prudent man upon his guard, in purchasing negotiable paper, shall be sufficient to constitute notice to a purchaser of such paper before it is due." The character and sufficiency of the circumstances in a particular case which should place a prudent man on his guard are to be determined as questions of fact by the jury, and not by the judge as questions of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 1879; Dec. Dig. § 537.*]

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 537*)—ACTIONS—QUESTIONS OF LAW OR FACT—GOOD FAITH OF PURCHASER.

The promise to pay the interest on a negotiable note is as much a part of the contract as the promise to pay the principal. Principal and interest constitute one debt. When the note is sold to a third person before the principal is due, but when installments of interest are past due and remain unpaid, and the fact of nonpayment appears, either on the face of the note or by actual knowledge on the part of the purchaser, it would be for the jury to determine whether these facts were circumstances sufficient to put the purchaser, as a prudent man, on his guard, and to furnish to him warning that the maker of the note had some defense. Proof of the above facts indicated authorized the jury in finding that the purchaser bought the note with notice that it was then dishonored, and he would not be protected in his title against any defense that the maker could make, if the note was sued by the original payee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 1879; Dec. Dig. § 537.*]

3. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—NO ERROR.

The other assignments of error are not material. There was evidence to support the plea of total failure of the consideration for which the note was given, and no reason appears for the grant of another trial.

Error from City Court of Waynesboro; H. A. Boykin, Judge.

Action by Howard C. Park against W. B. Buxton and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

H. J. Fullbright and F. S. Burney, for plaintiff in error. W. H. Fleming and C. B. Garlick, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. Howard C. Park sued W. B. Buxton and others as makers of a promissory note, alleging that he was a bona fide holder for value, and that he had bought the note before it was due and without any notice of any defect of defense. The defense denied these allegations of the plaintiff, and on the issue thus formed and the evidence, under the charge of the court, the jury found a verdict in favor of the defendants, and plaintiff's motion for a new trial was overruled. The evidence, briefly stated, is as follows: The note was one of three notes made by the makers for $1,000 each, and payable to McLaughlin Bros., or order. Each note was dated April 8, 1906; the first note falling due May 1, 1907, the second one falling due in 1908, the third one falling due in 1909. The consideration of the notes was a high-bred stallion, the purchase being made under express warranties as to the quality of the stallion, and the defense relied upon was a breach of these warranties. This defense was met by the contention of the plaintiff that, as he was a bona fide purchaser for value before maturity without notice of any defect or defense, this defense of failure of consideration could not be made to the note in his hands. There was a credit of $200 on the principal of the note, leaving a balance of $800 due. Plaintiff paid $850 for the note to McLaughlin Bros., the original payees, and at the time of the purchase the principal of the note had not matured, but would have matured in 12 days. Two installments of annual interest, amounting to $96 at the time of the purchase, were past due and unpaid. The face of the note did not show this fact, but the plaintiff admitted that he knew the fact when he purchased the note.

[1] The principal question of law presented is: Does the purchaser for value of a negotiable promissory note before the principal thereof is due, with knowledge that installments of interest thereon are past due and unpaid, stand in the position of a bona fide holder, and is he protected as such under section 4286, Civil Code 1910; or does the fact that installments of interest are past due, accompanied by his knowledge of the fact, constitute sufficient reason to dishonor the principal of the note and let in all defenses good against the original payee? Plaintiff in error insists that as a matter of law the simple fact that installments of interest are overdue and unpaid, disconnected from other facts, is not of itself sufficient to affect the position of one taking the note before maturity of the principal for value as a bona fide purchaser, and that it was the duty of the trial judge so to instruct the jury. The trial judge refused so to instruct the jury as a matter of law, but submitted the question to them as one of fact, charging to the effect that it was for the jury to decide whether the nonpayment of the interest and the knowledge of that fact by the plaintiff at the time he purchased the note was a circumstance which would place a prudent man upon his guard in purchasing negotiable paper.

The question of law here presented has never been directly decided by the Supreme Court of this state, and the decisions in other jurisdictions are in conflict. Some of the courts holding that default in the payment of interest, with a knowledge of that fact by the purchaser, does not dishonor the note, and is not a sufficient circumstance of suspicion to put the purchaser upon further inquiry, are Indiana & Ill. Ry. Co. v. Sprague, 103 U. S. 756, 26 L. Ed. 554; Cromwell v. Sac County, 96 U. S. 51, 24 L. Ed. 681; Thompson v. Perrine, 103 U. S. 589, 1 Sup. Ct. 564, 568, 27 L. Ed. 298; Nat. Bank v. Kirby, 108 Mass. 497; Kelly v. Whitney, 45 Wis. 110, 30 Am. Rep. 697. Some of those taking the opposite view are Newell v. Gregg, 51 Barb. (N. Y.) 263; Citizens' Savings Bank v. Couse, 68 Misc. Rep. 153, 124 N. Y. Supp. 79; First Nat. Bank v. Forsyth, 67 Minn. 257, 69 N. W. 909, 64 Am. St. Rep. 415. The United States Supreme Court, in the case of Trask v. Jacksonville, Pensacola & Mobile R. Co., 124 U. S. 515, 8 Sup. Ct. 574, 31 L. Ed. 521, in seeming conflict with prior decisions on the same subject, holds, that, where interest coupons attached to bonds of the state had not been paid for 10 years, this fact furnished the strongest presumptive evidence of dishonor. The court in this latter case seemed to attach significance to the fact that so many of the interest coupons were unpaid, and the fact that the bonds were issued by the state, and the peculiar facts of the case seemed to have made the conflict between this decision and prior decisions more apparent than real. As illustrating the conflict in the decisions of the courts on this subject, it may be noted that those courts which hold that the mere fact of default in the payment of interest is not of itself sufficient to dishonor the note, and to put the purchaser on notice and destroy his character as a bona fide holder, repudiate the doctrine that as to negotiable paper mere suspicion that there may be a defect of title in its holder, or knowledge of circumstances which would excite suspicion as to his title in the mind of a prudent man, is not sufficient to impair the title of the purchaser, and that this result would only follow where there has been bad faith on his part. See Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall. 110, 17 L. Ed. 857, where the leading authorities on this subject are collated and considered.

The doctrine, however, that the purchaser of such paper, under circumstances of suspicion calculated to put a prudent man upon inquiry, does so at his risk, seems to be the rule in this state. Civil Code 1910, § 4291, provides that "any circumstances which would place a prudent man upon his guard in purchasing negotiable paper shall be sufficient to constitute notice to a purchaser of such paper before it is due." What would be sufficient to place a prudent man upon his guard in purchasing negotiable paper is necessarily a question of fact. It cannot in any case be a question of law. In this state the trial judge cannot instruct the jury what a prudent man should do, or would do, under certain circumstances; for, as Mr. Justice Bleckley says in the case of R. & D. R. Co. v. Howard, 79 Ga. 53, 3 S. E. 428, "in legal contemplation the jury know it better than the court." Looking at the question abstractly, it would seem that negotiable paper is dishonored by any breach of the engagement which it imports, and that any fact which would tend to show that the paper was disgraced would destroy its character of negotiability. In other words, if there is anything upon the face of the paper indicative of dishonor, the purchaser takes it at his peril.

[2] A promise to pay a negotiable promissory note applies to the interest as well as to the principal. There is but the one promise, and the interest is just as much a part of the debt represented by the note as the principal, and the obligation to pay the interest is as strong as the obligation to pay the principal, and a failure to pay the interest would indicate that the promisor had broken his promise, and had dishonored and destroyed the negotiable character of the obligation; or, as otherwise expressed, anything that dishonors any part of a note dishonors the whole note. The failure to pay one installment of interest would be a circumstance of suspicion, the suspicion growing stronger as defaults were made in the payment of successive installments. "Where a note is for the payment of money at a specified time, with interest payable annually, the payment of interest annually is as much a part of the agreement as a promise to pay the principal. It is a portion of the debt, and if, when the note is sold to a third person by the payee, a year's interest is past due, the note is then dishonored. When the instrument furnishes evidence that the written promise to pay has been dishonored, a party taking the same takes it with the warning that the maker may have some defense, and no one can become a bona fide holder of a promissory note, so as to shut out a valid defense of the maker, if the holder takes it when money is past due upon it." The above is the language of the Supreme Court of New York in the case of Newell v. Gregg, supra, and in our opinion expresses the sound rule on the subject.

Section 4291 of the Civil Code of 1910, immediately follows those sections of the Code which declare the rights of bona fide holders of negotiable paper, and was intended unquestionably as a qualification of these rights, and we therefore conclude that the trial judge in the present case properly instructed the jury that it was a question for them to determine, under the evidence, whether the failure to pay the interest on the note was a circumstance which would place a prudent man upon his guard in purchasing the note; and if they concluded that it was a sufficient circumstance, then the holder of the note would not be a bona fide purchaser, and the maker thereof would be let in to all of the defenses which he would have had to the note, if in the hands of the original payee. If the circumstance of default in the interest due for two years was in the present case sufficient to put the plaintiff, as a prudent man, on his guard in the purchase of this note, then it was also sufficient to put him on inquiry, and he is bound in law and in equity by any knowledge or information that he might have acquired in pursuance of reasonable inquiry on the subject. The jury were authorized to infer from the evidence that upon reasonable inquiry the purchaser of this note would have found out the defenses which the makers had to its payment, to wit, that the consideration of the note had totally failed. There was evidence to establish this defense.

[3] The other exceptions made to the charge of the court are immaterial. The foregoing question, which we have discussed, is controlling, and, in the view that we have taken of the law, we fail to find any error, and therefore affirm the judgment refusing a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

2. REPLEVIN (§ 71*)—PROCEEDINGS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

The property sought to be recovered in a bail trover suit was transferred to the plaintiff by the defendant as security for the payment of a promissory note under section 3306 of the Civil Code of 1910. On the trial the defendant offered to prove that before the note matured, and before any demand was made on him for the delivery of the property sued for (the property being several head of cattle), the cattle had died, which fact was known by the plaintiff when he brought the suit; and the trial judge refused to allow the proof. Held error. To maintain trover, the plaintiff must show title or the right of possession in himself, and possession or conversion by the defendant. The testimony offered was competent evidence to disprove both possession and conversion by the defendant. Civil Code 1910, § 4483.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Replevin, Cent. Dig. §§ 285-291; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

3. REPLEVIN (§ 71*)—PROCEEDINGS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

The above is true, although the defendant had agreed, in the written contract, to take all risks of injury to or death of the property transferred, and agreed that, if the note was not paid at maturity, the plaintiff could sue for recovery of the property "by bail trover or otherwise." The essentials of a trover suit are given by the statute, and cannot be enlarged by agreement.

PATRICK v. HENDERSON. (No. 3,360.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

TRIAL (§ 169*)—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

The evidence, with all reasonable deductions and inferences therefrom, did not absolutely demand the verdict for the defendant, and it was error to direct such a verdict.

Error from City Court of Monticello; A. S. Thurman, Judge.

Action by D. L. Patrick, Jr., against V. O. G. Henderson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

A. Y. Clement, for plaintiff in error. Greene F. Johnson, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Patrick sued Henderson in trover to recover "one black horse mule 5 years old, medium size." After hearing the evidence, the trial judge directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff excepted.

The facts are as follows: On January 10, 1906, Lucian Benton sold the mule in question to William Harris, taking therefor a purchase-money note, reserving title. This instrument was duly recorded. This note is credited with a payment of $104.71, dated October 28, 1907. On October 24, 1908, Benton transferred the note after maturity to Patrick with Benton's right and title to the mule. Some time in the spring of 1908 Harris, without the knowledge or consent of Benton, exchanged the mule for a horse to Jones, and gave a mortgage on the horse to Phillips. Harris having traded the mule for a horse, and having the latter in his possession, executed to Benton a note for $104.02, with a reservation of title to the horse in Benton, and Benton transferred this note with reservation of title to Patrick. Jones, to whom Harris traded the mule for the horse, sold the mule to Henderson. Subsequently the horse was sold by Phillips under his mortgage, and bought by Patrick for $69. Patrick, claiming title to the mule, brought the suit against Henderson. When the deputy sheriff went to serve bail process on Henderson, he did not find the mule in Henderson's possession; but Henderson told him that "he could get the mule all right," and would come to him the next day and settle the matter, whereupon the officer, with the consent of Patrick, did not execute the process. Henderson failed to produce the mule or to go to town and settle the case. The value of the mule was proved to be at least $200, and the horse $69.

It was contended by the defendant that as Benton had transferred the purchase-money note reserving title, after maturity, to Patrick, the transferee had no greater rights than the transferor, and that, as the evidence showed that Benton had taken the note for the horse in lieu of the note for the mule, the title to the mule was lost, and therefore Patrick could not recover the mule from Henderson. It was also contended that the evidence showed that Henderson did not have possession, custody, or control of the mule at the time of the filing of the suit and when the demand was made on him for the mule, and he had not converted the mule, and that for this reason, also, there could be no recovery. The judge took this view of the evidence and directed a verdict for defendant.

We do not think the evidence, with all reasonable deductions or inferences therefrom, was so clear and unequivocal on both points as to demand the verdict for the defendant. Unquestionably Patrick had no greater title to the mule than Benton had; but, as Benton's contract reserving title to the mule was duly recorded, he had title until the note was paid or in some way settled. If Benton accepted the note for the horse with reservation of title from Harris in lieu of the note for the mule with reservation of title, which he subsequently transferred to Patrick, and it was so understood by both Benton and Patrick, the right to recover the mule was lost, for the horse was substituted for the mule. But if the jury could have reasonably inferred from the evidence that Benton was simply endeavoring to protect himself and his transferee as to the mule transaction, the mule being more valuable than the horse and having been sold by Harris, and that the horse note was collateral security for the mule note, then Patrick would still have title to the mule. In our opinion the evidence is not so clear and unequivocal on this point as to demand the finding that the horse note was taken, not as collateral, but as a substitution for the mule note, and this question should have been submitted to the jury. Civil Code 1910, § 5926; Broughton v. Aiken, 7 Ga. App. 318, 66 S. E. 809.

We think, also, that the question whether the defendant had possession, custody, or control of the mule was in some doubt under the evidence. Two or three days before the suit was brought, he was seen to have the mule in his possession, and on the night when the officer, in company with the plaintiff, went to serve bail process, he admitted that, while he did not have the mule in his possession at that time, "he could get it," and agreed that "if they would give him until to-morrow he would settle it." The jury might have inferred that, while he did not have the mule in his actual possession, it was where he could get it, or that he was playing for time to elude the mule, so as not to have it forthcoming. Even if he did not then have possession, custody, or control of the mule, but had previously gotten possession of it with legal knowledge of Benton's recorded title, and with this knowledge had disposed of the mule, this was a conversion so far as the superior right of Benton was concerned, if he had not lost his right to the mule in taking the note for the horse. Miller v. Wilson, 98 Ga. 567, 25 S. E. 578, 58 Am. St. Rep. 319; Merchants' & Miners' Transportation Co. v. Moore, 124 Ga. 482, 52 S. E. 802. The case should have been sent to the jury, and the direction of a verdict for the defendant was erroneous. Judgment reversed.

HARRIS et al. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 2, 1912.)

1. CONSPIRACY (§ 23*)—"CRIMINAL CONSPIRACY."

A criminal conspiracy is a combination of two or more persons by some concerted action to accomplish a criminal or unlawful purpose, or to accomplish some purpose, not in itself criminal or unlawful, by criminal or unlawful means.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Cent. Dig. §§ 30-39; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1454-1461; vol. 3, p. 7613; vol. 2, pp. 1745-1746.]

2. MONOPOLIES (§ 12*)—COMBINATIONS PROHIBITED—COMMON-LAW RULE.

The common law did not prohibit the creation of a monopoly by individuals, but only the granting of a monopoly by the sovereign, and combinations in restraint of trade, in view of the laws against engrossing which were not technically monopolies at common law, were only unlawful when made among dealers in provisions or the necessities of life or of merchandise or manufacture in the market.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Monopolies, Cent. Dig. § 10; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

3. MONOPOLIES (§ 18*)—COMBINATIONS BY INSURANCE COMPANIES—"INSURANCE"—"NECESSARIES."

Insurance is not an article of merchandise or manufacture, or one of the necessities of life, within the laws against engrossing, prohibiting combinations among dealers in merchandise or manufacture or necessities of life, since a policy of insurance is a simple contract of indemnity against loss.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Monopolies, Cent. Dig. § 14; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 3674-3677; vol. 5, pp. 4693-4703.]

4. CONSPIRACY (§ 23*)—COMBINATIONS BY INSURANCE COMPANY TO FIX RATES.

A combination of fire insurance companies to fix rates and control the business of insurance in a city, though an agreement in restraint of trade, is not an indictable conspiracy at common law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

5. CONSPIRACY (§ 43*)—CRIMINAL CONSPIRACY—INDICTMENT.

Where the object of a conspiracy is not criminal or illegal, and the illegality consists of the means by which the object is effected, the indictment must set forth the means which must be such as to constitute an offense at common law or by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Cent. Dig. §§ 79-99; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1*)—OFFENSES—MOTIVE.

Acts which will subject one to a civil action without regard to the motive with which it is done may be indictable when done maliciously.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

7. CONSPIRACY (§ 23*)—ILLEGAL COMBINATIONS—WARRANT.

A warrant alleging that insurance companies and individuals doing business in a city which had levied a license tax on insurance companies doing business there maliciously conspired to arbitrarily raise insurance rates for the purpose of maintaining a monopoly of the insurance business in the city, and to stifle competition and coerce the city authorities to repeal the license tax, does not charge a criminal conspiracy at common law, but shows that the companies had just cause for raising their rates in the city by considering the license taxes imposed, and the motive charged does not make the acts complained of a criminal offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

Error to Corporation Court of Newport News.

A. H. Harris and others were charged with criminal conspiracy, and from a judgment overruling demurrers to the criminal warrant they bring error. Reversed and rendered.

O. D. Batchelor, R. Randolph Harrison, J. Winston Read, and Alex C. King, for plaintiffs in error. The Attorney General and C. C. Berkeley, for the Commonwealth.

BUCHANAN, J. This is a prosecution for criminal conspiracy. It was commenced before a justice, but upon appeal to the corporation court of the city of Newport News the warrant was by leave of the court amended.

The amended warrant is quite long. It charges, in substance, that on May 17, 1910, and previously for a number of years, a large number of insurance companies had been doing all the fire insurance business of the city, which insurance was a necessity to all persons owning property in the city; that prior to the said 17th of May the city authorities had passed an ordinance requiring a certain license tax to be paid by each fire insurance company doing business in the city for the license year beginning May 1, 1910; that the (6) plaintiffs in error and some 20 other persons, naming them, and others unknown, together with all the said fire insurance companies and associations, did on the 17th of the said May, with a wanton and malicious intent to damage and injure, oppress, and coerce the persons owning property in the city, and the council of the city and the members thereof acting in their official capacity, "maliciously, immorally, corruptly, wantonly, and fraudulently, unlawfully, and wickedly, conspire, combine, confederate, and agree together, with intent aforesaid" by coercion and intimidation to arbitrarily fix, establish, regulate, control, charge, and collect the premiums of insurance on all policies and contracts of insurance issued, and to be issued by the said insurance companies and all others who might attempt to do a fire insurance business in the city, and all their agents, on all property in the city, for the purpose of maintaining a wicked and exclusive monopoly of all the fire insurance business done in the city and state, and with like intent to stifle and destroy all competition in fire insurance in the city, and with like intent to arbitrarily charge, coerce, extort, and collect the non-competitive rates and premiums so arbitrarily fixed, and to prevent persons owning property in the city from procuring fire insurance at any other than the said established noncompetitive rates, and thereby coerce and intimidate said council and its members to repeal the said license tax on said fire insurance companies—all of which was charged to be the great damage of the city and state, the council and its members, and against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth.

The warrant further charged that, pursuant to said conspiracy, the parties had done the said acts complained of.

There are numerous assignments of error; but, in the view we take of the case, it will be unnecessary to consider any of them except the demurrer to the warrant.

That demurrer is in substance that the warrant does not charge a criminal offense.

It is conceded that there is no statute of this state prohibiting such a combination as that charged in the amended warrant, but the contention of counsel for the commonwealth is that the combination charged is a crime at common law.

No case is cited by the counsel for the commonwealth which holds that a combination of fire insurance companies and associations to fix, regulate, and control fire insurance rates is a criminal conspiracy at common law; but the claim is that the common law "is an expansive, elastic, progressive system, and its old principles are as effective to-day to prevent unlawful conspiracies to oppress the people in the exercise of their rights to enjoy the benefits of modern insurance as it is to protect the people to-day in their rights to enjoy wholesome food at reasonable prices."

It is true that the principles of the common law are elastic, and that one of its peculiar merits is that it adapts itself to the rights of parties under changed circumstances (Foster v. Commonwealth, 96 Va. at pages 309, 310, 31 S. E. 503, 42 L. R. A. 589, 70 Am. St. Rep. 846), but the difficulty is in ascertaining what are the principles or rules of the common law as to criminal conspiracies. The cases and text-writers are not agreed on the subject.

[1] The definition or description which seems to be more generally adopted is that a conspiracy must be a combination of two or more persons, by some concerted action, to accomplish some criminal or unlawful purpose, or to accomplish some purpose not in itself criminal or unlawful by criminal or unlawful means. See Jones' Case, 4 B. & A. 45; Pettibone v. U. S., 148 U. S. 197, 13 Sup. Ct. 542, 37 L. Ed. 419; Commonwealth v. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 111, 38 Am. Dec. 346; Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, etc., 23 Q. B. Div. p. 624; Wright on Cr. Conspiracy (Carson's Ed.) 48, 110-111, and authorities cited; 2 Wharton's Cr. Law, § 1337.

It is insisted that the object of the combination charged in the warrant was to create and maintain a monopoly in the fire insurance business in the city of Newport News, and that the creation of a monopoly in an article of necessity was a criminal offense at common law.

[2] It seems to be settled that there was no prohibition at common law against the creation of a monopoly by individuals. Chief Justice White in Standard Oil Company v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 52, 55, 31 Sup. Ct. 502, 512, 55 L. Ed. 619, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 834, says it is remarkable that nowhere at common law can there be found a prohibition against the creation of monopoly by an individual. "The frequent granting of monopolies [by the sovereign] and the struggle which led to a denial of the power to create them—that is to say, to the establishment that they were incompatible with the English constitution—is known to all and need not be reviewed. The evils which led to the public outcry against monopolies and to the final denial of the power to make them may be thus summarily stated: (1) The power which the monopoly gave to the one who enjoyed it to fix the price and thereby injure the public; (2) the power which it engendered of enabling a limitation on production; and (3) the danger of deterioration in quality of the monopolized article which it was deemed was the inevitable resultant of the monopolistic control over its production and sale. As monopoly as thus conceived embraced only a consequence arising from an exertion of sovereign power, no express restrictions or prohibitions obtained against the creation by an individual of a monopoly as such. But, as it was considered, at least so far as the necessities of life were concerned, that individuals by the abuse of their right to contract might be able to usurp the power arbitrarily to enhance prices, one of the wrongs arising from monopoly, it came to be that laws were passed relating to offenses such as forestalling, regrating, and engrossing by which prohibitions were placed upon the power of individuals to deal under such circumstances and conditions as, according to the conception of the times, created a presumption that the dealings were not simply the honest exertion of one's right to contract for his own benefit unaccompanied by a wrongful motive to injure others, but were the consequence of a contract or course of dealing of such a character as to give rise to the presumption of an intent to injure others through the means, for instance, of a monopolistic increase of prices. This is illustrated by the definition of engrossing found in the statute (5 and 6 Edw. VI, c. 14), as follows:

"Whatsoever person or persons . . . shall engross or get into his or their hands by buying, contracting, or promise-taking, other than by demise, grant, or lease of land, or tithe, any corn growing in the fields, or any other corn or grain, butter, cheese, fish, or other dead victual, whatsoever, within the realm of England, to the intent to sell the same again, shall be accepted, reputed and taken an unlawful engrosser or engrossers.'"

After showing the difference between monopoly and engrossing, and how they afterwards became to be regarded as one and the same thing because of the similarity of some of the evils which resulted from them, he says: "Generalizing these considerations, the situation is this: (1) That by the common law monopolies were unlawful because of their restrictions upon individual freedom of contract and their injury to the public. (2) That as to necessities of life the freedom of the individual to deal was restricted where the nature and character of the dealing was such as to engender the presumption of intent to bring about at least one of the injuries which it was deemed would result from monopoly; that is, an undue enhancement of price. (3) That to protect the freedom of contract of the individual not only in his own interest, but principally in the interest of the common weal, a contract of an individual by which he put an unreasonable restraint upon himself as to carrying on his trade or business was void. And that at common law the evils consequent upon engrossing, etc., caused those things to be treated as coming within monopoly and sometimes to be called monopoly, and the same considerations caused monopoly because of its operation and effect to be brought within and spoken of generally as impeding the due course of or being in restraint of trade."

From these quotations and the authorities cited in that case and others that might be cited, it appears, we think, that combinations in restraint of trade and called monopolies, though not technical monopolies as known to the common law, were combinations, so far as pertinent to this case among dealers in provisions or the "necessaries of life," or "articles of prime necessity," or of "merchandise" or "manufacture in the market."

[3] Insurance is not an article of merchandise or manufacture, or one of the "necessaries of life," or of prime necessity, within the letter or spirit of the laws against engrossing.

It was said in Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. Ed. 357, that: "Issuing a policy of insurance is not a transaction of commerce. The policies are simple contracts of indemnity against loss by fire entered into between the corporation and the assured for a consideration paid by the latter. The contracts are not articles of commerce in any proper meaning of the word. They are not subjects of trade and barter offered in the market as having an existence and value independent of the parties to them." Hooper v. California, 155 U. S. 648, 653, 15 Sup. Ct. 207, 39 L. Ed. 297.

[4] The most that can be said as to the combination to fix, regulate, and control the business of fire insurance in the city of Newport News is that it was an agreement in restraint of trade. But agreements merely in restraint of trade are not illegal in the sense that they are either indictable or actionable.

In Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 23 Q. B. Div. 619, Bowen, L. J., in commenting upon Hilton v. Eckersley, 6 El. & Bl. 47, said that "no action at common law will lie against any individual or individuals for entering into a contract merely because it is in restraint of trade," and in the same connection further said: "We are asked to hold the defendants' conference or association illegal as being in restraint of trade. The term 'illegal' here is a misleading one. Contracts, as they are called, in restraint of trade, are not in my opinion illegal in any sense, except that the law will not enforce them. It does not prohibit the making of such contracts. It merely declines, after they have been made, to recognize their validity. The law considers the disadvantage so imposed upon the contract a sufficient shelter to the public."

In the same case, Fry, L. J., said: "It is said that such an agreement is in restraint of trade, and therefore illegal. Be it so. But in what sense is the word 'illegal' used in such a proposition? In my opinion it means that the agreement is one upon which no action can be sustained, and no relief obtained at law or in equity; but it does not mean that the entering into the agreement is either indictable or actionable. The authorities on this point are, I think, with a single exception, uniform. * * * The language of all the judges in the cases of Hornby v. Close and Farrer v. Close is consonant with that of Lord Campbell and Erle, J., in Hilton v. Eckersley, and Crompton, J., is, I believe, the only judge who has ever hitherto held such contracts illegal as well as void."

In United States v. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co., 85 Fed. 279, 29 C. C. A. 148, 46 L. R. A. 122, Taft, J., said: "Contracts that were in unreasonable restraint of trade at common law were not unlawful in the sense of being criminal, or giving rise to a civil action for damages in favor of one prejudicially affected thereby, but were simply void, and were not enforced by the courts. Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, Gow & Co. (1892) App. Cas. 25; Hornby v. Close, L. R. 2 Q. B. 153; Lord Campbell, C. J., in Hilton v. Eckersley, 6 El. & Bl. 47, 66; Hannen, J., in Farrer v. Close, L. R. 4 Q. B. 602, 612."

In the case of Queen Ins. Co. v. Texas, 86 Tex. 250, 24 S. W. 397, 22 L. R. A. 483, in which that state attempted to dissolve a combination of insurance companies similar to that charged in the warrant in this case, one of the grounds urged by the Attorney General of the state was that "any article of general use and benefit to the public, which affords to the public convenience, comfort, enjoyment, and profit, ought to be protected as a 'prime necessity.' Insurance affords all these in this latter day of business progress, and has become an important factor in every business of the country and in the use and enjoyment of property and possessions and belongings." But the court refused to adopt that view, and held that such a combination was not illegal at common law; and in doing so said: "Insurance is a mere contract of indemnity against contingent loss. Though it is an important aid to commerce, it is not a business of commerce, or one in which the public have any direct right. No franchise is necessary for its prosecution, and no one has a right to demand of an underwriter that his property shall be insured at any rate. Any individual may execute a policy, and so any company incorporated for the purpose of insuring property may refuse to execute one, unless it be so bound by its charter. Forced insurance, for obvious reasons, is detrimental to the public interest, and it is therefore not probable that such restrictions will be found in any charter. Labor is necessary to production and transportation, and therefore it is not merely an aid, but a necessity, of commerce. It is advantageous to the public, and in that sense they have an interest in it. The services of professional men are likewise indispensable to most civilized communities, and are presumably likewise advantageous to the public. The public have an interest in them in the same sense in which they have an interest in the business of insurance. It follows, therefore, that if insurance companies are to be brought within the rule that makes agreements to increase the price of merchandise illegal, upon the ground that the public have an interest in their business, agreements among laborers and among professional men not to render their services below a stipulated rate should be held contrary to public policy and void upon the same ground. Combinations among workmen to increase or maintain their wages by unlawful means are unlawful. But are such combinations unlawful when the only means resorted to to accomplish their objects is a refusal on the part of the parties to the agreement to accept employment at a lower rate of wages than that designated in the contract? This is the next question for determination, and it is not without difficulty.

That court, after reviewing the course of decision in this country and England, reached the conclusion that a combination of laborers agreeing not to work except upon named conditions, no unlawful means being employed, is not a criminal conspiracy, and that neither were such contracts illegal or void on the ground of public policy; thus reaching the same conclusion upon that subject as did this court in the case of Everett Waddey Co. v. Richmond Typo. Union, 105 Va. 188, 53 S. E. 273, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 792.

In the latter case it was held that it was not unlawful for laborers to organize for their own protection and to further their own interests, and to persuade others to join them, provided they used no unlawful means in accomplishing those objects; citing a number of cases, among others the case of Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287, from which is quoted with approval the following language: "Every man has a right to determine what branch of business he will pursue, and to make his own contracts with whom he pleases and on the best terms he can. He may change from one occupation to another and pursue as many different occupations as he pleases, and competition in business is lawful. He may refuse to deal with any man or class of men; and it is no crime for any number of persons, without an unlawful object in view, to associate themselves together and agree that they will not work or deal with certain men or classes of men, or work under a certain price or without certain conditions. * * * Freedom is the policy of this country."

If it be lawful for laborers to combine to control the terms of their hiring and to induce others to unite with them for that purpose, it would seem to follow, in the absence of any statutory regulation upon the subject, that it is not unlawful for individuals or corporations engaged in the insurance business to agree upon the terms and conditions and rates upon which they are willing to insure, and to induce others engaged in the same business to unite with them in maintaining the terms and conditions and rates so fixed and agreed upon, provided they use no unlawful means in accomplishing their objects. See, also, generally, Cont. Ins. Co. v. Fire Underwriters (C. C.) 67 Fed. 310, and cases cited; McCauley v. Tierney, 19 R. I. 255, 33 Atl. 1, 37 L. R. A. 455, 61 Am. St. Rep. 770; Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis, 54 Minn. 223, 55 N. W. 1119, 21 L. R. A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319; State v. Van Pelt, 136 N. C. 633, 49 S. E. 177, 68 L. R. A. 760; Aetna Ins. Co. v. Com., 106 Ky. 864, 51 S. W. 624, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 503, 45 L. R. A. 360.

Having reached the conclusion that the agreement to fix, regulate, and control the rate of insurance in the city of Newport News was neither criminal nor unlawful, the next question is, Were the means by which that end was to be accomplished criminal or illegal?

[5] Where the object of an alleged conspiracy is not criminal or illegal and the illegality is in the means by which that object is to be effected, the means must be set forth, and must be such as to constitute an offense either at common law or by statute. 2 Whar. Cr. Law (9th Ed.) §§ 1358, 1367; Pettibone v. United States, 148 U. S. 197, 205, 13 Sup. Ct. 542, 37 L. Ed. 419; Wright on Cr. Cons. 197-199.

The warrant contains a great deal of strong assertion and the frequent use of the words, "fraudulently," "unlawfully," "maliciously," "coercion," "intimidation," and the like, but the facts averred do not show any element of fraud, coercion, or intimidation in the legal sense of those terms. 2 Whar. Cr. Law, §§ 1367, 1368.

[8, 7] It is no doubt true that some acts which would subject a party to a civil action without regard to the motive with which they are done are indictable when done maliciously, and it may also be true that a combination of persons instigated and moved by mere malice towards others as a means of doing them injury and for no benefit to the parties to the combination would be a criminal offense. But that is not this case. The warrant does not so charge, and it affirmatively appears from its allegations that the city of Newport News had levied a license tax upon insurance companies doing business in the city, and that such companies had subsequently raised their insurance rates. The facts charged in the warrant show that the insurance companies had just cause for raising their rates of insurance in the city, for they had the same right in fixing their rates of insurance to take into consideration the license taxes they were required to pay as any other item of expense attending their business. The question involved here is whether or not, where the combination is neither in end or means criminal or unlawful, except in the sense that courts will not enforce the agreement, the motives with which the parties to the agreement are moved, as charged in the warrant, will make it a criminal offense.

The general rule, as stated in Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) p. 1505, citing numerous cases, is that "malicious motives make a bad act worse, but they cannot make that a wrong which in its own essence is lawful. An act which does not amount to a legal injury cannot be actionable because done with a bad intent. Where one exercises a legal right only, the motive which actuates him is immaterial." Numerous cases are cited which sustain the text.

In Hunt v. Simonds, 19 Mo. 583, it was held that an action does not lie for a conspiracy to do a lawful act. Thus an action will not lie against the officers of insurance companies for combining to refuse to take insurance on a boat, however malicious their motive. In discussing the question involved in that case, the court said: "The damage to the plaintiff is alleged to have been produced by the refusal of the defendants to make contracts in the ordinary line of their business. It is obviously the right of every citizen to deal or to refuse to deal with any other citizen, and no person has ever thought himself entitled to complain in a court of justice of a refusal to deal with him except in some cases where, by reason of the public character which a party sustains, there rests upon him a legal obligation to deal and contract with others. * * * But such is not the obligation of underwriters. The business of insuring is but a game of hazard, and there are a great many elements entering into the calculations upon which it can be safely pursued."

Again it is said: "He had no right in law to demand insurance upon his boat from one or all of the defendants, nor that they should insure cargo on his boat, and consequently their refusal to insure from any motive, however improper, could give him no right to sue them."

In Orr v. Home Mut. Ins. Co., 12 La. Ann. 253, 68 Am. Dec. 770, it was held that a conspiracy by insurance companies that they would not insure any boat on which a certain person was employed, whereby such person was deprived of employment, did not furnish a ground of civil action, however malicious the motives of the insurance companies may have been. See Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis, 54 Minn. 223, 234, 55 N. W. 1119, 21 L. R. A. 337, 40 Am. St. Rep. 319; Bowen v. Mathe-son, 14 Allen (Mass.) 499.

Litigation would be endless if the motives of those who are simply doing what they have a legal right to do were made the subject of inquiry.

In Phelps v. Nowlen, 72 N. Y. 39, 45, 28 Am. Rep. 93, in which it was held that, where a man has a legal right, courts will not inquire into the motive by which he is actuated in enforcing the same, the court said: "A different rule would lead to the encouragement of litigation, and prevent in many instances complete and full enjoyment of the right of property which inheres to the owner of the soil. An idle threat to do what is perfectly lawful or declarations which assert the intentions of the owner might often be construed as evincing an improper motive and a malignant spirit, when in point of fact they merely stated the actual rights of the party. Malice might easily be inferred sometimes from idle and loose declarations, and a wide door be opened by such evidence to deprive an owner of what the law regards as well-defined rights."

And the evil consequences of such a practice would be much worse in cases of conspiracy where all are responsible within certain limitations for the acts and declarations of one of their number as to the motives which actuate him, when none of his associates may be moved by it or any other improper motive.

Dr. Wharton in his Criminal Law (9th Ed.), after stating in section 1337 that it is conceded on all sides that combinations of two or more persons may become indictable when directed to the accomplishment either of an illegal object or an indifferent object by illegal means, says the conflict in the cases begins when we reach those combinations which are assumed to be indictable, not as aimed at an indictable offense, but from the idea that the policy of the law forbids the reaching of the attempted object by a confederacy; and in section 1333 adds: "But to extend indictable conspiracies so as to include cases where acts not in themselves indictable are attempted by concert, involving neither false statement nor concerted force, should be resolutely opposed. A distressing uncertainty will oppress the law if the mere fact of concert in doing an indifferent act be held to make such act criminal. We all know what offenses are indictable, and, if we do not, the knowledge is readily obtained. Such offenses, when not defined by statute, are limited by definitions which long processes of judicial interpretation have hardened into shapes which are distinct, solid, notorious, and permanent. It is otherwise, however, when we come to speak of acts which, though not penal when they are committed by persons acting singly, are supposed to become so when brought about by concert which involves neither fraud nor force. * * * No man can know in advance whether any enterprise in which he may engage may not in this way become subject to prosecution. It is essential to the constitution of an indictable offense * * * that it should be prohibited either by statute or by common law; but conspiracies to commit by nonindictable means nonindictable offenses, if we resolve them into their elements, are neither prohibited by common law nor by statute. * * * An act of business enterprise in purchasing goods in a cheap market for the purpose of selling them in a dear market, which, in one phase of judicial sentiment, would be regarded as meritorious impetus to commercial activity, would be in another phase of judicial sentiment, as it once has been, treated as an indictable offense."

In reaching the conclusion that the amended warrant does not charge an indictable offense and that the demurrer to it should have been sustained, we do not wish to be understood as holding that the combination charged in this case may not be prejudicial to the public, and that a sound public policy may not require limiting or suppressing such combinations. But, as was said by the Court of Appeals of Texas in Queen Ins. Co. v. Texas, supra, in holding that a like combination was not a criminal offense at common law: "There are certain contracts and perhaps combinations which the law regards as being against public policy. The courts cannot extend the rule merely by reason of their opinion as to what the law ought to be. What other combinations or contracts should be held illegal on the ground of public policy is a political question—that is to say, one which it is the province of the legislative department of the government to determine. The Legislature has the power to weigh the public interest, even 'in golden scales,' and, if such combinations be found detrimental, they can denounce the evil and provide the remedy."

The judgment complained of will be reversed, and this court will enter such judgment as the trial court ought to have entered.

Reversed.

LANFORD v. VIRGINIA AIRLINE RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 25, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 548*)—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—RULING ON ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—WAIVER.

Where no bill of exceptions is taken to the admission of evidence over objection, the objection is considered as having been waived.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2433-2440; Dec. Dig. § 548.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 102*)—ACTION TO REQUIRE CONSTRUCTION OF CROSSING—EVIDENCE—TESTIMONY OF COMMISSIONERS.

In an action under Code 1904, § 1294b, cl. 2, by an owner across whose land a railroad ran, to require the construction of an underway crossing from one part of the land to another, evidence by the commissioners, appointed to assess the owner's damages at the time the road was constructed, as to whether they had considered the fact that the owner would be deprived of a surface crossing by reason of a fill, was admissible to explain the report.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 306-314; Dec. Dig. § 102.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 102*)—ACTION TO REQUIRE CONSTRUCTION OF CROSSING—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTORY PROVISION.

Code 1904, § 1294b, cl. 2, which requires every railroad passing through the lands of any person to provide a suitable "wagonway across" its road, to be constructed on the written request of the owner to an officer or agent of the company, at a point designated by the owner, and that, if the company refuse to construct such way, the owner may appeal to the circuit court for the appointment of commissioners to determine whether the wagonway should be constructed, their report to be confirmed, "unless good cause is shown against it by the company," considered with section 1294b, cl. 3, which in dealing with the crossing of one railroad by another uses only the word "crossing," and section 1294d, cl. 38, which, as to crossings of other railroads and of county roads, declares it the policy of the state to abolish grade crossings, does not give the owner the arbitrary right to an underway wagon road, but must be given a reasonable construction with reference to the convenience of both parties, and the cost to be incurred by the railroad in constructing the crossing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 306-314; Dec. Dig. § 102.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 102*)—CONSTRUCTION OF PRIVATE CROSSINGS—APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONERS—EFFECT OF REPORT—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Under Code 1904, § 1294b, cl. 2, making it the duty of every railroad passing through land of any person to provide a suitable wagonway across its road from one part of the land to another, and providing for the appointment of commissioners on the owner's application to determine whether the wagonway asked for should be constructed, the report of such commissioners locating a crossing and prescribing its character makes a prima facie case against the railroad, and imposes upon it the burden of showing good cause against the construction of such crossing, but the report is in no manner conclusive; the whole question being up for decision by the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 306-314; Dec. Dig. § 102.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1032*) — PRESUMPTIONS—BURDEN OF SHOWING ERROR.

A landowner who makes application under Code 1904, § 1294b, cl. 2, to have a railroad running through his farm construct an under-way wagon crossing, as to which the lower court has held that good cause was not shown by the report of the commissioners determining that a way was necessary and dismissed the application, the burden is upon him on appeal to satisfy the Supreme Court of Appeals that there was prejudicial error in the decree dismissing the application.

Error to Circuit Court, Fluvanna County.

Application by J. W. Lanford against the Virginia Airline Railway Company to compel the defendant to construct a crossing under its road. Application dismissed, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Pembroke Pettit and J. O. Shepherd, for plaintiff in error. C. W. Allen, L. O. Haden, and Harmon & Walsh, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. J. W. Lanford, with the view of availing himself of the benefits of section 1294b, cl. 2, of the Code of 1904, filed his petition with the circuit court of Fluvanna county, demanding of the Virginia Airline Railway Company the construction of an underway crossing for a wagon road from the uplands to the lowlands of his farm at a designated point on the defendant's railroad line where it passes through plaintiff's farm, and where the railroad bed is constructed with a very high fill.

Pursuant to the statute, the circuit court appointed three commissioners who returned a report, signed by only two of them (although the three considered the matter together), favorable to the plaintiff, and to the report the defendant company filed exceptions, which were sustained, whereupon the two commissioners were, over the objection of the defendant, allowed to amend their report. At a later term of the court, the cause came on for final hearing upon the amended report of the commissioners, the evidence introduced by the plaintiff as well as that introduced by the defendant, and the argument of counsel for both parties; thereupon the court adjudged that good cause had been shown why neither of the reports made by the two commissioners in favor of the plaintiff should be confirmed, and that the plaintiff's application be dismissed, with costs to the defendant. This judgment we are asked to review and reverse.

The statute, supra, so far as relevant to the issue, is as follows:

"It shall be the duty of every railroad * * * corporation, whose road * * * passes through the lands of any person in this state, to provide proper and suitable wagon ways across said road * * * from one part of said land to the other, and to keep such ways in good repair. Such ways shall be constructed on the request of the landowner, in writing, made to any section master, agent, or employé of such company, having charge and supervision of the railroad * * * at that point, and shall designate the points at which the wagon ways are desired. * * * If the company fail or refuse for ten days after such request to construct wagon ways of a convenient and proper character at the places designated, then the owner, having given ten days' notice in writing, as aforesaid, may apply to the circuit court of the county * * * wherein the said land is located for the appointment of three disinterested persons whose lands do not abut on the said railroad * * * who shall constitute a board of commissioners, whose duty it shall be to go upon the land and determine whether the wagon ways asked for should be constructed. Their decision shall be in writing, and, if favorable to the landowner, it shall set forth the points at which the wagon ways should be constructed, giving also a description of what should be done by the company to make a suitable and convenient way. The decision of the commissioners shall be returned to and filed in the clerk's office of such court, and when called up at the next or any succeeding term of said court, it shall be affirmed, unless good cause is shown against it by the company, either party to have the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeals from the judgment of the said court."

The report of the commissioners in this case recommended that the defendant railway be required to construct, at the point designated by the plaintiff, an underway "wagonway twelve feet wide and not less than twelve feet high from subgrade, and it shall preserve intact the original grade of the said wagonway or road." The earth fill through which this underway crossing was to be constructed is about 18 feet high and about 82 feet wide, and the wagonway was to be an open trestle or an arch subway in the discretion of the railway company.

Plaintiff in error's farm is situated on the Rivanna river, in Fluvanna county, and contains approximately 200 acres, of which about 30 acres is fertile and productive bottom land, and upon the residue of the farm—the highland—his dwelling, barn, and other buildings are located. On the upper or western side of the farm a high and precipitous bluff projects from the table land sheer to the water's edge of the river at low water, circling back from the water's edge and southward upstream or towards the west, almost perpendicular and following the winding of the stream, but not receding very far from the banks. Downstream, or eastward, however, the bluff breaks more abruptly southward, and, circling somewhat eastward, leaves the above-mentioned piece of low-grounds or bottom land about one-third as wide as it is long, extending all the way to the entire distance of plaintiff in error's farm to the eastern boundary line between him and one C. E. Jones; and this bluffy formation, extending all the way to his eastern boundary, divides his low grounds from his highland, the bluff standing most of the way at an angle of about 45 degrees. There are, however, three depressions in the bluff, the first being not far from where the bluff projects into the river, called "depression No. 1"; the second about midway plaintiff in error's low grounds, called "depression No. 2"; and the other over on Jones' land not far from the division line, called "depression No. 3." That plaintiff in error may have defendant in error to construct and maintain a wagonway through the fill in depression No. 2, so that he can have the use of the road leading from his highland to the low grounds which he in the main formerly used, is the subject-matter of this controversy.

It appears that, when it went about the acquisition of a right of way through plaintiff in error's farm, defendant in error complied with the statute—section 1105f (4), c. 46b, Code—with respect to the filing in the clerk's office of Fluvanna county of maps and profiles showing the cuts and fills, etc., in the proposed construction of its roadbed through the farm of the plaintiff in error, and which showed that the right of way desired was along the entire length of the bluff separating the highland from the low grounds, and that the roadbed was to be constructed by fills and cuts, and not by trestling. Moreover, when the five commissioners appointed in the condemnation proceedings to assess and report the damages to be paid by defendant in error for the right of way through plaintiff in error's farm were upon the farm viewing the route of the proposed roadbed, etc., plaintiff in error had his attention called to the fact, both by the commissioners and defendant in error's engineer in charge of the construction of its roadbed through plaintiff in error's farm, that the roadbed was to cross depression No. 2 over a fill, and not over a trestle or arch, which of necessity would put an end to the use of this depression for a wagonway.

Clauses 6-8, § 1105f, of the Code, supra, provide that the commissioners condemning land "shall ascertain what will be a just compensation for said property and land • • • and assess the damages, if any, to the adjacent or other property of such tenant or owner * * * beyond the peculiar benefits which will accrue to such properties respectively from the construction and operation of the company's works."

It is quite clear that the commissioners for condemnation are required by the sections of the Code just referred to, to take into consideration all damages incident to the construction of a railroad as designed, according to the maps and profiles filed in the clerk's office as required by statute, and in this case there is no ground for the contention of plaintiff in error that the commissioners disregarded the requirement of the statute when assessing his damages in the condemnation proceedings; on the contrary, four of the commissioners have testified in this case to the effect that they did regard the requirements of the statute, that they knew that the profile called for a fill across depression No. 2, that the damages assessed to plaintiff in error ($600) would not have been as great but for the closing up of the road formerly used by plaintiff in error through depression No. 2, that the increase of the damages beyond what they would have allowed was because they knew that the road through depression No. 2 would be stopped up, that, while they considered that the railroad was bound to give plaintiff in error another road, he could not get another such road as the one to be stopped by the fill. "He would have to go right much farther to get a road, farther to haul, and that he could have got about as short a road to haul over, but more grade."

One of these commissioners (Dr. Boston), when asked to state the nature of any conversation had between the commissioners and Lanford (plaintiff in error) before they brought in their final report, said: "I had been talking with Mr. Lanford a good deal about the matter, and I suggested to him that, as the question of that road was involved in that decision, I thought we ought to make report setting forth that, if the road was stopped, the commissioners awarded so much damages, or, if it was not interfered with, that we would allow him so much damages. Before we concluded our report, I sent for Mr. Lanford, and asked him and he said he would consult his lawyer. He went out and came back and said something about just go on, and I took it for granted that we had given him big damages because of the stopping up of the road. I think that was the view of all the commissioners."

The other commissioner, H. P. Kent, refused to sign the report assessing damages to plaintiff in error at $600, and, testifying for him in this case, in effect corroborates the other commissioners in the statement that in considering the damages to be allowed for the railroad's right of way it was understood that the roadbed was to be constructed across depression No. 2 by a fill, thereby discontinuing the road that plaintiff in error had been using as a farm road mainly; but while he gave his reasons for not signing the report returned by the commissioners, and says that without reference to the crossing he was in favor of fixing the amount of damages at $1,000, he does not undertake to explain why the amount he favored was greater than the amount favored by any of the other commissioners; and, when asked if there was any other practicable way than this depression (No. 2) for a road to the low grounds, he answered: "I don't think there is any point on his place that he could build a road that would compare with that." Here the witness corroborates the statement made by the other commissioners to the effect that the discontinuance of the farm road in question and the consequent inconveniences, etc., to which plaintiff in error would be put were matters taken into consideration by the commissioners in fixing the amount of damages allowed him.

The report of the commissioners was returned to court, confirmed without objection, and plaintiff in error was paid the amount of damages ($800) assessed to him.

[1, 2] Objection was made by plaintiff in error to the admission in this proceeding of the testimony of the four commissioners adverted to above, but no bill of exceptions has been taken to the ruling of the court admitting it, and therefore the objection has to be considered as waived. N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Shott, 92 Va. 34, 22 S. E. 811; Same v. Ampey, 93 Va. 108, 25 S. E. 226. If such were not the case, this evidence was admitted for the purpose only of explaining and making clear the report of the commissioners, and for that ruling authority is abundant.

[3] It is manifest that in the beginning and throughout this whole controversy he has proceeded upon the erroneous theory that the statute gives him the arbitrary right to demand and have of the defendant in error, not only an underway wagon road crossing from one part of his farm to the other, but at the point he designates, and without regard to the costs thereby imposed upon the defendant in error, or whether the inconvenience and expense to him in having to take and use a grade crossing of the railroad's right of way at another point on his farm would be much or little.

The statute admits of no such construction, even if it were clear that it contemplates that a railway company can be required to construct an underway crossing to give access from one part of a farm to another where a farm is divided by the roadbed constructed through it. It is very clear that the statute contemplates that the way is to be constructed readily and quickly. It does not, as plaintiff in error contends, merely provide that the railway company, when the landowner requests a farm crossing, shall within 10 days agree to construct it, but provides: "If the company fail or refuse for ten days after such request, to construct wagonways of a convenient and proper character, at the places designated then the owner may" institute legal proceedings to require the company to construct such ways as he has designated. The statute does not impose upon a railway company the duty to "provide a crossing," but to provide proper and suitable "wagonways across" the railroad right of way, and the words "wagonways across" appear significant, especially so when the statute is read along with clause 3 of section 1294b, ch. 54a, of the Code, which latter section deals with the crossing of one railroad by another, and uses the word "crossing" only, and that section has been construed by this court to require no more than a surface crossing. N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Tidewater Ry. Co., 105 Va. 129, 52 S. E. 852. When in the same act (section 1294d, cl. 38) the Legislature declared the policy of the state to be that crossings shall be either over or under existing structures, no mention is made of private crossings, nor any language used to indicate that they were to be considered as subject to this policy.

That section is: "It is hereby declared to be the policy of this state that all crossings of one railroad by another, or of a county road or highway by a railroad, or of a railroad by a county road or highway, shall, whenever reasonably practicable pass above or below the existing structure."

Construing section 1294b, cl. 3, supra, in the light of the declared policy of the state just quoted, this court held that the statute did not necessarily require an overhead viaduct by one railroad in crossing another, where the expense would be excessive.

In this case the report of the two commissioners, which the circuit court refused to confirm, required that defendant in error excavate an opening through its roadbed, build two walls 18 feet high, 20 feet wide at the top, and 82 feet wide at the bottom, then fill back behind the walls and bridge across the opening, or else construct concrete or granite walls, arched over, through this opening, of 12 feet wide and of height sufficient to give a clearance of at least 12 feet, which reconstruction of the defendant in error's roadbed at that point, a work of months, would, according to evidence in the record practically uncontradicted, impose upon defendant in error an expense of from $3,800 to $4,000, to say nothing of the possible increase of danger or inconvenience resulting from the reconstruction of its road bed or the change of its character at that point.

W. H. Talley, a civil engineer, testifying for plaintiff in error, does say that he made an estimate of the cost of the construction of the under-crossing required by the commissioners' report, and ascertained that it would be less than the witnesses for defendant in error estimated it; but, besides admitting that he was inexperienced in the work of constructing a railroad, he produced no figures showing how he arrived at his estimate of the cost, and refused to do so.

It is earnestly argued for plaintiff in error that, with his road through depression No. 2 stopped up, he is practically denied access to and from his low grounds, but we are unable to take that view of the evidence in the record. The witnesses for defendant in error testify with unanimity that a surface crossing of the railway is practicable at another point on plaintiff in error's farm, and where he has had a road which he had from time to time used. His own witness, Talley, while saying that the route up the middle depression (No. 2) is the most practicable and convenient route, etc., admits that it is not the only practicable route, and that, while a certain other route would be longer, the grade of the road would be not greater than many of the county roads of Fluvanna, and less than some of them. In fact, only in the argument of counsel and the statements of plaintiff in error himself is it asserted that it is not practicable for him to have a crossing of the railway over which to reach his low grounds, except by the route through depression No. 2. True, to have to use another route than that usually used by him before the railway through his farm was constructed would be attended with inconvenience and some expense in constructing partly another road, and perhaps a bridge across a usually dry ditch, but this inconvenience and expense would not amount to a burden comparable to that he demands shall be borne by defendant in error in order that he may avoid such inconvenience and expense. It is also true that plaintiff in error, when told that the plans for the construction of the railroad bed through his farm called for a fill in depression No. 2, said, and thereafter repeated, "I want my crossing," gave notice to the defendant in error to that effect, and gave notice to it that he would apply for an injunction to prevent the stopping up of his road, but although defendant in error agreed to and did suspend its work at depression No. 2 for a reasonable time, and waited ten days for the injunction bill to be filed, none was filed, whereupon the work of filling across depression No. 2 was resumed, and plaintiff in error admits that he made no further objection to the work going on, having decided "to take other proceedings."

Having received, without objection to the confirmation of the report in the condemnation proceedings, the $600 the report allowed him, and declining to contest the legal right of defendant in error to proceed with the construction of its roadbed and works on his farm, according to the maps and profiles by which the commissioners were guided in assessing the damages resulting therefrom to him, plaintiff in error assumes the attitude of demanding of defendant in error that it reconstruct its roadbed across depression No. 2 so as to provide for him an underway crossing of a wagon road, and at a cost to defendant in error amounting to three times the admitted assessed valuation of his whole farm for taxation, including buildings, etc., thereon, and to two-thirds of the value thereof put upon it by himself when offering the property for sale before the railroad was constructed.

While the statute imposes upon a railroad company whose line of road passes through the lands of any person in this state the duty to provide proper and suitable wagonways across its roadbed from one part of said land to the other, and to keep such ways in good repair, the statute has to receive a reasonable construction, so as to make the remedy commensurate with the right of the landowner and the mischief intended to be redressed. Adams v. Tidewater R. Co., 107 Va. 798, 60 S. E. 129.

According to the evidence in this case, there is an established grade crossing but a short distance southeast of the crossing plaintiff in error is now contending for, which crossing he can reach by a reasonably convenient route which he has sometimes heretofore used, yet he has selected a point for his farm crossing where the cost to defendant in error in its construction would approximate $4,000, while the land to be reached, at his own estimate, is not worth more than $2,500, and his whole farm, buildings included, is valued for taxation at the sum of $1,341.

It further appears that if defendant in error were required to reconstruct its roadbed across depression No. 2, so as to give plaintiff in error a wagonway up that depression, it would not be a saving to him of more than four or five days of extra work in harvesting his crop on the bottom lands, as that land is only cultivated in corn, and, before the construction of the railway through his farm, the wagonway up depression No. 2 was not used more than from seven to ten days during the year.

Clearly a reasonable construction of the statute imposes upon the party having the right to select his crossing of a railroad right of way the duty to be reasonable, and regard must be had to the convenience of both parties and the cost to be incurred by the party required to construct the crossing.

In N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Tidewater R. Co., 105 Va. 129, 52 S. E. 852, the appellant sought to compel the appellee, in the construction of its line of railroad across appellant's line at a given point, to cross overhead or underground and not at grade, and the opinion by Buchanan, J., says: "It was earnestly insisted by counsel for appellant * * * that the corporation commission, in allowing a grade crossing to be made, had not given due consideration to the declared policy of the state in favor of overhead or underground crossings. Clause 38, § 1294d, Code of 1904. The change of the policy of the state from grade to overhead or underground crossings both as to highways and railroads is an eminently wise one, and should be given full effect 'wherever,' in the language of the statute, 'it is reasonably practicable and does not involve an unreasonable expense, all the circumstances of the case considered.' But to require the establishment of an overhead or underground crossing where it is not reasonably practicable and would involve an unreasonable expense, all the circumstances of the case considered, would be as much against the policy of the state as to permit a grade crossing where those difficulties are not shown to exist. In reaching our conclusion in this case, we have not been unmindful of the provisions of that statute."

[4] The learned counsel for plaintiff in error in this case argue that while the court has a certain kind of review of the action of the commissioners, it may hear evidence, but it does not hear evidence for the purpose of substituting its judgment for theirs, as the statutes have practically said that "the judgment of the commissioners is better than the judgment of the court in such a matter."

We do not so construe the statute under which this proceeding is had. In none of the cases relied on as supporting the contention has the court in effect said more than that the report of the commissioners makes a prima facie case, and, if nothing irregular appears on its face, great weight should be given to the judgment of the commissioners; so that while the report of the commissioners in this case, locating the crossing and prescribing its character, made a prima facie case, and imposed upon the defendant in error the burden of showing good cause against it, as is not denied, the statute by express terms makes the trial court the final arbiter of the propriety of directing the crossing to be constructed. Adams v. Tidewater R. Co., supra. It would have been a vain thing for the Legislature to have made by its enactment the trial court the final arbiter in such a case, and so worded the statute that it would have been susceptible of the construction that the court is limited to the power only of determining matters which do not go to the question whether or not good cause has been shown against the confirmation of the commissioners' report.

[8] In this case the trial court heard the witnesses testify, examined the maps and profiles of the defendant in error exhibited at the hearing and which were relevant to the issue to be determined, and its order complained of sets forth, in the language of the statute, that good cause had been shown why the reports of the commissioners should not be confirmed.

"The burden is upon the appellant to satisfy this court that there was error to his prejudice in the decree or judgment, and, failing in this, the decree or judgment will be affirmed." Johnson v. Michaux, 110 Va. 595, 66 S. E. 823.

We are of opinion that the judgment complained of here is without error, and therefore it is affirmed.

Affirmed.

CITY OF RADFORD v. CLARK

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 25, 1912.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 745½*)—EXERCISE OF CORPORATE POWERS—TORTS—GROUNDS OF LIABILITY.

To render a municipal corporation liable for the torts of its agents and employes, the injury must have resulted from an act done in the exercise of some power conferred on the municipality by its charter, or other positive enactment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1568, 1569; Dec. Dig. § 745½.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 733*)—STREETS—CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR—OPERATION OF QUARRY.

A municipal corporation, unless expressly authorized by charter or general law, or unless such power is to be fairly implied as incidental to powers expressly granted, has no authority to operate a quarry either within or without its corporate limits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1547-1549; Dec. Dig. § 733.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 733*)—STREETS—LIABILITY FOR INJURIES FROM USE—AUTHORITY TO OPERATE QUARRY.

The right to operate a quarry inside the city limits is neither necessary, fairly implied in, nor incidental to the duty of a city to keep its streets in a reasonably safe condition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1547-1549; Dec. Dig. § 733.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 733*)—TORTS—LIABILITY—UNAUTHORIZED MAINTENANCE OF QUARRY.

A municipal corporation is not liable to one whose horse, while driven on a street, was frightened by a quarry blast and ran away and threw him out, where the city's operation of the quarry causing the fright was unauthorized.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1547-1549; Dec. Dig. § 733.*]

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 786*)—STREETS—DEFECT—NOISES.

Noises outside of the limits of a street, amounting to a public nuisance, do not constitute a defect in the street.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1638-1640; Dec. Dig. § 786.*]

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 786*)—TORTS—PUBLIC NUISANCE—LIABILITY.

A municipal corporation is not liable for injuries caused to persons or property by failing to suppress a public nuisance within its limits, when such nuisance is not created nor maintained by the express authority of the city, and is not the result of any act done or neglected in the performance of a duty imposed upon the municipality by law, such as the repair of streets, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1552; Dec. Dig. § 736.*]

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 733*)—GOVERNMENTAL DUTY—FAILURE TO PREVENT NUISANCE—LIABILITY.

The operation or control of a rock quarry in which blasting is carried on within 65 feet or more from the street upon which a traveler is injured by the fright of a horse from the blasting was not a positive or ministerial duty, but a governmental duty, for which the city is not liable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1547-1549; Dec. Dig. § 733.*]

8. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 736*)—TORTS—PUBLIC NUISANCE—LIABILITY.

Where a city, without authority, operates a quarry 65 feet or more from the public street, so as to make it a nuisance, it is not liable for not preventing the nuisance; it not being connected in any way with the construction or use of the street.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1552; Dec. Dig. § 736.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1175*)—REVERSAL—RENDERING FINAL JUDGMENT.

Where the Supreme Court of Appeals is of the opinion, in a personal injury case, that the demurrer to the declaration should have been sustained, it will, in view of the presumption that the plaintiff made the strongest presentation of his case which the facts permitted, and that it could not be strengthened by amendment, enter such judgment as the court below should have rendered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4573-4587; Dec. Dig. § 1175.*]

Whittle, J., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Montgomery County.

Action by Mrs. Mollie P. Clark against the City of Radford. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Harless & Colhoun and H. C. Tyler, for plaintiff in error. Longley & Jordan, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. The declaration in this action, brought by Mrs. Mollie P. Clark against the city of Radford, consists of five counts, which, after setting out that the defendant is a municipal corporation chartered by the Legislature of Virginia, and charged with the duty of keeping its streets in a reasonably safe condition for use of the public, alleges that said defendant city was on the ——— day of September, 1909, through its servants and agents, blasting with powder and other explosive material in, and getting out rock for use on its streets from, a rock quarry, at a distance of 65 feet from a street of the city known as Grove avenue, and that, while the city was so engaged in blasting on the date named, the plaintiff was driving along said street and within 75 feet of the point of the blasting, and without knowledge thereof on her part, when a succession of blasts were set off, frightening her horse, causing it to become unmanageable and suddenly to wheel around in the street, throwing plaintiff violently upon the ground, whereby she was seriously injured, and her buggy and harness destroyed.

The neglect of the city to perform its duty of keeping its streets, and particularly Grove avenue, in reasonably safe condition for the use of travelers thereon, is alleged in the five counts in plaintiff's declaration as follows: The first count charges a failure to give warning of its intention to put off the blasts; the second charges a failure on the part of the city to cover its blasts; the third charges the employment by the city of unskillful, careless, and negligent servants; the fourth merely alleges damages to the buggy and harness; and the fifth combines the negligence alleged in the first, second, and third counts, and practically charges negligence on the part of the city in maintaining or failing to prevent a nuisance, resulting in injury to the plaintiff.

The defendant city demurred in writing to the declaration and each count thereof, which demurrer was by the court overruled, whereupon the plea of not guilty was entered and issue joined; and at a subsequent term of the court a trial by jury was had, resulting in a verdict and judgment against the city for $500 damages in favor of the plaintiff with interest and costs, to which judgment this writ of error was awarded.

Of the eight assignments of error, we find it necessary to consider only the first, which is to the ruling of the court upon the demurrer to the declaration.

[1] "In order to render a municipal corporation liable in damages for the torts of its agents and employes, it is necessary, among other things, that the injury complained of be caused by, or result from, an act done in the exercise of some power conferred upon it by its charter or other positive enactment." Duncan v. City of Lynchburg, 34 S. E. 964, 48 L. R. A. 331; Donable's Adm'r v. Town of Harrisonburg, 104 Va. 533, 52 S. E. 174, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 910, 113 Am. St. Rep. 1056, and authorities cited in those cases.

In the first of the cases just cited the opinion by Buchanan, J., defines what powers, under the settled law, a municipal corporation can exercise and none other, and it was there held that the city of Lynchburg, either under its charter provisions or the general law relating to such corporations, had no power or authority to create and maintain a nuisance resulting from the operation of a rock quarry outside of the city's limits, although the rock quarried was for use in the construction and maintenance of roads which the city was authorized to construct and maintain, the nuisance complained of having been created and continued by the agents or employes of the city while engaged in a work which was without its corporate powers.

In Donable v. Harrisonburg, supra, the injury sued for resulted from the operation of a rock quarry outside of the corporate limits of the town, the stone gotten out to be for use upon the streets of the town, but it was there also held that there could be no recovery for the injury, because the operation of the rock quarry was ultra vires, for the reasons (1) that neither the charter nor the general law gave the town authority to operate a rock quarry; and (2) because the operation of the quarry was carried on outside of the corporate limits.

[2] It has been repeated in the authorities that it might be convenient and even profitable for a municipal corporation, in order to perform certain duties imposed upon it as such corporation to own and operate a rock quarry or other like undertakings, yet it has no power to do so unless in express words conferred in its charter or necessarily or fairly implied in or incidental to the powers expressly granted.

[3, 4] In this case, as in Duncan v. Lynchburg, and Donable v. Harrisonburg, supra, to operate a rock quarry was neither necessary to, fairly implied in, nor incident to, the duty of the city of keeping its streets in a reasonably safe condition, nor essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation. We fail to see how a different rule of law is to be applied where the injury sued for resulted from an unauthorized act of a municipality, done within its corporate limits, from that applied by this and other courts, as well as sanctioned by the ablest law writers, to cases in which the tort was committed outside of the corporate limits, for the tort committed either in the one or the other case flows from an ultra vires act.

Neither the charter of plaintiff in error, city of Radford, nor the general laws of the state, authorize the operation, either within or without its corporate limits, of a rock quarry.

It is contended for defendant in error that, although there is no allegation or complaint made in her declaration that the street on which she received her injuries was unsafe by any defect therein, she is nevertheless entitled to recover for her injuries because the street was made unsafe by the operation of the rock quarry located 65 feet therefrom.

[5] The authorities very generally hold that noises outside of the limits of the highway, amounting to a public nuisance, are not a defect in the highway.

The allegation was made in the case of Lincoln v. City of Boston, 148 Mass. 578, 20 N. E. 329, 3 L. R. A. 257, 12 Am. St. Rep. 601, that on the day of the accident to the plaintiff cannon were fired in Boston Common, near Charles street, which rendered said street on which plaintiff was driving unsafe, and was a public nuisance, that the Common was owned and controlled by the city, upon which, by the mayor acting as its agent, the firing of the cannon was licensed; but the opinion of the court sustaining the demurrer to the declaration said: "Annoying and even dangerous as such firing may be, an adjoining householder could not maintain an action against the city, and the plaintiff stands no better than an adjoining owner would."

To the same effect is the opinion of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in Hubbell v. City of Viroqua, 67 Wis. 343, 30 N. W. 847, 58 Am. Rep. 868, where the action was to recover damages for an injury received while passing along one of the streets of the city, caused by a ball of a gun fired from within a shooting gallery adjoining the sidewalk, but not within the boundaries of the street or sidewalk; the declaration charging that the operating of the shooting gallery, which was licensed by the city, was an obstruction to the free and safe travel of the public on and along a street. In the opinion of the court holding the city not liable, it is said: "The shooting gallery was neither in the street, nor within the boundaries of the sidewalk, but outside of the same, upon private property, and no more obstructed the sidewalk than any other building adjoining such walk."

[6] In the case just cited, as in the case before us, the contention was made that the city was liable because it knowingly permitted a public nuisance to exist in the city adjacent to a public street, which endangered persons traveling upon the street; but with respect to this contention the court's opinion says: "An action will not lie against a municipal corporation for not suppressing a public nuisance within the municipality when such nuisance is not created nor maintained by the expressed authority of the municipality, and when such public nuisance is not the result of some act done, or neglected to be done, in the performance of a duty imposed upon the municipality by law, such as repair of streets, constructing sewers, water, or other public works, the municipal corporation is not liable for injuries caused to persons or property of the citizen by the criminal acts of individuals, unless made liable by statute."

[7] The further contention of the learned counsel in this case that plaintiff in error is liable "for maintaining and not preventing a nuisance," resulting in injury to plaintiff, is equally without merit. Leaving out of view the fact that there is no allegation in the declaration, or in any count thereof, that plaintiff in error had knowledge, actual or constructive, of the unsafe condition of its streets, the operation or control of a rock quarry and blasting therein situated 65 feet or more from the street upon which defendant in error received her injuries was not a positive or ministerial duty, but a governmental, legislative, and discretionary duty for which the city (plaintiff in error) cannot be held liable. Jones v. Williamsburg, 97 Va. 722, 34 S. E. 883, 47 L. R. A. 294, and authorities cited.

[8] Conceding that the operation of the rock quarry complained of in this case was a nuisance, plaintiff in error created it without power or authority conferred upon it by its charter or other positive enactment, and it follows that it could not be held liable for not preventing the nuisance, since the alleged nuisance (the rock quarry) was 65 feet or more from the street, and not connected in any way with the physical construction of the street.

An examination of the cases cited for defendant in error discloses that they all practically deal with the question of a nuisance per se, such as the obstruction of the street itself by the erection of objects therein, as in City of Richmond v. Smith, 101 Va. 161, 43 S. E. 345; and in like cases, or the carrying on of a dangerous business that no amount of care, reasonable foresight, or prudence could have safeguarded against, as were the facts appearing in Wilson v. Phoenix Power Co., 40 W. Va. 413, 21 S. E. 1035, 52 Am. St. Rep. 890. Neither those cases nor the line of cases to which they respectively belong apply to the facts alleged in the declaration in this case.

The authorities cited above hold (1) that a city is not liable for its failure to pass ordinances prohibiting bicycle riding upon sidewalks, or coasting upon its streets (Jones v. Williamsburg, supra), or (2) the firing of cannon near a street, or (3) the firing of a gun in a shooting gallery licensed by the city to operate adjacent to and outside of a street, resulting in injury to a traveler upon the street; and it follows, necessarily, that a city cannot be held liable for its failure to pass an ordinance to prevent or safeguard the firing of blasts in a rock quarry 65 feet or more from its streets and upon private property. See, also, Farrell v. Inhabitants, etc., 69 Me. 72, and cases cited.

[9] For these reasons, we are of opinion that the demurrer to the declaration and each count thereof should have been sustained, and in view of the fact that it is to be presumed that defendant in error has made the strongest presentation of her case which the facts permit, and that it could not be bettered if leave were given to amend, this court, entering such judgment as the circuit court ought to have rendered, will sustain the demurrer and enter a final judgment for plaintiff in error.

Reversed.

WHITTLE, J. (dissenting). The following material facts are set out in the declaration: While the defendant in error, Mrs.

Mollie P. Clark, was driving in her buggy along one of the streets of Radford, the employees of the city, without notice or warning of any kind, set off three uncovered blasts in a rock quarry operated by the city for the purpose of obtaining material with which to repair the streets. The quarry was situated inside the corporate limits and within 65 feet of the street, and was 75 feet from the point of accident. The noise from the explosions, together with the falling rocks in the street and upon the vehicle, frightened the horse and caused it suddenly to turn and run away, overturning the buggy and inflicting upon the plaintiff the injuries of which she complains.

These allegations were proved at the trial, and thereupon the jury awarded the plaintiff $500 damages.

Upon the theory that the act of the city in thus operating the rock quarry was an ultra vires act, for which the municipality could not be held liable in damages, this court reversed the judgment of the trial court, and sustained the demurrer to the declaration.

In the two Virginia cases (Duncan v. City of Lynchburg, 34 S. E. 964, 48 L. R. A. 331, and Donable v. Harrisonburg, 104 Va. 533, 52 S. E. 174, 2 L. R. A. [N. S.] 910, 113 Am. St. Rep. 1056) relied on, in part, to sustain this ruling, the rock quarries in question were both located outside the city limits, which fact seems to have exercised considerable influence with the court.

The charter of Radford and the general law impose upon the city the imperative duty of keeping its streets in reasonable repair; and I should be loath to hold that such grant of power and imposition of responsibility does not carry with it as a necessary and fairly to be implied incident the power to take rock and other needful material from its contiguous property to enable the city to discharge that duty. It is matter of common knowledge that cities and towns throughout the country resort to such sources of supply in opening, grading, and repairing streets, and to deny them that privilege would in many instances occasion intolerable inconvenience and expense.

But I think the action is maintainable on another ground. The conceded duty which rests upon all municipalities to keep their streets in reasonably safe condition would be but half discharged were they permitted to suffer dangerous operations to be so negligently conducted in the immediate vicinity of such streets as to jeopardize the safety of the traveling public along the same. Such works as imperil human life and safety are classified as public nuisances. And in City of Richmond v. Smith, 101 Va. 161, 43 S. E. 345, it was held: "If a city, without legislative authority, authorizes the erection of a nuisance in one of its streets, it is liable in damages for the injuries resulting therefrom. The city cannot escape liability merely because it exceeded its powers in authorizing the nuisance."

Blasting, it is true, is not per se a nuisance; but blasting near a highway or street becomes a nuisance when it is conducted in such a manner as to endanger the safety of travelers along such highway or street. City of Paris v. Com'th (Ky.) 93 S. W. 907.

In 28 Cyc. 1292, note 38, the reason for the rule is stated thus: "Nuisances in or near public street.—In general.—The doctrine of the liability of a municipality for failure to abate a nuisance in or near a public street arises out of the rule enforced in those jurisdictions that a municipal corporation is bound to keep its streets and sidewalks in a reasonably safe condition, and that failure to perform this duty constitutes a breach of ministerial duty, and the liability does not rest upon a failure to perform a judicial duty of abating a nuisance. Dalton v. Wilson, 118 Ga. 100 [44 S. E. 830, 98 Am. St. Rep. 101]. And upon this principle it is held that, if the nuisance is in or near a public street so as to endanger the safety of travelers thereon, a municipality will be liable for any special damage suffered by reason of the existence of the nuisance and the failure to abate the same. Dalton v. Wilson, supra; Parker v. Macon, 39 Ga. 725 [99 Am. Dec. 486]; Moore v. Townsend, 76 Minn. 64 [78 N. W. 880]."

As the owner of property a municipality is amenable for its proper use. "The corporation of the city of New York has no more right to erect and maintain a nuisance on its lands than a private person possesses." Brower v. New York, 3 Barb. (N. Y.) 254, 258.

In this aspect of the case, sustaining the demurrer involves the incongruity that, if a city suffers a third party to operate a rock quarry in a negligent manner so near to one of its streets as to inflict injury upon a traveler thereon, it is liable in damages; yet, if it does the same act by its own servants, it is not liable. A course of reasoning which leads to such result can hardly be sound.

If the act were ultra vires, the underlying principle upon which the city would be liable is that, being charged with the duty to keep its streets in reasonably safe condition, it is estopped to set up the defense that the street was rendered unsafe by a nuisance of its own creation which it had no authority to maintain.

I am of opinion that the judgment ought to be affirmed.

SCOTT v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 617*)—PREPARATION OF CASE—INSUFFICIENT TIME—WAIVER OF OBJECTION.

Where counsel appointed to defend one accused of crime are in consultation with their client, and are requested by the court to proceed with the case, and such counsel proceed with the trial of the case without requesting further time for the preparation of their client's case, it is too late to complain, after the trial, that sufficient time was not allowed for preparation for trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1375; Dec. Dig. § 617.*]

2. INSTRUCTION REQUIRED.

The facts of the case do not authorize a charge on the law of voluntary manslaughter.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 824*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARACTER OF ACCUSED.

While the good character of an accused person is a substantive fact, and evidence of such character should be weighed and considered by the jury in connection with all the other evidence in the case, still such good character of the accused is not a distinct substantive defense. A proper instruction should be given in every case where the accused puts his character in issue; but, in the absence of a timely request, an omission to give a specific charge on the subject will not require a new trial. It is only in exceptional cases where, on the court's failure to charge relative to the good character of the accused, a new trial should be granted. Seymour v. State, 102 Ga. 803, 30 S. E. 263. This case falls within the general rule, and not within the exception.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1996-2004; Dec. Dig. § 824.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 922*)—INSTRUCTIONS—DEFINITION OF "FELONY."

The failure of the court to give in charge the legal definition of the term "felony," appearing in Penal Code 1910, § 70, which section was given in charge, was not such error as requires a new trial. Pickens v. State, 132 Ga. 46, 63 S. E. 783.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 922.*]

5. JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE—INSTRUCTION.

There was no error in the charge on the law of justifiable homicide. The evidence warranted the verdict, and no error appears requiring the grant of a new trial.

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 74*)— PREPARATION OF SCHOOL SITE—INJUNCTION.

Under the charter of the city of Blakely (Acts 1900, p. 225, § 19), the board of education of that municipality is empowered to select a site for the erection of school buildings and to contract for their erection. Where the mayor and council and the board of education cooperate through a committee chosen from the respective bodies for the removal of the old buildings on the site selected, a contract by the committee with a contractor for such removal, duly ratified by the board of education, is not so irregular that the payment of the contract price will be enjoined.

Suit by M. T. Chipstead against G. D. Oliver and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Glessner & Park, for plaintiff in error.
Hawes, Pottle & Wright, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. The city of Blakely issued $27,000 of bonds for the erection of school buildings, and in the selection of the site for the proposed schoolhouse for the white children there arose a dispute among the citizens of the city, the mayor and council, and the board of education. The mayor and council, with the consent and approval of the board of education, appointed a building committee of five (three of whom were selected from the council and two from the board of education), with power to select a site and let the contract for the new school buildings, subject to the approval of council. Having determined that it was to the best interest of the city to erect the new school building upon the site occupied by the present school buildings, the building committee made a contract with R. J. Self for the removal of the old buildings, so as to provide space for the new buildings. Certain citizens filed their petition against the mayor and council, protesting against their action, and seeking to enjoin them from paying out any money on this contract, on the ground that the mayor and council had no jurisdiction in the matter of selecting a site or exercising authority in connection with the removal of the old buildings and the erection of any new school building; their contention being that the board of education was vested with exclusive authority over the matter. A temporary restraining order was granted, and, pending it, the board of education intervened and prayed that all the parties to that suit be enjoined from interfering with the board of education in the construction of the contemplated school building, or in the control and management of the school affairs of the city. A restraining order was granted as prayed in the intervention. In this condition of affairs the board of education contracted with R. J. Self to finish the removal of the old buildings. On the interlocutory hearing for injunction, after considering the evidence submitted and the argument of counsel, the court revoked the restraining order and refused an injunction. The petitioners in the main suit sued out a bill of exceptions, complaining of the refusal of the court to grant an injunction as prayed.

[1] 1. The charter of the city of Blakely (Acts 1900, p. 225, § 19) provides for a system of public schools under the control of a board of five members, known as the "city board of education." The board was given the same authority, jurisdiction, and powers in respect to schools and educational matters of every nature within the school limits as county boards of education had in their respective jurisdictions. It was further provided that "the city council of Blakely shall deed to said board of education the property on which the Blakely Institute is located, and they shall hold it for said city for the purposes of the white school." It was further provided that "the city council may appropriate money toward maintaining, furnishing or repairing school buildings and property held by said board." In view of these provisions, and especially that which conferred on the city board the same powers possessed by the county boards, which includes the "power to purchase, lease, or rent school sites, build, repair or rent schoolhouses, * * * and make all arrangements necessary to the efficient operation of the schools" (Civil Code, § 1484), the board of education was clothed with authority to select the site and construct the new buildings. The mayor and council were expressly authorized to appropriate money toward maintaining and repairing the school buildings. And even if the contract made by the building committee, under the approval of the mayor and council and the board of education, for the removal of the old buildings, was irregular, because of the participation of the mayor and council, it was none the less binding on the board of education, which was authorized to make the contract.

Nor. was the second contract between the board of education and the contractor illegal, because they recognized a small damage to the contractor by reason of the suspension of work because of the injunction and agreed to pay the same.

[2] 2. The main battle before the judge at the interlocutory hearing concerned the propriety of the selection by the board of education of the present site for the erection of the new school buildings, and the plaintiffs in error assign error on the refusal of the court to enjoin the board of education from proceeding further with their plan of erecting a new schoolhouse on the present school site. The complaining citizens contended that the present site was unsuitable. This contention was denied by the board of education and the city council. The evidence to support the several contentions was conflicting. The board of education was clearly acting within the scope of its powers. No evidence was adduced to show that they acted fraudulently or corruptly in the selection of the school site. They are a branch of the municipal government, invested with discretion in choosing a location for the school buildings. The judgment of the court implies that they neither acted arbitrarily nor abused their discretion in selecting the site, and the evidence supports this finding. Under such circumstances the rule is that, where a municipal board is authorized to do a particular act in its discretion, the courts will not control this discretion, unless manifestly abused, nor inquire into the propriety, economy, and general wisdom of the undertaking, or into the details of the manner adopted to carry the matter into execution. Danielly v. Cabaniss, 52 Ga. 212; Wells v. Atlanta, 43 Ga. 67; City of Atlanta v. Stein, 111 Ga. 791, 36 S. E. 932, 51 L. R. A. 335; City of Atlanta v. Holliday, 96 Ga. 546, 23 S. E. 509; Dyer v. 1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 66)—OPERATION AND EFFECT—"CONSTRUCTIVE POSSESSION"—INSTRUCTION.

The court did not err in charging the jury as follows: "'Constructive possession' of lands is where a person having paper title to a tract of land is in actual possession of a part thereof. In such a case the law construes that possession to extend to the boundaries of the tract." It was applicable to the issues in the case and was authorized by the evidence.

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 116*)—ELEMENTS—FRAUD—INSTRUCTION.

In view of the entire charge of the court upon the subject of fraud which would vitiate a prescriptive title, the plaintiffs in error have no valid complaint against the following charge of the court: "If you believe that John E. Donalson, the defendant in this case, who claims title by prescription, entered upon this land under a fair claim of right, believing that he had an honest title, whether he was mistaken in law or not, if he honestly believed his title was good, the best title that he could get, and he entered in that way, then you would not consider that he was guilty of that character of fraud that the law contemplates in the law just given you."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 66; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 25*)—POSSESSION BY TENANT—SUFFICIENCY.

The court did not err in charging the jury as follows: "I charge you that the possession of the tenant is in the right of the person under whom he holds, and though such enters under only an oral lease, his possession inures to the benefit of the person under whom he holds, and if such possession of a tenant should continue for seven years, and should have the necessary qualities which the law gives it, the person who put the tenant in possession would, if he had good color of title, acquire title by prescription." It was not inapplicable to the issues in the case, nor was it without evidence to authorize it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 116-120; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 273*) — DECLARATIONS OF FORMER OWNER.

The court did not err in excluding the alleged sayings of one from whom the defendant in the case claimed to derive title, made while the latter was in possession of the land as a tenant under the former, which sayings were not in disparagement of the former's title, but related to the right of the party in possession to perform certain acts which were being performed by him as a tenant of the speaker; it appearing that the defendant was not present at the time the remarks were made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 273.*]

5. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; Frank Park, Judge.

Action by J. C. Smith and others against J. E. Donalson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Russell & Custer and T. S. Hawes, for plaintiffs in error. E. M. Donalson and J. R. Pottle, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. This was an action of ejectment. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant, who pleaded a prescriptive title acquired by adverse possession under a color of title for more than seven years. The plaintiffs contested both the continuity and the bona fides of the defendant's possession. The plaintiffs made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and they accepted.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The defendant relied upon a prescriptive title. The plaintiffs contended that the prescriptive title was not founded in good faith; that there was fraud in the title, and the defendant knew it at the time he entered into possession; that the prescription was not an unbroken prescription, and did not measure up to the rule of law defining prescriptive title. The defendant contended that he went into possession in good faith, without grounds to suspect that his title had originated in fraud, and that he and his predecessors in title had been in possession continuously for the time prescribed by law, and that his title fully measured up to the requirements of the law in order to make a good title by prescription. Such, in substance, was the statement of the court in his instructions to the jury upon this controlling issue in the case, and this statement of the contention of the parties was authorized by the evidence.

[1] 1. The court then, after defining title by prescription and stating the essential elements thereof, and after defining what would constitute actual possession of land and what was evidence of actual possession, charged the jury as follows: "Constructive possession of lands is where a person having paper title to a tract of land is in actual possession of a part thereof. In such a case the law construes that possession to extend to the boundaries of the tract"—and added that the title or color of title under which a party claims prescriptive title by possession must be recorded, in order to extend to the boundaries of the tract. An inspection of the record shows that the charge quoted was authorized by the evidence, and the judge did not err, as against the plaintiffs, in instructing the jury in the language quoted.

[2] 2. The following charge of the court is complained of on the ground that it is contrary to law: "If you believe that John E. Donalson, the defendant in this case, who claims title by prescription, entered upon this land under a fair claim of right, believing that he had an honest title, whether he was mistaken in law or not, if he honestly believed his title was good, the best title that he could get, and he entered in that way, then you would not consider that he was guilty of that character of fraud that the law contemplates in the law just given you." In other portions of the charge the court used the following language: "The plaintiff claims that the prescriptive title under which the defendant claims originated in fraud. I charge you that that kind of fraud must be moral fraud, and not legal fraud. I charge you that fraud may not be presumed; but, being in itself subtle, slight circumstances may be sufficient to carry conviction of its existence. Upon the question as to whether or not the prescriptive title under which the defendant claims originated in fraud, you are to determine from all the circumstances as shown by the evidence in this case." And charged further: "If, on the other hand, the circumstances shown to you convince your minds, under the rule of law given to you, that at the time he entered into possession that he had notice that the title under which he entered was absolutely void, was no title in law, then you could apply that principle of law. I charge you that, if a purchaser has actual notice that he is purchasing a bad title when he takes possession, his purchase is bad, and he goes into possession in fraud of the rights of the true owner. Whatever is notice enough to excite attention, and put the party on his guard, and call for inquiry, is also notice of everything which it is afterwards found such inquiry might have revealed, which was unknown for want of investigation; that is, where a person has sufficient information to lead him to a fact, he shall be deemed cognizant of it." The part of the charge excepted to in the ground of the motion now under consideration finds place between the two excerpts last quoted. Considering the entire charge upon the subject with which the court was dealing in this portion of his charge, manifestly the plaintiffs in error had no valid ground of complaint against the particular part of the charge which they criticised. It was but an elaboration of the recognized principle that actual fraud on the part of one claiming under prescriptive title is necessary to vitiate that title. Upon the issue as to whether or not the defendant was guilty of such fraud as would render invalid his claim of a good prescriptive title, the court charged fully; and if his charge on that issue is subject to criticism at all, it would be criticism on the part of the defendant in error, and not the plaintiff in error.

[3, 4] 3, 4. The rulings made in headnotes 3 and 4 do not require any further discussion.

[5] 5. The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict.

GLASCO v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 921*)—NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE.

A ground of a motion for new trial, complaining of the admission of evidence, which fails to disclose that the objection taken there-to was urged before the trial court at the time of the ruling complained of, is not sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2206-2209; Dec. Dig. § 921.*]

2. WITNESSES (§ 268*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—CONVERSATION.

Generally, when part of a conversation has been introduced in evidence, the rest of it, so far as relevant, may be brought out by the opposite party on cross-examination of the witness. Cox v. State, 64 Ga. 375 (8), 37 Am. Rep. 76; Betts v. State, 66 Ga. 503.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 933; Dec. Dig. § 268.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 921*)—PRESENTATION OF EVIDENCE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where, after the state had closed its case, the judge permitted an additional witness to be sworn in behalf of the state, before argument had begun, and where it does not appear that the accused was deprived of the right to meet the testimony of such witness, such action upon the part of the judge was not sufficient to require the grant of a new trial merely because such testimony was not in rebuttal of any evidence submitted in behalf of the accused. The reopening of the case is in the sound discretion of the trial judge, and it will not be interfered with, unless abused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2206-2209; Dec. Dig. § 921.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 340*)—INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where a person was on trial under an indictment for murder, a correct charge on the law of manslaughter, even if not authorized by the evidence, is not cause for the grant of a new trial, where the accused was convicted of the higher offense. Rucker v. State, 135 Ga. 391, 69 S. E. 541, and cases cited.

5. ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

One of the grounds of the amended motion for new trial, assigning error upon an instruction of the court, was expressly abandoned in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, and the only remaining one not disposed of by the preceding notes was not approved by the judge.

6. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and the court did not err in refusing a new trial.

DAVIS v. GASKINS et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 158*)—INFANTS (§ 98*)—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE—CONVEYANCES—ACTION TO SET ASIDE.

In an action by one seeking to set aside her deed and recover the land conveyed thereby because of her minority at the time it was executed, it was not error to permit her to testify on cross-examination that her husband had paid for a certain town lot and built a house thereon, and she did not know whether she or her husband had sold it, what she received therefor, and whether the proceeds were paid to her husband or to herself, over objection of her counsel that the deed to the house and lot was the highest evidence; the purpose of the testimony being to support the defendant's plea that the plaintiff, after she became of age, ratified her sale of the land sued for, and there being evidence tending to trace the proceeds of the sale into a house and lot which she sold after becoming of age, and authorizing the jury to infer that the plaintiff had knowledge of this fact.

(a) Nor was it error to admit in evidence the deed from the plaintiff, conveying to a purchaser the house and lot referred to in the preceding note, offered for the purpose of maintaining the plea of ratification. Especially is this true where the plaintiff made no offer to restore the money received from the sale of the land sued for.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 158; Infants, Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 93*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—MOTIONS TO EXCLUDE.

A motion made in the trial court, which was overruled, to "exclude all of the testimony" of certain witnesses "tending to show that at any time after the making of this deed that any property came into her hands which may have been purchased or acquired by the operation of this money or any of this money," is not a complete ground of a motion for a new trial, and cannot be considered here. The motion should set out specifically the testimony sought to be ruled out.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 246; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—HARMLESS ERROR—REVIEW—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The age of the plaintiff being an issue in the case, and a witness having testified that one of her children was born on a named date and the plaintiff was born previously thereto, even if for any reason assigned it was error to allow put in evidence a Bible, belonging to the witness, containing an entry showing the birth of her child to have been as she orally testified, such error was harmless; the oral testimony of the mother fixing the date of her child's age being nowhere contradicted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

4. INFANTS (§ 98*)—CONVEYANCES—CANCELLATION—EVIDENCE.

It was not error to exclude testimony of the purchaser from the plaintiff of the land sued for to the effect that he had placed a mortgage on it for $1,000 and still owed the amount; such testimony being immaterial and irrelevant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

The following charge of the court was not accurate as applied to this case: "The court instructs you that the pleadings in the case are not to be considered as evidence. You are at liberty to look to the pleadings, which you will have out with you, for the purpose of seeing the issues between the parties; but I charge you that in determining those issues you must look to the evidence and the law, and not to the pleadings." But, while the charge complained of did not accurately state the rule that admissions in the pleadings by the defendant were evidence for the plaintiff, yet, as the material admissions complained of were otherwise proven and not controverted, the error complained of will not require a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1064.*]

6. NO ERROR—EVIDENCE SUFFICIENT.

No error appears in the other grounds of the motion for a new trial, and the evidence was ample to support the verdict.

CLARK v. DODSON PRINTERS' SUPPLY CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SALES (§ 472*)—EVIDENCE (§ 460*)—CONDITIONAL SALES—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—PAROL EVIDENCE.

A written contract of conditional sale contained the following among other clauses: "Received of Dodson Printers' Supply Company (incorporated), of Atlanta, Georgia, under terms below stated, the following described machinery and personal property, to wit: Three hand carbonators and fixtures, * * * four delivery wagons, two mules, stock of extracts, stoppers, and all other merchandise used in or connected with the bottling business now carried on by me at 248 Marietta St., in the city of Atlanta, Georgia." Then followed clauses showing that the maker of the instrument purchased the property from the corporation above named, and the terms of the purchase, and stating that promissory notes were given for the deferred payments. "The personal property above described, and the title thereto, notwithstanding delivery, shall belong to and be vested in the Dodson Printers' Supply Company until all the aforesaid notes, or any renewal thereof, shall be first fully paid. * * *

I hereby covenant and agree that in case default shall be made in the payment at maturity of any of the notes aforesaid, or any part thereof, or in case the purchaser shall sell, assign, or remove said property, * * * it shall be lawful for the said Dodson Printers' Supply Company * * * to take immediate possession of said property. * * * The said property to be kept at 248 Marietta street, in the town of Atlanta, Ga., and to be there held and kept, and not removed therefrom without the written consent of the said Dodson Printers' Supply Company first had and obtained." This instrument was duly attested and recorded. Held, that under the decision in Thomas Furniture Co. v. T. & C. Furniture Co., 120 Ga. 879, 48 S. E. 333, the specification of the property covered by such contract of conditional sale was not so indefinite as to render the instrument void as against third parties, and it was competent to show by parol that the delivery wagon, which was levied on and sold under an execution against the purchaser, was one of those which were used in connection with the business of the vendor, sold by it, and located at the specified place, and thus identifying it as being one of those included in the instrument.

BROWN v. PANOLA LIGHT & POWER CO.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 10, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

ELECTRICITY (§ 16*)—ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANY—DEATH OF CHILD.

A power company constructed over the land of another, with his consent, its transmission line. The wires were three in number, strung to poles at a height of 22 feet from the ground. The wires passed over a sweet gum tree, the top of which had been cut out to prevent contact of the wires with the tree. The wires were not insulated, and carried an electrical current of high voltage. The tree had sometimes been visited by children for the purpose of procuring the gum, which exuded from cuts or abrasures on the tree; but the power company's officials had no knowledge of this. A 13 year old boy, unusually well grown for his age, though warned by his father some months previously of the dangerous character of the wires, climbed the tree in search of gum, came in contact with the wires, and was killed. Held that, in a suit for damages for the alleged wrongful death of the boy, the power company is not liable.

WATKINS v. HENDRICKS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 78*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—TIME AS ESSENCE OF CONTRACT.

In a contract for the sale and purchase of land, signed by both parties, the purchaser agreed to pay for it in installments, payable at specified times, and to clear, improve, and put in cultivation 12 acres of the land each year. In the event he failed to pay the purchase money as provided, the contract stated that it was to be null and void, and that his right to the possession of the land should cease. If the purchaser made the improvements specified, but failed to pay the purchase money, the improvements were to be taken in settlement of the rent of the land. In the event he failed to perform any of the stipulations and agreements, either as to improvements or payment of the purchase money, or any part or installment of it, the agreement provided that his right to the possession of the property should cease, and that he would at once, without process of law, upon notice, deliver possession to the vendor. Held, that time was of the essence of the contract as to the agreements of the purchaser.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 121-125; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 114*)—PROCEEDINGS—PETITION.

Where an equitable petition filed by a purchaser for specific performance of a contract of sale of land showed on its face that time was of the essence of the contract, and that he had not complied with his agreements, and set forth no reason excusing nonperformance on his part, the petition was demurrable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 114*)—PROCEEDINGS—PETITION.

The addition of a prayer that, if for any reason specific performance could not be decreed, damages in lieu thereof should be awarded, was not sufficient to save such a petition from being dismissed on demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 518*)—RECORD—SCOPE AND CONTENTS—AMENDMENT TO PLEADINGS.

Where an amendment to pleadings is tendered and rejected by the court, the paper so offered does not become a part of the record, so as to be brought up as such, when error is assigned upon its rejection.

Error from Superior Court, Tattnall County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Action by J. J. Watkins against Nancy Hendricks. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Way & Burkhalter, for plaintiff in error. Jno. P. Moore and Hines & Jordan, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. [1] 1. While time is not ordinarily of the essence of the contract, it may become so by express agreement or by reasonable construction. Civil Code 1910, § 4268 (8). In this case the purchaser of land in 1902 agreed to pay for it in five installments, payable on January 1st of each year, and to clear, improve, and put in cultivation 12 acres of the land a year. The contract provided that in the event the purchaser failed to make the clearings or improvements as agreed, or failed to pay the purchase money "as above mentioned, then this contract or agreement is to be null and void, and rights of said J. J. Watkins [the purchaser] to the possession of said land shall cease." If the purchaser made the improvements, but failed to make the payments of the purchase money "aforesaid," the improvements were to be accepted as settlement of rent for the land. In another clause the purchaser agreed, "in the event he failed to do and perform any of the above and foregoing stipulations and agreements, either in the improvement of said place or payment of purchase money, or any part or installment of the same, that his right to the possession of said property ceases, and he will at once, without process of law, upon notice given her [him] by the said Nancy Hendricks [the vendor], her agent, or attorney, or other representative, deliver quiet and peaceable possession of the same." This was signed by both parties. Under the terms of this agreement, time was of the essence of the contract. McDaniel v. Gray & Co., 69 Ga. 433; Dukes v. Baugh, 91 Ga. 33, 16 S. E. 219; Ellis v. Bryant, 120 Ga. 890, 893, 48 S. E. 352.

[2] 2. The petition does not allege that the purchaser made or tendered the payments at the time agreed on, or state any sufficient reason for the failure, except as to the first installment, the time for the payment of which was alleged to have been extended. The plaintiff alleged in general terms the tendering of "the whole amount due on said contract" to the transferee of the vendor in July, 1905, and to the vendor in the spring of 1907. The installments due in January, 1904 and 1905, were not paid. Nor was that due in 1906 and 1907 tendered till the spring of the latter year, after the other party had retaken possession in 1906. The equitable petition, which was filed in 1908, alleged that about 50 acres had been improved and put in cultivation. The plaintiff thus comes into a court of equity, praying specific performance of a contract where time was of the essence, though showing that he himself has not performed his own contract, and offering no reason therefor. The original petition was accordingly demurrable.

[3] 3. The prayer for damages in the event that the plaintiff cannot have specific performance adds nothing to the case. Under the allegations of the petition, he was entitled neither to specific performance nor to damages for breach of contract in lieu thereof. Prater v. Sears, 77 Ga. 28 (2).

[4] 4. It appears that the plaintiff in error tendered an amendment to his petition, but the court refused to allow it. Error was assigned on this ruling. It has been settled by numerous decisions that, in such a case, the rejected amendment cannot be brought to this court as a part of the record. The presiding judge having refused to allow it to be made a part of the record, counsel could not, by filing it in spite of such ruling, make record of it, and bring it to this court as such. Moore v. Guyton, 110 Ga. 330, 35 S. E. 339; Hays v. Clay, 124 Ga. 908, 53 S. E. 899, and citations. The assignment of error based on this ground cannot be considered; but the case must be determined on the original petition and demurrer thereto.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

DOBBS et al. v. HARDIN, Tax Collector, et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 13, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 103*)—
TAXATION—SUBMISSION OF QUESTION TO POPULAR VOTE—STATUTORY PROVISION.

The time prescribed by Civil Code 1910, § 1535, within which the ordinary must order an election to be held in a school district on the question of local taxation for educational purposes, is "not earlier than 20 days, nor longer than 60 days, after the petition for such election is received" by him. The time for holding such election is not within any given time from the granting of the order calling the election.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 241; Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

2. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 103*)—
TAXATION—VALIDITY OF LEVY.

When such an election has been held, and the result declared in favor of local taxation, the tax is not illegal because it "was levied by the board of trustees and the county commissioner, instead of the secretary of the board of trustees and the county school commissioner." Civil Code 1910, § 1537, provides that the district trustees "shall determine the amount necessary to be raised by local tax on all the property of the district," and prescribes a method for ascertaining the value of all the property in the district subject to taxation for county purposes, and that the secretary of the board, who must be a member thereof, with the aid of the county school commissioner, "shall levy such rate on the property thus found as will raise the total amount to be collected." In levying the rate the secretary and the county school commissioner perform merely the ministerial act of ascertaining, by mathematical calculation, what rate of taxation is required to be levied on the value of the property in the district in order to raise the amount fixed by the trustees. The mere fact that the other members of the board of trustees take part in ascertaining or levying such rate will not render the tax illegal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 240; Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—REVIEW—
HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The petition alleges that an election was held in the Cumming district on the question of local taxation, which resulted in favor of taxation. Therefore it was not error hurtful to the plaintiff to admit, on a hearing for an interlocutory injunction, an affidavit of the ordinary to the effect that the managers of such election regularly made returns to him, which were filed in his office, and that he wrote a final order declaring the result of the election to be in favor of local taxation for school purposes, especially as the plaintiffs contended that the facts to which the ordinary deposed did not appear from the records in his office.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4161-4170; Dec. Dig. § 1051.*]

4. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 107*)—
REMEDIES OF TAXPAYERS—INJUNCTION.

A number of persons, alleging themselves to be citizens and taxpayers of the Cumming school district in Forsyth county, brought an action in behalf of themselves alone, against the tax collector of such county and the school trustees of the Cumming district, to enjoin the collection of tax executions issued against the plaintiffs, respectively, for the proportion claimed to be due by each of them of a tax levied for educational purposes in the district for the scholastic year of 1910. Plaintiffs alleged that the tax was illegal on the grounds dealt with in the preceding headnotes 1 and 2, and on the further grounds that the county board of education had never laid off Forsyth county into school districts, as there was territory in the county not included in any school district, that no map of the school districts was ever made and filed with the ordinary, and that the boundary of the Cumming school district was changed by the county board of education within less than two years after it was laid off. Upon the hearing before the judge for an interlocutory injunction there was evidence tending to show the following facts: During November and December, 1905, the board of education of Forsyth county undertook, in accordance with the act of the General Assembly approved August 23, 1905 (Acts 1905, p. 425), to lay off that county into school districts, and in so doing exercised the discretion vested in them under the act as to the area of each district. The boundaries of the districts were, however, not finally fixed, as the board desired that the people of the county should have an opportunity to be heard before final action should be taken in the matter. Public schools were conducted in the several districts so laid off in the year 1906. On January 12, 1907, the board of education again tentatively laid off and defined the lines of the Cumming school district, and on February 9, 1907, after giving the people of the county notice of the board's intention to do so, and after hearing such suggestions as those interested desired to make as to changes in the various districts as previously laid off, the board passed an order finally designating the lines and boundaries of the respective districts in the county, in good faith endeavoring to embrace all the inhabitable territory of the county in some district. The order so defining the boundaries of the various school districts was entered upon the minutes of the board, and a large number of pamphlets containing the description and boundaries of each district were printed by the direction of the board and distributed throughout the county, after supplying all the teachers and trustees of the various districts with copies of the same. No map of the county showing the lines and boundaries of the various school districts was filed with the ordinary. On February 13, 1907, an election was duly held in the Cumming district to decide whether local taxation for educational purposes should be levied in the district, which election resulted in favor of taxation. On November 18, 1908, the county board of education changed the boundaries of the Cumming district by adding thereto territory in which a number of citizens owning taxable property therein resided. The Cumming district as laid off did not contain 16 square miles, but there was no evidence that the board of education abused its discretion in fixing the area of the district. Only three of the citizens of the territory added to the Cumming district by the change made November 18, 1908, were parties plaintiff, and each of them patronized the school in the Cumming district during the scholastic year of 1910, and each of them paid his school tax for that year, and no execution was proceeding against any of them. It did not appear that any additional burden was placed upon the taxpayers of the district as originally laid off by the change made November 18, 1908, which took into the district more territory; but, from the amount of the territory so taken in, there is a strong inference that they were benefited by the change. A public school has been maintained by local taxation in the Cumming district since the election for the years 1907, 1908, 1909, and 1910, without effort on the part of any one, so far as the evidence discloses, to interfere with the maintenance of the school, until the bringing of the plaintiff's petition. The scholastic year of 1910 commenced on September 5th of that year and continued for nine months. Contracts were entered into by the trustees with teachers for the term of 1910, relying upon the fund to be derived from the taxes levied for school purposes for that year to meet the obligation under such contracts, as well as to defray the contingent expenses of the school for that term. The plaintiffs knew of the levy of such tax at the time it was levied, or very soon thereafter, as well as the purposes to which the fund to be derived therefrom was to be devoted; yet they delayed filing their petition to enjoin the collection of their respective portions of such tax until January 9, 1911. Held, that while the board of education of each county should lay it off into school districts, make a map thereof, showing the lines and boundaries as laid off, and file the map with the ordinary, as the statute requires, yet we cannot hold that under the facts above stated, and the long delay on the part of the plaintiffs in applying for an injunction to restrain the collection of the tax, the judge was not warranted in denying an interlocutory injunction for the collection of the tax for the year 1910. Irvin v. Gregory, 86 Ga. 605, 13 S. E. 120.

BURKHART et al. v. CITY OF FITZGERALD et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 723*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

An assignment of error in a bill of exceptions to a judgment refusing an ad interim injunction, based upon the admission of evidence, must set out the evidence admitted, at least in substance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3010-3012; Dec. Dig. § 723.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 85*)—EXCEPTION OF EVIDENCE—OBJECTIONS—EVIDENCE ADMISSIBLE IN PART.

An assignment of error upon the admission of a given portion of the affidavit of a witness is not well taken, where it appears that the excerpt was objected to as a whole, and some part of it, if not all, was admissible. Fricker v. Americus Mfg. & Improvement Co., 124 Ga. 165 (8), 52 S. E. 65.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 223-225; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

3. STATUTES (§ 76*)—LOCAL LAWS—APPLICABILITY OF GENERAL STATUTES.

The act of the General Assembly approved August 22, 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 609), as amended by the act approved August 17, 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 666), chartering the city of Fitzgerald, and establishing the territory embraced within the corporate limits as an independent school district, and authorizing the municipal officers to establish and maintain a public school system in such city, is not unconstitutional, on the ground that the act of 1905 (Acts 1905, p. 425), as amended by the act of 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 61), commonly known as the "McMichael school law," made provision by general law for the laying out of counties into school districts, and the levying of school taxes in such districts after an election therefor, while the act of 1907, as amended by the act of 1908, above referred to, was a local act providing for a school system in a municipality. Farmer v. Mayor and Council of Thomson, 133 Ga. 94(1), 65 S. E. 180.

(a) The act of 1905, amended by the act of 1906, referred to above, was not intended to "prevent the Legislature from incorporating new towns or cities, or conferring upon them powers touching municipal schools not in conflict with the Constitution." 133 Ga. 98, 65 S. E. 182.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 77½-78½; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 31*)—SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 90*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONSTITUTION—SELF-EXECUTING PROVISIONS—SCHOOL TAXES.

Const. art. 8, § 4, par. 1, as amended by the proposal of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 23), which empowers the General Assembly to give authority to municipal corporations, upon recommendation of the corporate authority, to establish and maintain public schools by local taxation, to become operative only after the law shall have been submitted to a vote of the qualified voters, and approved by a two-thirds vote of the persons qualified to vote at such election, is not self-executing. A general power contained in the charter of the city of Fitzgerald (Acts 1907, p. 609), amended by the act of 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 666), to establish and maintain a public school system by taxation, and without any provision in the charter for a submission of the question to a vote of the qualified voters of the town before it should become effective, was not a compliance with the Constitution; and did not authorize the levy and collection of a special tax for school purposes, although an election was held and two-thirds of the persons voting thereat voted for such special tax (Brooks v. Town of Loganville, 134 Ga. 358, 87 S. E. 940); such election having been held prior to the passage of the act approved August 18, 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 26), authorizing a certain class of municipalities to hold an election to determine the question of local taxation for the support and maintenance of public schools, to prescribe the qualification of electors for such election, and for other purposes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 32; Dec. Dig. § 31.* Schools and School Districts, Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

5. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§§ 99, 107*)—SCHOOL TAXES—REMEDIES OF TAXPAYERS—INJUNCTION—ESTOPPEL.

Without authority of law to hold such election, the municipal authorities of the city of Fitzgerald caused an election to be held for the purpose of determining whether a special school tax should be levied for the support of the public schools. The requisite number of votes was cast in favor of the tax. An ordinance levying the tax was adopted by council in June, 1910. Four resident taxpayers, consisting of the Fitzgerald Trust Company, a corporation, M. E. Pearson, a woman, and H. A. Burkhart and J. B. Seanor, filed suit March 11, 1911, after expense had been incurred in organizing and conducting the school almost to the end of the term, for the purpose of enjoining, among other taxes, the collection of the school tax so levied. Held:

(a) As there was no authority of law to hold the election, it was void and of no effect.

(b) As there was no valid election, the levy of the school tax was void.

(c) Injunction will lie at the instance of any taxpayer, who has not estopped himself, to enjoin the sale of his property for collection of such an unauthorized tax.

(d) Such an estoppel will not arise against a person who has done nothing to encourage the levy of the tax or the incurrence of the expense. Sellers v. Cox, 127 Ga. 246, 56 S. E. 284.

(e) As to one of the plaintiffs, J. B. Seanor, who was an alderman and voted for the ordinance levying the tax, the evidence was of such character as to authorize the judge to find that he was estopped from resisting collection of the tax; but as to the other three the evidence was different, and of such character as that the judge should have granted a temporary injunction.

(f) The case is controlled by the principle of Sellers v. Cox, 127 Ga. 246, 56 S. E. 284, and for reasons therein pointed out is distinguishable from Irvin v. Gregory, 86 Ga. 605, 13 S. E. 120, and Dobbs v. Hardin (decided in December) 73 S. E. 582.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 248-252; Dec. Dig. §§ 99, 107.*]

6. TAXATION (§ 44*)—VALIDITY—INEQUALITIES.

The mere fact that certain lands within the city limits of Fitzgerald, owned by certain other persons, had been taxed, not ad valorem, but upon a valuation which was the difference between their value for agricultural purposes and their value as town lots, furnished no reason why the plaintiffs should not pay a tax on their property greater than the percentage of the values placed upon such agricultural lands for taxation. Even if it did, there was evidence tending to show that all agricultural lands within the incorporate limits were valued and taxed as other property therein. Georgia Midland & Gulf R. Co. v. State, 89 Ga. 597(2), 15 S. E. 801.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 983*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 170*)—TAXES—PENALTIES—PRESENTATION OF QUESTIONS IN TRIAL COURT.

Section 53 of the charter of the city of Fitzgerald (Acts 1907, p. 632), provides: "Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the first half of all city taxes called for the city tax digest shall be payable during June, and the second half payable during November of each year. Any taxes payable according to this section not paid as above stated shall be increased ten per cent. as penalty for non-payment within the time prescribed." Therefore there was authority of law to collect a penalty for failure to pay lawful taxes.

(a) It was suggested in counsel's brief that this portion of the charter is void, because it refers only to such property as is mentioned in the tax digest; and as property of railroads is not mentioned in such digest, the statute does not operate uniformly. This is in effect a criticism upon the constitutionality of the act, but no such question was raised in the pleadings or rulings on the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 983; Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1037; Dec. Dig. § 170.*]

8. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§§ 978, 979*)—REMEDIES OF TAXPAYERS—INJUNCTION—INTEREST.

Executions issued for taxes due a municipal corporation do not bear interest, where the municipal corporation, under charter authority, imposes a penalty for failure to pay the taxes. A municipality cannot collect both a penalty for failure to pay taxes and interest on tax executions. Civil Code 1910, § 1144. The charter of the city of Fitzgerald, as indicated by the excerpt quoted in the preceding note, contained a provision for the collection of a penalty, and hence no interest could be collected.

(a) All the executions sought to be enjoined were issued for a bulk sum, covering taxes levied for the purpose of raising revenue for the payment of the ordinary current expenses of the city for educational purposes for the year 1910, and for a sinking fund for the payment of bonds and interest thereon, and for penalty for the nonpayment of such taxes, and for interest from the date the executions were issued. While some of the items going to make up such bulk were legal and collectible, they are so compounded with the illegal that this court will not undertake to separate the legal from the illegal, and therefore the several executions as a whole against the plaintiffs, other than Seanor, should be enjoined. The execution against him should be enjoined only as to interest.

BALL et al. v. WALSH

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 10, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 136*)—NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—DEFECTS IN LEASED PREMISES—LIABILITY FOR PERSONAL INJURIES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—NONSUIT.

If the plaintiff, by ordinary care, could have avoided the consequences to himself caused by the defendant's negligence, he is not entitled to recover. Civil Code, § 4426.

(a) This doctrine has been frequently applied in actions brought by tenants against landlords for damages sustained by tenants by reason of landlord's failure to keep the rented premises in repair, as they are bound to do under the statute in this state. Some of the cases in point are Miller v. Smythe, 92 Ga. 154, 18 S. E. 46; Id., 95 Ga. 288 (2), 22 S. E. 532; Stack v. Harris, 111 Ga. 149, 36 S. E. 615; Aikin v. Perry, 119 Ga. 263 (2), 46 S. E. 93; Veal v. Hanlon, 123 Ga. 642, 51 S. E. 579; Henley v. Brockman, 124 Ga. 1050, 53 S. E. 672.

(b) The question of negligence is, of course, usually one for the jury. Where, however, the allegations of a petition clearly disclose that the plaintiff, by the use of ordinary care, could have avoided the consequences to himself caused by the defendant's negligence, the petition is subject to general demurrer; and where such fact does not clearly appear from the petition, but is manifest from the evidence submitted on the trial by the plaintiff, a nonsuit is proper.

(c) In an action brought by a tenant and his wife against a landlord for damages from personal injuries sustained by the wife by reason of the failure of the defendant to keep the rented premises in repair, the following facts appear from the petition: There was a rear porch to the rented dwelling, about nine feet from the ground, and on this porch a railing. The "railing had been erected for a great length of time, and was old and rotten, and many of the balusters had fallen out, leaving the rail at the top of said balusters attached at each end to posts; said rail being attached by old and rusty nails, and the railing itself was old and rotten." Prior to the occasion when the injuries alleged were sustained, the plaintiffs had repeatedly notified the defendant "of the defective condition of said * * * railing, and had received from [defendant's agent] repeated assurances that the same would be repaired, but that no repairs had ever been made thereon prior to the time the tenant's wife was injured. She "is a very fleshy woman," and "while passing along said back porch * * * leaned slightly against said railing; that upon her doing so the said rail gave way, on account of its defective condition, and on account of the fact that it was old and the nails attaching same to the posts were rusty"; and she thereby "was precipitated from said porch to the ground below, falling upon her back," sustaining described and severe injuries, which caused her great pain at the time. Her injuries are permanent, and she will continue to suffer pain therefrom, and, furthermore, she will permanently be rendered incapacitated to perform her household duties. The petition further alleged that she "was without negligence in leaning against said rail." Held that, notwithstanding the allegation last quoted, to the effect that the tenant's wife was not negligent in leaning against the railing, the petition was clearly subject to general demurrer, and the court did not err in dismissing the same, for the reason that the wife of the tenant by ordinary care could have avoided the consequences to herself caused by the landlord's alleged negligence.

RICE v. CITY OF MOULTRIE (No 3,878.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1912.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1181*)—CERTIORARI—DISMISSAL.

The petition for certiorari alleging that bond and security were given as required by law, and having been duly sanctioned, and it not affirmatively appearing from the answer of the mayor, or otherwise from the record, that this allegation was untrue, the court erred in dismissing the certiorari, upon the ground that bond and security had not been given by the applicant as required by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1131.*]

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

W. H. Rice was convicted of violating an ordinance of the City of Moultrie. From an order dismissing petition for certiorari, defendant brings error. Reversed.

L. L. Moore, for plaintiff in error. A. B. Buxton and J. D. McKenzie, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. 1. So far as appears from the record, the certiorari bond required by law had been filed with the clerk of the municipal court as provided by law. The clerk of the municipal court had so certified, and this certificate was attached to the petition. The answer of the mayor, while not affirming, did not deny, the allegation of the petition for certiorari, nor the certificate of the clerk of the mayor's court; consequently it was error to dismiss the certiorari upon the ground that the clerk of the mayor's court had not approved the bond filed in the case. The petition, for certiorari alleged, and the certificate of the clerk of the mayor's court confirmed the statement, that the very bond required by law had been given, and nothing appears in the record to dispute this statement.

The ruling would be different if it appeared from the record that the judge of the superior court, as he can do (Stallworth v. Mayor and Council of Macon, 125 Ga. 250, 54 S. E. 142), had made an investigation into the facts in relation to the bond, and upon such investigation had discovered (either because of failure to recite the proper conditions, as in Roach v. Atlanta, 7 Ga. App. 172, 66 S. E. 484, or because it was approved by the mayor, instead of the clerk, or for any other reason) that the bond had not been given as required. In the present case we learn this fact from the brief of the counsel for the defendant in error; but the fact does not appear from the record, nor is it certified in the bill of exceptions that such is the fact, so that this court may know that such is the truth of the case, and that for that reason the judge of the superior court dismissed the certiorari.

Judgment reversed.

WIMPEY v. SMART et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EASEMENTS (§ 24*) — CREATION — EXPRESS GRANT—TRANSFER.

When one owning land sells a part of it, reserving in the deed an alleyway for the common use of the part conveyed and the part reserved, and subsequently conveys the remainder, giving the alleyway as a boundary, the right of common of easement in the way passes under the second deed as appurtenant to the land conveyed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 64-69; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

2. EASEMENTS (§ 32*) — TERMINATION — PRESCRIPTION.

Where the grantee in the first deed erects a permanent structure, which encroaches upon a portion of the alley, which is continuously maintained for more than 20 years without objection, the common of easement on that portion of the alley encroached upon is lost to the grantee in the second deed and his privies in estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. § 84; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

3. COVENANTS (§ 17*) — IMPLICATION — DESCRIPTION.

A conveyance by the executors of the grantee in the second deed to a purchaser, after they had lost the common of easement over that part of the alley covered by the structure, wherein the land is described as "commencing on the east side of Peachtree street, at the north line of T. L. Langston's lot, and extending thence north along the east side of Peachtree street forty-nine (49) feet to a ten (10) foot joint alley, thence east along said alley two hundred (200) feet to the R. C. Mitchell lot, thence south forty-nine (49) feet to T. L. Langston's lot, thence west along said Langston's line two hundred (200) feet to the beginning point," will not operate so as to imply a covenant of easement in that part of the alley covered by the encroachment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Cent. Dig. §§ 14-16; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by Harriet E. Smart and another, executors of A. G. Smart, against W. E. Wimpey. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, for plaintiff in error. Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. The defendants in error, Harriet E. Smart and Arthur T. Smart, executors of A. G. Smart, on April 1, 1908, sold a city lot to W. E. Wimpey for $20,000. The vendee paid $4,000 cash, and gave his notes for the remainder; and the vendors executed to him a bond for title, obligating themselves to make a good and sufficient title to the premises to the vendee upon his payment of the balance of the purchase money. In the bond for title the premises were described as "all that tract or parcel of land lying and being in the city of Atlanta, in the Fourteenth district of said county, and being a portion of land lot No. fifty-one (51), and described as follows: Commencing on the east side of Peachtree street, at the north line of T. L. Langston's lot, and extending thence north along the east side of Peachtree street forty-nine (49) feet to a ten (10) foot joint alley, thence east along said alley two hundred (200) feet to the R. C. Mitchell lot, thence south forty-nine (49) feet to T. L. Langston's lot, and thence west along said Langston's line two hundred (200) feet, to the beginning point, and having thereon a two-story frame dwelling and known as No. 263 Peachtree street, between Harris and Baker streets, and being the land conveyed by deed from Mrs. Fowler to the said A. G. Smart, by a deed recorded in Deed Book F—4, page 18, on February 10, 1892." The vendee failed to pay the purchase-money notes at maturity, and the vendors brought suit thereon. The defendant pleaded partial failure of consideration, in that an abutting landowner had made a permanent encroachment on the alley, which encroachment had existed for more than 20 years, and reduced the width of the alley at the place of encroachment to 5½ feet. After the evidence was closed, a verdict was directed for the executors for the full amount of the notes sued on. Wimpey excepted.

[1] It appeared on the trial that Mrs. Flora Fowler owned a lot of land in the city of Atlanta, abutting on Peachtree street and embracing the premises sold by the executors of Smart to Wimpey. On November 24, 1874, Mrs. Fowler conveyed to W. L. Goldsmith a part of the lot, described as fronting 50 feet, more or less, on the east side of Peachtree street, adjoining the land of Mrs. Fowler and Dougherty, extending back 200 feet to Mr. Mitchell's lot, with a 10-foot alley between the parties to the deed, extending back 200 feet, for the mutual benefit of both parties to the deed, unless a 10-foot alley be opened in the rear of the lot extending from Harris to Baker street; then said 10-foot alley shall be for the exclusive use of Goldsmith. Through mesne conveyances the title to this lot, with the same alley privileges, passed to the present owner. In the year 1876 or 1877 Goldsmith, the then owner of the lot, built a house on it, which encroached about $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet on the alley between Mrs. Fowler and himself, and the house is still standing as originally constructed. On February 10, 1892, Mrs. Flora Fowler conveyed to A. G. Smart the other part of her lot, describing the land conveyed as "commencing on the east side of Peachtree street, at the north line of T. L. Langston's lot, and extending thence north along the east side of Peachtree street 49 feet to a 10-foot joint alley, thence east along said alley 200 feet to R. C. Mitchell's lot, thence south 49 feet to T. L. Langston's lot, and thence along said Langston's line 200 feet to the beginning point." When the executors of A. G. Smart sold to Wimpey, the owner of the land on the opposite side of the alley had encroached upon the alley by maintaining a permanent structure thereon for more than 20 years. The encroachment began about 30 feet on the alley from Peachtree street, projecting in the alley at the furthest point $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet, and extending down the alley about 35 feet; and neither party controverted that the abuttal owner had prescription to the encroachment. Thus it will be seen that at the time of the sale to Wimpey, the owner of the lot on the other side of the alley had a prescriptive title to the encroachment. Under these circumstances the main and controlling question presented is whether the description of the land as contained in the bond for title from the executors of Smart to Wimpey is sufficient to imply a covenant of easement over the entire alley, so as to entitle Wimpey to an apportionment in the purchase price because of the encroachment on it. When Mrs. Flora Fowler sold a part of her lot to Goldsmith, reserving a 10-foot alley for their joint use, and subsequently sold to Smart the remainder of her lot, the right of common of easement in the alley passed to Smart as appurtenant to the land conveyed. Taylor v. Dyches, 69 Ga. 455. And Smart was entitled to the free and unobstructed use and enjoyment of the alley. Murphy v. Harker, 115 Ga. 84, 41 S. E. 585. When Smart purchased, the encroachment made by Goldsmith, the abuttal owner, had existed 15 or 16 years; and when his executor sold to Wimpey, the encroachment had continued for about 30 years. At the time of Wimpey's purchase, his vendors had lost their right of easement over that portion of the alleyway actually covered by the house, and the owner of the house had a prescriptive title to the land upon which it rested.

[2] Where a conveyance of land calls for a street or alley as a boundary, if the grantor has the fee of the land thus referred to, he is estopped to deny that it is a street, and a right of way passes to the grantee by implication of law. Schrek v. Blun, 131 Ga. 489, 62 S. E. 705. As has been well said by the Supreme Court of Oregon: "This doctrine rests upon the fact that the grantor, by describing the land as bounded by a way, when he is the owner of the soil under the way, intends thereby to confer upon the grantee, as appurtenant to the granted premises, the right to use such way, and whether it be deemed to operate as an implied grant, covenant, warranty, or estoppel binding on the grantor, his heirs or assigns, is immaterial." Lankin v. Terwilliger, 22 Or. 100, 29 Pac. 269. The necessity that the grantor own the land represented as a street before a covenant of easement over it can be implied is apparent. In the absence of an express grant, a grantor will not be presumed as intending to pass, as an appurtenance to the land conveyed, an easement over the land of another. If he gives a street or way as a boundary, he will be estopped by his deed from denying the existence of the street or way. This estoppel results from the effect to be given to his deed; for every grant should be so construed as to give the grantee the benefits intended to be conferred by the grant, and the grantor will not be permitted to close up the way or do anything that will defeat or essentially impair this grant. Parker v. Framingham, 8 Metc. (Mass.) 268. When a way is given as a boundary, the implication of a grant of an easement is dependent upon the grantor's ownership of the servient fee; nevertheless he is estopped by his deed from contesting with his grantee the latter's right to use the way, whether the ownership of the servient fee be in him or in another. This distinction has not always been clearly observed in the cases bearing on the question, but where the express point was made the distinction was noted and the case decided accordingly. In Howe v. Alger, 4 Allen (Mass.) 206, the grantor described the premises conveyed as bounded on the north and south by certain streets, and the grantee sought to charge the grantor in damages for a breach of an implied covenant as to the existence of these streets. The breach assigned was that there were no such streets legally laid out, or any right of way, on the north and south sides of the lot. The grantor did not own the adjacent land described as streets. It was held that in the absence of an express covenant that there were such streets, which should always be kept open for travel or the use of the grantee, a mere recital in the boundary of a street as one of the abutments would not operate further than an estoppel, as to the grantor and those claiming under him, to deny the existence of such street or way, and to prevent him from interfering with the grantee in the use and enjoyment of the same; and judgment was given for the defendant. In Fulmer v. Bates, 118 Tenn. 731, 102 S. W. 900, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 964, 121 Am. St. Rep. 1059, the grantor described the land as bounded on the rear by a 20-foot alley. There was no such alley, nor did the grantor own the adjacent land. The grantee sued to recover damages for an alleged breach of an implied covenant; and the court held that where land in a deed is bounded by a way, if the grantor does not own the land, no covenant will be implied from the reference. And this doctrine is recognized in 1 Tiedeman on Real Property, § 801; 3 Washburn on Real Property, 485.

[3] In the instant case the easement over that part of the alley encroached upon had been lost on account of 20 years' adverse possession, and the abuttal owner had a prescriptive title to it. Therefore, at the time of the execution of the bond for title by Smart's executors to Wimpey, the title to the soil under the encroachment was not in the vendors, and no covenant of easement will be implied from the reference to the 10-foot alley as a boundary. We do not think that the word "joint," in describing the alley, gives to the transaction a legal effect different to that if the word had been omitted. The word "joint" denotes restriction rather than enlargement in the use of the easement. The vendee set up in his plea the vendors' assurance that the northern boundary was an alley 10 feet wide throughout and extended that width the full depth of the lot, and, having complete confidence in the statements and representations made by the vendors, and the description of the alley as laid in the bond for title, he accepted the bond for title and closed the trade. We construe the plea and the evidence in support of it to mean that the vendors sold a lot abutting on a 10-foot alley, an easement in which was implied as appurtenant to the land, and that the appurtenance was less extensive in scope than the description in the deed, and that for this reason there was a breach of the implied covenant of easement. As we have attempted to demonstrate, there has been no breach of the implied easement. The evidence falls far short of showing any deceitful representations, or that the vendee was prevented by the vendors from knowing of the encroachment, even if he did not actually know the condition of the alley at the time of his purchase. The rulings upon evidence were in harmony with the rule of law which we have applied in reaching our decision in the case. The evidence demanded the verdict.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—REVIEW—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

A client sued his attorney to recover an amount of money had and received by the attorney for the client's benefit. The client placed in the hands of the attorney a note for collection. The latter collected the note, and retained half of the amount as a fee for his services. The client contended that he had made no contract for fees, and the attorney was entitled only to a quantum meruit for his services. The attorney claimed that he had a verbal contract which entitled him to retain one-half of the amount collected. This was the sole issue in the case, and the jury found in favor of the client, and no error of law is complained of. As repeatedly ruled, the verdict settled the issue of fact, and this court cannot interfere.

SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. CO. et al. v.

HUNT. (No. 3,344.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorizes the verdict.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 228*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under Civil Code 1910, § 2782 et seq., an employé (or one in his right), suing for injuries inflicted upon him by the alleged negligent acts of fellow servants in railway employments, is not barred from his recovery by contributory negligence, unless it amounts to a failure to exercise ordinary care.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 670, 671; Dec. Dig. § 228.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 243*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—VIOLATION OF RULE.

Contributory negligence on the employé's part may consist in a violation of a valid rule promulgated by his employer. However, when an employer offers in evidence a rule for the purpose of showing that the employé has been guilty of negligence by violating it, the employé may avoid the effect of it by showing that the master made it, not in good faith and with the intention that it should be obeyed, but merely for the purpose of shielding himself behind it in the event that an employé, expected to violate it, is injured, or may show that the employer has waived or abrogated the rule by knowingly allowing continuous and customary violations of it by his employés generally.

(a) Where a railway company promulgates rules for the guidance of its employés, they will be most strongly construed against the company; and, if it be doubtful whether they cover the act in question, they will not be sufficient to render that act, if committed by the servant, negligence per se.

(b) If it be at all doubtful as to whether the rule was intended to apply to a particular kind of service, and it is shown that both before and after its promulgation that service had been, with the master's knowledge, constantly performed by the employés in violation of the terms of the rule, the evidence of the practice of the employés in this respect is relevant, not only where a waiver of the rule is relied on to prove the waiver, but also to aid in the construction of the rule itself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 682, 759-775; Dec. Dig. § 243.*]

4. DEPOSITIONS (§ 90*)—USE AS EVIDENCE—PRESENCE OF WITNESSES.

Depositions of a witness taken under provisions of the Civil Code for use in a pending case may, in the discretion of the court, be read in evidence, notwithstanding the presence of the witness at the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Depositions, Cent. Dig. §§ 248-260; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 193*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EXPRESSION OF OPINION.

For the court to state to the jury the allegations of the petitioner and the insistences of counsel is not violative of the Code section against the judge's expressing or intimating an opinion upon the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 436-438; Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

6. NO ERROR—NEW TRIAL REFUSED.

The trial was free from error, and no reason appears for granting a new trial.

Error from City Court of Cordele; E. F. Strozler, Judge.

Action by Mrs. C. E. Hunt against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and certain defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Hunt was a yardmaster in the service of the defendant company at Cordele. On July 10, 1910, which was Sunday, he received instructions to switch certain cars containing perishable freight, in order that their forwarding might be expedited. In order to place these cars, what is known as a "flying switch" was made. Hunt was on the foot-board of the engine for the purpose of unloosing the freight cars from the engine, in order that they might take one track while the engine took the other. A switchman was placed at the switch stand in order to turn the switch between the time of the passage of the engine and the time of the passage of the cars. As the engine was passing over the switch, it became derailed and threw Hunt from it, and he fell so that in his efforts to extricate himself he got into such a position that the moving freight cars struck him, ran over him, and killed him. Hunt's widow sued the company, its section foreman, the engineer in charge of the locomotive, and the switchman who handled the switch. The grounds of negligence alleged were: (1) That the section foreman had allowed the switch points to become so worn that the switch "split" when the engine ran over it; (2) that the switchman moved the switch while the engine was upon it, so that the forward wheels took one track, while the other wheels took the other; (3) that the engineer was running at an excessive speed, so that when the switch was "split," by reason of its worn condition, or by reason of its being moved by the switchman, the injury occurred. The company was also charged with negligence on account of each and all of the acts of these separate employés. At the trial the plaintiff abandoned its charge of negligence as to the worn condition of the switch, and dismissed the section foreman from the case. The jury found a verdict against the company and the switchman, exonerating the engineer. This verdict, in the light of the charge of the court and of the evidence, is necessarily to be construed as a finding that the only act of negligence established was that the switchman moved the switch while the engine was in passage over it and that the engineer was not guilty of operating the train at an excessive speed. This fact renders it unnecessary for us to discuss or decide some of the points made in the record relating solely to the other features of the case, which were eliminated by the jury's finding in favor of the company as to all grounds of negligence except the act of the switchman. The defendants who were found liable, having made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, bring error.

W. H. McKenzie and E. A. Hawkins, for plaintiffs in error. F. G. Boatright and J. T. Hill, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] Without going into details, it is sufficient to say that the evidence was in conflict as to whether the switchman moved or could have moved the switch while the engine was in passage. On this point the verdict of the jury is conclusive. The only other question raised by the general grounds is whether the plaintiff himself was guilty of such contributory negligence as to bar a recovery on his part. Without enlarging upon the discussion of this question at present, we will simply say that the evidence was such as to justify the verdict and that the verdict is not without evidence to support it. The case was determinable, not under the old law, which required an employé, or one suing on his behalf, to show that he was free from fault, or he could not recover for an injury inflicted by the act of a fellow servant, but was governed by the new rule, now embodied in Civil Code 1910, §§ 2782-2787, inclusive.

[2] 2. The plaintiffs in error contend that there was no issue as to the plaintiff's contributory negligence; that concededly he was guilty of such contributory negligence, amounting to a failure to exercise ordinary care, as to bar a recovery under Civil Code 1910, § 2783. Under that section, contributory negligence amounting to a failure to exercise ordinary care will absolutely bar recovery, while contributory negligence of a less degree will diminish the recovery.

[3] 3. The instance of counsel is that inasmuch as the petition alleges that the plaintiff was engaged in making a "flying switch" at the time he met his death, and inasmuch as it was shown on the trial that the company had a rule, known to him and agreed to by him, prohibiting the making of a "flying switch," his engagement in that act was necessarily contributory negligence, and was as a matter of law the proximate cause of his injury. The defendant in error resists this contention with the counter contention that the making of the "flying" switch was a remote, and not the proximate, cause of the injury; that the proximate cause was the switchman's negligent act in turning the switch under the engine; also that the rule of the company upon the subject did not apply to switch engines handling cars in the yards, but only to trains, in the sense that that term is defined in the rules of the company; and, further, that if any such rule was ever applicable to the plaintiff, it had been abrogated by reason of the company's allowing its continuous and constant violation by its employes. We are of the opinion that it was probably a question for the jury as to whether the making of a "flying" switch was or was not so connected with the act of the switchman as to make it at least a part of the proximate cause. But, be this as it may, there was certainly enough evidence in the record to justify the jury in finding that this practice of making "flying" switches had gone on for such a length of time and with such knowledge on the company's part as to indicate that the rule was not made for the purpose of having it obeyed, and that, if it ever had validity, it had been waived. No proposition is better settled by this court and by the Supreme Court than that if a railroad company makes rules, not for the purpose of having them obeyed, but merely for the purpose of shielding themselves behind them in the event that an employé is injured in violating them, the rules will be disregarded by the court, and, further, that an abrogation or waiver of the rule may be established by proof that it was constantly and continuously violated with the knowledge of those officers whose duty it was to enforce it and with their apparent acquiescence. In this case the particular rule was promulgated in 1908, but a similar rule had been in effect previously, and continuous violations of it were shown, both before and after the year 1909.

Specific objection is made to the evidence tending to show a violation before 1908, and also to such of the evidence as tended to show a violation after the death of the employé in this case. But we think that this evidence was admissible. It is doubtless true that where a railway company, having promulgated a rule and having allowed it to become abrogated by allowing its violation, but being desirous of stopping the practice forbidden by it, may repromulgate the rule, notifying the employes thereafter that obedience will be insisted on, and may thus give validity from that time forward, so as to make a further violation of it negligence on the employé's part, provided that the company does thereafter in good faith insist on obedience. But where, under the rule as originally promulgated, customary violations took place with the company's knowledge, and thereafter the same rule is again promulgated, and no change of practice is insisted on, and the same practice of violation continues, the inference becomes almost irresistible that the second promulgation was intended to have no greater effect than the first promulgation had; that the company did not intend in good faith to enforce it. The past attitude of the company becomes strongly illustrative of its attitude under the rule as reissued.

Besides, it is not at all clear in this case that this rule ever had applicability to a yard engine. Of course, the general doctrine is that the rules are to be construed most strongly against the company promulgating them. In the rule book of the company this particular rule forbidding running switches was known as rule No. 104 (e), and appeared under the head of "Movement of Trains." These same rules give a set of definitions by which the particular rules are to be construed, and the following definitions are to be found: "Train: An engine, or more than one engine, coupled, with or without cars, displaying markers." "Yard engine: An engine assigned to yard service and working within yard limits." And rule No. 18 provides that "yard engines will not display markers," thus evincing an intention that a yard engine is not to be regarded as a train, while working within yard limits (as the engine in the present case was working). And if rule No. 104 (e), relating to "flying" switches, refers only to the movement of trains, as it seems to do by being placed under that head, it was not the intention of the rules to forbid such engines, working within yard limits, from making "flying" switches. It is true that this same rule appeared in the time-table furnished to employés; but this time-table itself made reference to the general rules of the company and purported to quote largely from them, and it seems only fair to construe the rules as found in the time-table in connection with the rule as found in the rule book.

The jury were, therefore, authorized to find that the company did not intend for this rule to apply to its yard engines; this inference being supported both by the ambiguous form in which the rule was promulgated and by the practice of the employés of making "flying" switches in the yards with the knowledge of the company's officers. This being so, it cannot be said that the making of the "flying" switch was the proximate negligent cause of the injury. The jury might have found that in the absence of a rule on the subject the making of a "flying" switch was negligence; but this question was fairly submitted to them, and they found to the contrary. And, as we have said before, the jury found that the immediate cause of the injury was the switchman's negligent act in turning the switch under the engine as it was passing. In this view, the making of the "flying" switch was a mere condition of the injury, and the negligent turning of the switch the juridic cause. This disposes, not only of one phase of the question presented by the general grounds, but also controls a number of the special grounds of the motion for a new trial.

[4] 4. The testimony of one of the witnesses for the plaintiff had been taken by deposition. The defendant objected to this deposition being read, because the witness was present in court; the insistence being that he should have been put upon the stand, that he might subject him to cross-examination. The point is directly ruled against the plaintiff in error by the Supreme Court in the case of W. & A. R. Co. v. Bussey, 95 Ga. 584, 23 S. E. 207. The party taking the depositions has the right to read them, notwithstanding the presence of the witness at the trial, and, if the opposite party desires to cross-examine the witness, it is his privilege to call him to the stand for that purpose.

[5] 5. Error is assigned upon the court's stating to the jury the contentions of the plaintiff as made in her petition and as insisted on by her counsel at the trial; the insistence being that this is violative of the statute which prohibits the judge from expressing any opinion upon the facts of the case. It has been repeatedly held that this form of instruction is not violative of the statute.

[6] 6. There are several assignments of error relating to the refusal of certain written requests to charge. We have examined these carefully in connection with the general charge, and we find that, so far as they were pertinent and legal, they were fully covered. Indeed, the charge of the court is one of the most magnificent presentations of the law governing cases of this character that it has ever been our privilege to review. It was full, fair, lucid, and errorless. In fine, the case was fairly tried throughout, and while the verdict (for $15,000) is rather large, it is not excessive or beyond what the evidence authorizes. We see no ground for setting it aside.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 167*)—LIABILITY OF LANDLORD—DANGEROUS PREMISES.

The petition of the plaintiff in the court below alleged that one Joe Teaser was the tenant of the defendant. If this statement had been proved by any evidence, the verdict would have been supported as to this point, because the duty devolved upon the landlord to keep his premises in such condition as would protect the safety of his tenants, and of live stock being used by them as well. However the evidence in this case, both for plaintiff and defendant, established, without contradiction, that Joe Teaser was not the tenant of the defendant in the court below, but a trespasser, attempting to occupy the premises of the landlord without his permission or knowledge, and, under the facts appearing in the record, no duty, with reference to the safety of Joe Teaser or of the horses he was driving, devolved upon the landlord, other than that of not willfully and wantonly injuring them. Moreover the fright of the horses appears to have been the proximate cause of the injury, and this is not traceable to the presence of the open well. For these reasons the verdict was unsupported by the evidence, and a new trial should have been granted. The facts of the present case distinguish it from Bailey v. Dunaway, 8 Ga. App. 713, 70 S. E. 141.

1. CARRIERS (§ 76*) — TRANSPORTATION OF GOODS—CONVERSION BY CARRIER.

The owner of certain goods delivered them, through his agents, to a common carrier for transportation, and the agents took bill of lading therefor in their own names. When the goods arrived at destination, the agents through whom the shipment had been made refused to deliver the bill of lading to the owner of the goods; but he demanded, nevertheless, that the carrier make delivery to him. The carrier refused to deliver to him unless he would produce the bill of lading. Held, that the carrier's refusal to deliver, under the circumstances stated, did not constitute a conversion, and that the owner of the goods could not maintain bill trover against the carrier for them.

2. REPLEVIN (§ 124*) — PROCEEDINGS — BAIL TROVER—LIABILITIES ON BOND.

If the plaintiff in bail trover replevies the property in controversy, on the defendant's failure to do so, and at the trial of the case suffers nonsuit, the defendant may enter up judgment against the plaintiff and the sureties on his bond for the value of the property; and if the defendant is content with the value stated in the plaintiff's affidavit to obtain bail, no further proof or assessment of value is necessary.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by E. H. Kaufman against the Seaboard Air Line Railway and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Kaufman, being about to move from Norfolk, Va., to Atlanta, Ga., engaged Jones & Co. to crate and pack his furniture and to ship it to him at Atlanta. Jones & Co. shipped the goods by the Seaboard Air Line Railway, taking the bill of lading in their own names. They attached this bill of lading to a draft for the amount which they claimed Kaufman owed them for their services in packing and crating the goods and for freight charges paid by them on the shipment. When the goods arrived in Atlanta, Kaufman demanded them of the railway company; but delivery was refused on the ground that he did not produce the bill of lading. He claimed that the goods had not been properly packed, and that by reason of the negligence of Jones & Co. in this respect the shipment had suffered damage in excess of the amount of their charges. He therefore declined to pay the draft drawn on him by Jones & Co., and hence did not get possession of the bill of lading, so that he could produce it in response to the railway company's demands. Thereupon he brought bill trover against the railway company and its local agent; and, upon the company's refusal to replevy, the plaintiff gave bond in terms of the statute and took the goods. At the trial, the facts appearing substantially as has been stated, the court awarded nonsuit, and allowed the defendant to take judgment against the plaintiff on his bond.

for $800, the amount stated in the plaintiff's petition and affidavit for bail as the value of the goods. To this the plaintiff has excepted. There are certain other assignments of error, as to rulings on evidence; but our opinion on the main question is of such a nature as to render any decision on these minor questions unnecessary.

Jos. W. & Jno. D. Humphries and Wm. F. Phillips, for plaintiff in error. King, Spalding & Underwood, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. "The gist of the action of trover is the conversion of the plaintiff's property by the defendant; that is to say, that the defendant wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of possession." Bell v. Ober, 111 Ga. 668, 672, 36 S. E. 904, 905. That in the present case the railway company acquired the possession of the goods lawfully is conceded. The goods were delivered to it in regular course by the plaintiff's own agents. However, a conversion may consist in retaining possession lawfully acquired after the right to retain it has ended; and this is what the plaintiff contends happened in this case. So the plaintiff's right to recover depends upon whether the defendant company, as a common carrier, was justified in retaining the goods and in enforcing its demand for a production of the bill of lading as a condition precedent to delivery, against his demand that the goods be delivered to him on his claim that he was the true owner, notwithstanding the bill of lading was outstanding in the name of another. This point is settled adversely to the plaintiff in the case of Sellers v. Savannah, Florida & Western Ry. Co., 123 Ga. 386, 51 S. E. 398, where it is held that, "Inasmuch as the law imposes liability upon a common carrier when a delivery of freight is made by mistake to a person not entitled to receive the same, it is the right of the carrier to call upon an unknown person claiming a shipment to identify himself and establish his claim thereto; and where a bill of lading covering the shipment has been issued, the carrier may demand its production as a condition precedent to making delivery."

[2] 2. In bail trover, where the defendant fails or refuses to replevy and keep the possession of the goods, the plaintiff has the option of doing so. Civ. Code 1910, § 5152. However, if the plaintiff thus causes the possession of the property to be transferred from the defendant to him, he stands chargeable as for a conversion of it, unless he recovers in the suit. If the case proceeds to verdict, and the defendant prevails, he is entitled to take his choice of one of three forms of verdict, namely: (1) For the specific property; or (2) for the market value of the property at the date of the conversion, with the addition of hire or interest; or (3) for the highest proved value of the property between the date of the conversion and the date of the trial without hire or interest. And if he chooses a money verdict, he may take judgment against the plaintiff and the sureties on the replevy bond for the amount so assessed by the jury in his favor. Bank of Blakely v. Cobb, 5 Ga. App. 289, 63 S. E. 24. The defendant has a similar option if the plaintiff's action is dismissed (Marshall v. Livingston, 77 Ga. 21), or if it terminates in nonsuit (Lauchheimer v. Jacobs, 126 Ga. 261, 55 S. E. 55). The defendant in any of these events may ask for the question of value to be submitted to the jury for assessment; but, if he is content with the value sworn to by the plaintiff in his affidavit for bail, verdict is unnecessary, and he may, upon the sworn admission of the plaintiff as contained in this affidavit, take judgment against the plaintiff and his sureties for the sum stated in the affidavit, with interest thereon. See, in addition to the cases cited above, Mallory v. Moon, 180 Ga. 591, 61 S. E. 401; Block v. Tinsley, 95 Ga. 436, 22 S. E. 672; Thomas v. Price, 88 Ga. 533, 15 S. E. 11; Hayes v. Jordan, 85 Ga. 741, 11 S. E. 833, 9 L. R. A. 373; Jaques v. Stewart, 81 Ga. 82, 6 S. E. 815.

[3] 3. It is contended, however, that, though the general rule may be as has been stated, it does not apply where the defendant whose possession has been violated does not claim to own the property absolutely, but holds the possession under some special right or title; that in this case the judgment of the court below would result in grave injustice if allowed to stand, because the defendant claimed no title to the goods, but claimed only the right to hold them, in its capacity as a common carrier, until the question as to who had the right to receive them could be determined; that, as the goods were the plaintiff's, he ought not to be required to pay the defendant for them. The rule does apply, and no injustice is done. The plaintiff took the goods from the defendant's possession without having the right to do so. When his lack of right was judicially established, it was obligatory on him, under his replevy bond, to put the property or its value in money back into the defendant's hands. When, under the restitution, the defendant company takes money, instead of the property, it will hold the money on like terms as it held the property. The defendant will hold the money, not for its own ultimate benefit, but for its protection. The plaintiff by presenting the bill of lading and by identifying himself as the owner of the goods, will be entitled to receive the money from the defendant on the same terms as he would have been entitled to receive the goods. If he cannot get possession of the bill of lading because of illegal claims asserted by Jones & Co., he may take such steps in law or in equity as shall be necessary to extinguish these claims, to identify himself as the sole owner of the goods, and to give adequate protection to the defendant. These things could not be accomplished in the present action, for lack of necessary parties, if for no other reason. The only real ultimate hardship, if any, on the plaintiff, is that he will have to pay the costs; and this hardship he imposed on himself by mistaking his remedy.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SALES (§ 202*)—TRANSFER OF TITLE—"CASH SALE."

Under Civil Code 1910, § 4126, the title to cotton and certain other agricultural products sold under cash sale does not pass by delivery until the cash is in fact paid. A sale is no less a "cash sale," within the purview of this section, when so intended by the parties, because the money is not paid concurrently with the delivery, and the actual paying over of the cash is temporarily deferred to meet the convenience of the parties in making a settlement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 542-551; Dec. Dig. § 202.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 997, 998.]

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 145*)—RIGHTS AS TO THIRD PARTIES—UNDISCLOSED AGENCY.

While it is true that, if a concealed principal sues upon a contract made by his agent in the latter's name, the defendant may set off any counterclaim he has against the agent with whom he contracted as if he were the principal, whether the counterclaim grows out of the contract in question or not, still this doctrine does not apply where the person who was contracted with by the agent became the moving party and attempts to hold the concealed principal, and it appears that he who is thus moving did nothing and gave up nothing on faith of the agent's apparent principalship.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Dec. Dig. § 145.*]

3. TROVER AND CONVERSION (§ 69*)—PROCEEDINGS—MEASURE OF RECOVERY.

One who has the right of possession to personal property which is converted by a stranger, or a mere wrongdoer, may sue in trover and recover the full value of the property, though his right of possession be held under a qualified title, and only for some special purpose, such as security for a debt; still the plaintiff's recovery in such a case is held for the benefit of himself and for all others in community of title or possession with him, accordingly as their respective interests may appear. Whenever a plaintiff who, though having a right of possession, has it only for the special purpose of securing a debt, brings trover against the person for whose benefit he would, if he recovered the full value of the property, hold the overplus beyond his debt, the court, on the trial of the trover case, will adjust the matter by limiting the amount of his recovery to the amount of the debt.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by W. W. Gordon & Co. against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

P. W. Meldrin and Shelby Myrick, for plaintiff in error. W. W. Gordon, Jr., and E. S. Elliott, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. This case has been before this court previously. See 7 Ga. App. 354, 66 S. E. 988. The only point there involved (as to whether nonsuit was proper, because the plaintiff had not shown the value of the property in dispute) cuts no figure in the present record. The case is in trover. The plaintiffs, Gordon & Co., are cotton factors at Savannah. Giddens was a customer of theirs at Kirkland, Ga. On January 18, 1908, they had certain cotton of Giddens, on which they had made advances to an amount probably exceeding the value of the cotton. On that date, Giddens himself being absent from his place of business, a brother of his was in charge. A man named Stone brought in a bale of cotton, which the brother bought from him for Giddens, telling Stone that Giddens would hand him the money for it on his return to the store on the next day. This brother caused the cotton to be placed in custody of the defendant, the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, and obtained a bill of lading for it in the name of Gordon & Co. as consignees. When Giddens returned to the store and Stone requested his money Giddens refused to pay the price his brother had named, and he and Stone rescinded the trade and notified the agent of the railroad company, who at their instance issued another bill of lading, in favor of Stone as consignor, and Butler, Stevens & Co., of Savannah, as consignees. In due time the railroad company delivered the cotton, on this last bill of lading, to Butler, Stevens & Co. On January 18th Giddens (or his brother, writing in his name) sent to Gordon & Co. the bill of lading first issued for the cotton, writing them: "Please handle to best advantage. Please pay draft made to James Summerlin for $55.05." Gordon & Co. refused, however, to pay the draft mentioned, because Giddens' account was already overdrawn. There was also a contention by the plaintiff that Stone had authorized Giddens to ship the cotton to Gordon & Co. for him; he (Stone) being a concealed principal. Whether there is any legal evidence to support this contention we need not decide, in the light of what we shall decide as to the point. The value of the cotton, as found by the jury, was $47.19. The total amount due Gordon & Co. by Giddens, and upon which they based their right to have the cotton, was about $35. The plaintiffs' case was based on the theory that they had the right to the possession of the cotton by reason of the issuance of the bill of lading, and that the railroad company's action in shipping it and delivering it to Butler, Stevens & Co. was a conversion. Under an instruction from the court that, if the jury found the issues in favor of the plaintiffs, they should find for them the full value of the cotton as damages, the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $47.19. We shall not discuss the points in the order in which they are presented in the record, but will discuss the questions topically, and in such a way as to guide the court in the future trial of the case, if any be had.

[1] 1. If Stone was the true owner of the cotton, and made a cash sale of it to Giddens, or his brother, and the cash was not paid him, no title passed out of him to Giddens, and none from Giddens to the plaintiffs; and in that event the plaintiffs could not recover. In this state the title to cotton and certain other agricultural products sold on cash sale does not pass by delivery until the cash is in fact paid. Civil Code 1910, § 4126. The fact that Stone agreed to await the return of Giddens on the next day after he delivered the cotton to Giddens' brother before receiving the cash in hand did not make it a credit sale, if a cash sale was intended. McCall v. Hunter, 8 Ga. App. 612, 70 S. E. 59; Flannery v. Harley, 117 Ga. 483, 43 S. E. 785.

[2] 2. The plaintiff in error claims that there was evidence that Giddens, in shipping the cotton to Gordon & Co., was acting for Stone as concealed principal, and relies upon the doctrine that, if the concealed principal sues on a contract made by his agent, the defendant may set off any counterclaim he has against the agent with whom he contracted as principal, whether the counterclaim grew out of the contract in question or not (as to which, see Durant L. Co. v. Sinclair L. Co., 2 Ga. App. 209 [4], 58 S. E. 485, and citations). This principle would plainly have been applicable if Giddens were acting as agent for Stone as concealed principal and Gordon had honored the draft sent with the cotton, or if Stone, or any one holding under him, were attempting to hold Gordon in any wise liable for the price of the cotton; but we do not think that it is applicable here, where Gordon & Co. did nothing and gave up nothing on the faith of Giddens' ownership of the cotton. The reason of the rule does not extend to such cases, and the rule should not. Be that as it may, the only proof, so far as we see, of the existence of any such relationship between Stone and Giddens is found by implication from a declaration contained in one of Giddens' subsequent letters to Gordon & Co. As between the parties to this suit the admissions and declarations of Giddens as to such matters were mere hearsay and of no probative value.

[3] 3. But, after all, there is one absolute and controlling reason why the verdict cannot stand. Take the claims of Gordon & Co. at their highest, their only right to this cotton is to hold it for the protection of their factor's lien, for some $35. If we could concede their lien and their right to the possession of the cotton as security therefor, still it must be remembered that they are not suing a stranger to the title. The railroad company, in committing the alleged conversion, was acting on behalf of the person holding the general title to the property, and, for the purposes of this suit, stands (to speak metaphorically) in that person's shoes. It is undoubtedly true that one having a right of possession may sue a stranger or mere wrongdoer in trover, and recover the full value of the property, though his right of possession rests on only a qualified title. Such a plaintiff holds the money recovered for the benefit of himself and all others in community of possession or title with him, as their respective interests may appear. Compare Kaufman v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 73 S. E. 592, this day decided. If the defendant in the trover suit had an interest in the property, so that in the event of a recovery the plaintiff would, under the rule just mentioned, hold any money recovered wholly or partly for his (the defendant's) benefit, the rights of the respective parties may be adjusted in the trover suit, where the plaintiff elects to take a money verdict; and if the plaintiff, though having a right of possession, is entitled to hold that possession only as security for a debt, and the defendant is the one to whom the property would go after the debt is paid, the plaintiff in the trover suit can in no event recover a money judgment for more than the amount of his debt. In such cases, if the rule were otherwise, a multiplicity of suits would arise. For instance, we will say that A. has pledged an article worth $40 to B. in pawn for a debt of $10, and illegally takes it out of B.'s possession. B. sues him in trover. If he were to recover $40, the full value of the article, he would at once hold $30 for A.'s use and benefit, as to which A. might, upon demand, maintain an action for money had and received. Therefore the rule is that in all such cases the plaintiff's money verdict will be so limited as to represent his ultimate rights.

A fair application of this rule is found in those cases where property is sold on conditional sale and upon default on the purchaser's part the seller brings trover. In those cases it has been uniformly held that the plaintiff's recovery can never exceed the amount of his debt. See Elder v. Woodruff Hardware Co., 71 S. E. 806, and citations. Whenever, in a trover case, the proof shows that the interest of the plaintiff is less than absolute ownership, and the defendant is the owner of the general property, the measure of damages will be the value of the plaintiff's interest therein, whatever that may be. Holmes v. Langston, 110 Ga. 861, 867, 36 S. E. 251 (a case between pledgor and pledgee). "A creditor's recovery from his debtor in an action of trover for converting collaterals cannot exceed the amount of the debt, with legal interest." Bell v. Ober, 96 Ga. 214, 23 S. E. 7. See, generally, on the subject, Hays v. Jordan, 85 Ga. 741, 11 S. E. 833, 9 L. R. A. 373. In the case at bar, if the railroad company committed any conversion as against the plaintiffs, it did so under instructions from both Giddens and Stone, and, thus having become their agents in the matter, is entitled to justify and defend under whatever rights they would have been entitled to set up if the plaintiffs' action were proceeding against them or either of them, instead of proceeding, as it does, against the carrier. Therefore in no event should the plaintiffs' recovery exceed amount of their debt.

Judgment reversed.

1. TRIAL (§ 145*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ISSUES.

The defendant, being sued on a note, filed two pleas: (1) Non est factum; (2) what was called a plea of estoppel by conduct, misleading the defendant into a belief that the debt had been paid. The evidence established no legal defense under the second plea. Held, that the court did not err in restricting the jury to a consideration of the defense made by the other plea, as to which there was a conflict in the evidence. *Kelly v. MARTIN v. DUNBAR (No. 3,382.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 598*)—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY—NUMBER OF WITNESSES.

The right of a jury to determine the truth of an issue in case of conflict in the testimony is not dependent upon or affected by the number of witnesses testifying on the one side or the other. The verdict is supported by evidence which fully authorized the finding of the jury, and is approved by the trial judge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2450-2452; Dec. Dig. § 598*]

2. TRIAL (§ 233*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONTENTIONS OF PARTIES.

The assignment that the court erred in misstating the contentions of the parties is not supported by the record. It appears in the record that counsel for both parties agreed in open court that the only real issues involved were as they were afterwards stated to the jury in his charge; and therefore it was not error for the court, in his instructions to the jury, to state the contentions of each party, as each admitted it to be, although the oral admission differed from the pleadings in the case, especially for the reason that, while the statement of the court varied the amount contended for by each party in his pleadings, it did not affect the nature of the suit, nor the defense, and therefore could not confuse the jury. Nor could the jury have been confused by the court's incorrectly stating the amount claimed by the plaintiff in his petition, because the court, in the same connection, referred the jury to the pleadings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 233*]

3. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CURE OF ERROR.

The error of the court in stating that they should determine a certain point "from the testimony of witnesses on the stand" (without referring at that time to the consideration of the jury certain testimony which had been submitted by interrogatories) was harmless, in view of the fact that the court, later on in the charge, called specific attention to the interrogatories, and told the jury it was their duty to consider that evidence along with other testimony in the case.

EXECUTION (§ 198*)—CLAIMS OF THIRD PERSONS—EVIDENCE.

The proper practice in a claim case, where the claimant fails to put in an appearance, is either to dismiss the claim, or have the plaintiff to make out his case and take a verdict finding the property subject to the execution; and where the entry of levy on the execution recites that at the time of the levy the property levied upon was in the possession of the defendant in execution, this would make out a prima facie case in behalf of the plaintiff in fi. fa., and would cast the burden upon the claimant, and in the absence of the claimant would entitle the plaintiff in fi. fa. to a verdict finding the property levied upon subject.

Error from City Court of Leesburg; H. C. Beasley, Judge pro hac.

Claim case between the Empire Life Insurance Company and the Bank of Southwestern Georgia. From a verdict finding the property levied on subject, the bank brings error. Affirmed.

W. A. Dodson, for plaintiff in error. Tipton & Passmore, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. This was a claim case, and the only issue raised for the decision of this court is whether the trial judge erred in allowing the plaintiff in fi. fa. to join issue and take a verdict finding the property levied upon subject, where there was no appearance for the claimant. The plaintiff in error insists that the claim should have been dismissed. In National Furniture Co. v. Edwards, 105 Ga. 240, 31 S. E. 161, it is held that "the proper practice in a claim case, where the claimant fails to put in an appearance, would be either to dismiss the claim, or for the plaintiff to make out his case, before he would be entitled to a verdict or judgment subjecting the property." Under this decision, when the case was called for trial, and the claimant was absent and unrepresented, the trial judge could either have granted a motion to dismiss the claim, or have allowed the plaintiff to make out his case and take a verdict finding the property subject; and, at the instance of the plaintiff in the court below, the latter course was adopted.

Did the plaintiff make out his case? It does not appear that he introduced any evidence. The recital in the bill of exceptions is that he tendered issue, impaneled a jury, and proceeded to take a verdict finding the property subject. The execution, with the entry of the levy, was a part of the papers before the court, even if not formally introduced in evidence, and the entry of the levy made by the sheriff on the execution recited that at the time of the levy the property levied upon was in the possession of the defendant in execution. This was sufficient to make out a prima facie case, and to cast the burden upon the claimant. Where the claimant was not present to carry this burden, it seems that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict finding the property subject to the execution. Section 5170, Civil Code 1910. There was no error.

Judgment affirmed.

As all engaged in the commission of a misdemeanor are principals, one may be guilty of keeping intoxicating liquor at his place of business, or of keeping such liquor on hand at the place of business, although it is disclosed by the evidence that he was not the owner of the liquor, but merely kept it on hand as an employé or agent of the owner, at the place of business where he worked, provided that it was a public place of business.

Error from City Court of La Grange; Frank Harwell, Judge.

Shep Toles was convicted of unlawfully keeping intoxicating liquor at a place of business, and brings error. Affirmed.

E. R. Bradfield, E. A. Jones, and M. U. Moity, for plaintiff in error. Henry Reeves, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error was convicted under an accusation charging that he was guilty of unlawfully keeping on hand at his place of business alcoholic, spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquors. Exception is taken to the overruling of the motion for new trial, which contains the customary grounds, and also two assignments of error predicated upon the charge of the court. If the complaints urged against the judge's instructions to the jury are well founded, a new trial would result, even though the evidence authorized the conviction of the defendant, and for this reason we shall first consider the merits of the exceptions to the charge of the court, presented by the amended motion.

[1] Error is assigned because the court charged the jury as follows: "I charge you, gentlemen, that it is a violation of the law for a person to keep on hand intoxicating liquors at his place of business at any time. It is a violation of the law to keep it on hand when it is open to the public for business; and it is a violation to keep it on hand when it is closed. The decision cited by counsel only applies when the place of business is used as a residence and also as a place of business." We find no error in this charge. It is a violation of the law for a person to keep on hand intoxicating liquors at his place of business when it is closed, as well as when it is open to the public for the purposes of business, and it is not error for the court so to instruct the jury. The evidence in this case showed that at least a portion of the whisky which was found in the place of business where the defendant worked was placed there in his absence, and after the place had been closed for the night, and this place of business had not been opened the next morning when the officers entered it through the window; so there was no direct evidence that the intoxicants which the officers found had been kept on hand during the hours when the place of business was open. The purpose of the provision of the general prohibition law now under consideration was to prohibit the carrying of intoxicating liquors into a place of business and keeping it on hand during those hours when it was closed, as well as during the hours when it was open. The presence of the intoxicants either by night or day might afford a pretext by which other violations of the statute would be excused. The ruling in the Land Case, 5 Ga. App. 98, 62 S. E. 685, is not applicable to this case. The ruling in that case dealt with the peculiar facts disclosed by the record, but the dissimilarity between the Land Case and the case at bar is apparent, in that it appeared in the Land Case that there was a portion of the day when Land's place of business was devoted to no other but private use, being a room used as his sleeping apartment. In the present case there is no suggestion that the poolroom where the whisky was found was at night closed for all purposes other than private use.

[2] 2. As all engaged in the commission of a misdemeanor are principals, one may be guilty of keeping intoxicating liquors at his place of business, or of keeping liquor on hand at the place of business, although it is disclosed by the evidence that the accused was not the owner of the liquor, but merely kept the intoxicating liquor on hand as an employé or agent of the owner at the place of business where he worked, provided that it was a public place of business. According to the evidence, Shep Toles, the defendant, was perhaps only an employé of one Yarbrough, and employed by him to run the poolroom and other accessories of the business. It is uncontradicted that none of the whisky that was found was directed or marked in his name, though all of it was so marked as to indicate clearly an ownership by others. So it is not perfectly plain that the defendant had an interest in the ownership of the whisky. But, granting that he had none, there was evidence to the effect that he kept the place of business for Yarbrough; and it is very plain, from the quantity of empty whisky barrels, similar to those found to be full, that Toles not only knew that whisky was being kept at the place of business, but aided as an employé in keeping it on hand.

The point is made that the evidence shows that the poolroom, if a place of business at all, belonged to Yarbrough, and that, being Yarbrough's place of business, it would not be an offense, under the terms of the general prohibition law, for another person (Toles, for instance), who merely worked or was employed there, to keep intoxicating liquors on hand at such place of business, for the reason that the statute only forbids that one shall keep intoxicating liquors on hand at his own place of business, and, if this place of business belonged to Yarbrough, then Toles would violate no law by keeping intoxicating liquor on hand there. Upon this subject we approve the charge of the court, which was as follows: "In order for you to find the defendant guilty, it would not be necessary to show that the defendant was the owner of the liquor which was found, if any was found. If the jury should find from the evidence that it was Yarbrough's business, that he was owner of the liquor which was found, if any was found, and if they further found that defendant, as an employé or agent of Yarbrough, being hired by Yarbrough to run the business, kept intoxicating liquor on hand at this place of business where he worked, and the same was a public place of business, in Troup county, on or about the date alleged in the accusation, he would be guilty of a violation of the law." The instructions of the judge follow our ruling in Hendrix v. State, 5 Ga. App. 819, 63 S. E. 939, in which we held that, "where the evidence showed that the intoxicating liquors sold or furnished at the place of business in question was in entire charge of the accused, it is not error for the judge to instruct the jury that if the defendant assented to the furnishing of the intoxicating liquor he might be found guilty." The two cases are so similar that the ruling in the Hendrix Case is controlling in this.

[3] 8. Furthermore, in contemplation of the general prohibition law, even a menial employed by another may have a place of business. His business may consist only of discharging the duties devolving upon him under the terms of his employment, and the place of business of his employer may be his own place of business, if this be the place where his duties are performed.

[4] 4. There being no merit in the assignments of error upon the charges of the court, it is very plain that the jury were authorized, under the evidence adduced, to convict the defendant. While it is true that apparently the 16 barrels of whisky found in the poolroom run by him had been shipped to others than himself, and were found marked in their name, and granting that the poolroom where the whisky was found was owned by Yarbrough, still there was evidence that Toles was employed to manage and run the poolroom, and that he did so. The evidence does not disclose whether Toles was jointly interested in the ownership of the whisky, or of the poolroom, or was only an employé; but there are a number of circumstances in the evidence which would have authorized the jury to infer that Toles assented to the keeping of the whisky on hand in his place of business in which he was interested, and certainly that he aided in keeping and furnishing intoxicating liquor at a public place, if being in charge of this poolroom, as testified, he permitted it to be kept there. The evidence authorized the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from City Court of Statesboro; H. A. Boykin, Judge.

Action by A. J. Bird against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Lawton & Cunningham and Alex. R. Lawton, 3d, for plaintiff in error. Deal & Renfro and J. D. Kirkland, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Bird recovered a verdict from the Central of Georgia Railway Company in the city court of Statesboro for $3,052.58 as damages, the value of 41 bales of cotton which were consumed by fire while in a car of the defendant company, and the case is here on exceptions to the judgment overruling the defendant's motion for a new trial. The facts briefly stated are as follows: Bird, the owner of the 41 bales of cotton, placed them in the Farmers' Union Warehouse at Metter, Ga., marked for shipment to Savannah, Ga. This warehouse was located within 3 or 4 yards of the track of the defendant company and between 300 and 400 yards from its depot. The defendant company, in pursuance of a custom and under agreement it had with the warehouse company, placed a car for the reception of this cotton near the warehouse; it being the purpose of the owner of the cotton that it should be transported to Savannah the day after the car was loaded with the cotton. The agents of the warehouse loaded the car with the cotton, and in the afternoon, having completed the loading, closed the door of the car, but did not seal it. The evidence was in conflict as to whose duty it was to seal the door of the car, whether that of the agents of the warehouse or that of the agents of the defendant company. The loading of the car was completed in the afternoon about 5 o'clock. On the same night, between 10 and 11 o'clock, the car with the cotton was entirely consumed by fire. A mixed freight and passenger train passed between 12 and 1 o'clock in the daytime while the car was being loaded. The next and only train that passed before the fire was a passenger train, which passed at 5:45 o'clock p. m. The agents of the warehouse company who did the loading testified that neither one of them smoked; that there were no matches about the car, and nothing else by which the cotton could have been ignited, so far as they could discover, when they closed the car and left it. It was proved by the railroad company that at the point where the car was located, although the track was up-grade, on account of its proximity to the depot, where both the freight and passenger trains were stopped, no sparks were emitted by either one of the engines of this train; the engineers of both trains testifying that their engines were simply rolling as they passed the warehouse, and that engines never emit sparks when rolling, but only when they are working. The first freight train upon which the cotton could have been moved after it had been loaded in the car was one on the next day, which was expected to take up the car for the purpose of transporting it to Savannah, its destination, and this train was expected to pass Metter on the next day between 10 and 11 o'clock in the morning.

A contract was introduced in evidence between the Farmers' Union Warehouse and the Central of Georgia Railway Company, by the terms of which the railway company agreed to issue "its regular cotton bills of lading on cars by the said Farmers' Union Warehouse at cotton warehouse situated upon the side track of the said railway company at Metter, Ga., upon the written statement of the said Farmers' Union Warehouse, their agents or employes, as to the consignor, consignee, destination, number of bales, and marks of all cotton so loaded at cotton warehouse," upon certain conditions as to the method of loading and as to the care and diligence of the warehouse company to see that the cars were in a proper and "clean condition, that is, free from anything likely to damage the cotton, such as loose matches, waste, oil, filth, etc., and [should] have the end windows of the cars closed, stripped, and sealed in a proper manner," and that when the cars had been loaded the Farmers' Union Warehouse should cause the doors thereof to "be also closed, sealed, and stripped in a proper manner." There was also introduced in evidence an agreement between the railway company and the Farmers' Union Warehouse that the former should pay the latter stipulated amounts for its services in loading the cars. There was no evidence that any bill of lading was issued for the cotton to the warehouse company, or to the shipper.

There was no evidence that the railroad company had been notified after the loading of the car that it was ready for shipment; but the evidence is undisputed that the bales of cotton were marked for destination, that the cotton was to be shipped by the first freight train passing on the next day, that the custom of the company was to deliver the cars to an adjacent entrance into the warehouse for the purpose of having the warehouse agents to load the cotton thereon, that this cotton was loaded on the car which the railway company placed there on the day the cotton was burned, and the value of the cotton was proved.

Under this evidence the attorney for the railroad company contends: (1) That there was no delivery of the cotton to the railway company in its capacity of a common carrier, nor any delivery to it as a warehouseman; and (2) that there was no evidence whatever that any spark from a passing engine consumed the cotton, or that it was destroyed by any negligence of the railway company or its agents.

Did the facts show delivery to the railway company, and, if so, was that delivery to the company as a common carrier, or as a warehouseman? Of course, if it was delivered to the railway company in its capacity of a common carrier, the plaintiff was entitled to recover upon proof of ownership, delivery, and loss. The question is not free from doubt, but our opinion is, under the law, that the facts show a delivery to the railway company as a common carrier. Civil Code, 1910, § 2730, declares that "the responsibility of a carrier commences with the delivery of the goods either to himself or his agent, or at a place where he is accustomed or agrees to receive them." Whom did the warehouse company represent in loading the cotton on the car? Did it represent the railway company, the owner of the cotton, or both? It was unquestionably the agent of the owner in receiving the cotton into its warehouse, but it seems to us plain that it was the agent of the company in loading the cotton from the warehouse on the company's car. The company by a written contract created this relationship between it and the warehouse company, so far as the loading of the cotton was concerned. It stipulated that the loading was to be done by the warehouse company and how it was to be done, and it had agreed to pay the warehouse company compensation for the work of loading the car. In addition to this, it seems to us, from the fact that the car was placed by the railway company near the warehouse, where it was accustomed to place it, and where it had agreed to place it for the warehouse, for the purpose of having it loaded by the warehouse agents with cotton for shipment, that when the cotton was loaded on the car at that place, it was a delivery to the railway company. When the cotton got out of the warehouse and into the car of the railway company, it got into the control and custody of the railway company and out of the control and custody of the warehouse company. We think the delivery in this case under the facts was an actual delivery, and that it was accepted by the railway company. Certainly there was such constructive and implied delivery and acceptance as would make the railway company liable as a carrier.

It is insisted that there was no complete delivery, because there was something else for the shipper to do, and that no bill of lading had been issued by the company, and that there could not be in law a complete delivery until a bill of lading had been issued. The responsibility of the company as a carrier began with the completion of the delivery by the warehouse company, whether a bill of lading had or had not been issued at that time. 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1403, and citations. In this case the bill of lading, according to the evidence, was to have been delivered to the warehouse company for the shipper. The evidence does not disclose who was to pay the freight on the cotton, or whether or not the freight had been paid. Indeed, it fails to disclose anything that the shipper was required to do, except to put the cotton into the hands of the warehouse company marked for transportation, depending upon the warehouse company and the railway company to load the car and complete the transportation. Where cattle have been placed in the company's pen for immediate shipment, and part of them have actually been loaded on the cars, the cattle are in the custody of the company as a carrier, and not as a warehouseman. 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1404, and citations.

In the view we take of the case, it makes little difference whose agent the warehouse company was, whether that of the shipper or of the railway company, for we think the placing of the car by the company at the warehouse, and the loading of the cotton on the car marked for its destination and for immediate shipment, constituted a delivery and acceptance by the railway company as a common carrier. The evidence is undisputed that the cotton was to be shipped the next day on the first freight train, the very first opportunity for shipment. This, in our opinion, makes an immediate shipment in the meaning of that term, for it was to be shipped on the very first train of the company that passed Metter after the car had been loaded, on the morning of the next day. It has also been held that goods stored along the line of a railway company awaiting shipment, where the owner is to load them when he gets a car, are not delivered to the company until they are so loaded and ready for shipment. In the case of Fleming v. Hammond, 19 Ga. 145, it is held that "if the owner of a boat directs cotton to be left at a particular landing on the river, agreeing to receive it there, a deposit of the cotton at that place constitutes a good delivery." It is also held in Packard v. Getman, 6 Cow. N. Y. 757, 16 Am. Dec. 475, that "where a railroad company furnishes a car for the purpose of being loaded, and assents to the placing of goods therein, the goods are as much in the possession of the company as if they had been delivered in its warehouse for shipment, and the company is liable where they are thereafter destroyed by fire, though it occurs before a bill of lading has been signed." See, also, to the same effect, East Line R. Co. v. Hall, 64 Tex. 620. In 5 Amer. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 190, it is said that "it is sufficient for the plaintiff to show that the goods were delivered to a person and at a house where goods were accustomed to be left for the carrier." "Delivery to a drayman, or other servant of the company, who is accustomed to collect and receive goods for the company at the places of business of its patrons, is a delivery to the company." 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1406.

It is insisted by learned counsel for the railway company that the company had no notice, either actual or constructive, of the delivery of the goods. If the deposit is made in the usual manner at the place where goods have been constantly received for transportation, a railroad company may, it seems, be charged with constructive notice, even though the delivery was not made to any of its servants. The evidence in this case shows that the cotton was delivered at the place where the railroad company was accustomed to receive it. It was delivered on one of its own cars. On the very day on which the cotton was consumed the car had been taken by the railroad company and placed in front of the warehouse for the purpose of having it loaded with the cotton, and the loading was to be done by the agents of the warehouse company, which the railway company had in writing constituted its agent for that purpose. These facts bring it squarely within the principle of the ruling that where a railroad company had erected a platform on which, in the usual course of business, cotton was stored for shipment by the next train, and the cotton was destroyed by fire set by one of the company's locomotives, the shipper could recover as from a carrier. And where it was the custom to deposit cotton in the street beside the railroad company's platform, or in the company's cotton yard, a delivery there was held sufficient. 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1411. It is needless to cite other authority, for under the authorities already cited, applied to the facts of this case, it must be conceded that the cotton, when it was consumed by fire, was in the possession of the railroad company, having been delivered and received by it as a common carrier for immediate transportation.

This conclusion having been reached, it is, of course, unnecessary to consider the other question, for the railway company as a common carrier is liable for the full value of the cotton consumed by fire while in its possession, unless the fire was caused by the act of God or the public enemy.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 213*)—MORTGAGE BY WIFE—ENFORCEMENT—EVIDENCE.

There being sufficient evidence to authorize the inference that the making of the note and deed by the wife to secure a loan to her was merely a colorable scheme by which her separate estate was to be subjected to the debts of her husband, it was error to direct the verdict for the plaintiff. Even if the evidence could be said to preponderate in favor of the plaintiff, the verdict directed was not demanded, for there was testimony upon which the jury might have found that the plaintiff advanced the money, knowing that it was to be used to pay the husband's debts, including his debt to the bank, and that the entire transaction was a collusive scheme by which the statute against suretyship on the part of married women might be evaded. *Central Bank v. VOLUNTEER STATE LIFE INS. CO. v. BUCHANNAN. (No. 3,280.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INSURANCE (§§ 121, 668*) — ACTIONS ON POLICIES—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

In this state the rule is well settled that a person has a right to procure an insurance policy on his own life, and to assign it to another who has no insurable interest on his life, provided it be not done by way of cover for a wager policy; and the intention of the insured in taking out the policy and in making the assignment, and of the assignee in accepting the assignment, are questions of fact for determination by the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 166, 167; Dec. Dig. §§ 121, 668.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 665*)—ACTIONS ON POLICIES—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

There is some evidence in the present case tending to show that the policy contract was valid, and that the assignment thereof was made in good faith for a valuable consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 665.*]

3. ASSIGNMENT OF POLICY—ESTOPPEL OF INSURER.

Where the evidence shows that an assignment or sale by the insured of a policy of insurance to one who had no insurable interest on his life was made with the knowledge of the insurance company, and the company subsequently received the premiums directly from the assignee for three years, and the policy provided that after two years it would be incontestable on any ground, would not the company be estopped from contesting the validity of the policy? And, even if not estopped, could the company make any contest of the validity without first tendering back the premiums which it had received from the assignee of the policy?

4. INSURANCE (§ 213*)—ASSIGNMENTS—PROOF OF INTEREST OF ASSIGNEE.

Where the assignment of a policy of insurance provides that "the assignment was subject to proof of interest of the assignee," and the evidence shows that the assignee made timely proof of loss, in which he stated that he held the policy as an absolute purchaser for value, and not as collateral security, and subsequently, in reply to letters from the company asking for proof of interest, wrote to the company that his interest was that of an absolute purchaser for value, and repeated the same statement to the special agent of the company, who was sent to him by the company for the purpose of finding out the interest of the assignee and making a settlement with him of the policy, this would be a substantial compliance with the provision of the assignment requiring proof of interest by the assignee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 483; Dec. Dig. § 213.*]

5. INSURANCE (§ 653*)—ACTIONS ON POLICIES—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

There was no error in excluding the testimony of the agent of the insurance company, through whom the application for the policy was made, to the effect that he disapproved the policy because in his opinion it was a wager policy, and in also rejecting the testimony that in the town where the insured lived there was a great deal of speculation in policies of insurance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1678, 1679; Dec. Dig. § 653.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

The exceptions made to portions of the charge are without merit, and the written requests were substantially covered by the general instructions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

7. NO ERROR—EVIDENCE SUFFICIENT.

No error of law appears, and the verdict is supported by some evidence.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

8. INSURANCE (§ 669*)—ACTIONS ON POLICIES—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action on a life policy, an instruction, following the terms of the contract, that the policy would be incontestable after the expiration of two years, except that the insured participate in the military service, the army or navy, in connection with instructions that unless the jury found that the contract was a valid contract it would not be applicable, because if it was a wager contract it was void ab initio, was not erroneous.

Error from City Court of Americus; C. R. Crisp, Judge.

Action by G. E. Buchanan against the Volunteer State Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Smith & Carswell and R. L. Maynard, for plaintiff in error. E. A. Hawkins, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. This was a suit on an insurance policy, to recover the face value of the policy, besides interest, attorney's fees, and damages, as provided for in sections 2549 and 4392 of the Civil Code of 1910. The policy of insurance was written on the life of Davis P. Holt, and by its terms was payable to his estate or assigns. It was dated April 26, 1906, was for $5,000, and was duly transferred and assigned to the plaintiff for a valuable consideration on May 8, 1906. The insured died in November, 1909, and proofs of death, as required by the contract, were made by the assignee of the policy and presented to the insurance company, and demand made upon it by the assignee for payment of the amount of the policy. The evidence also showed that the insurance company had received directly from the assignee the premiums due on the policy for the time for which it was in force until the death of the insured, and that when the assignment was made the company had due notice and consented to it. The foregoing facts are not controverted. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of the policy, refusing to find in favor of the claim for attorney's fees and damages, and the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled.

[4] Two defenses were relied upon. First, it was claimed by the insurance company that the assignee had not complied with the terms of the assignment; it being provided therein that the assignment was subject to proof of interest of the assignee. The assignment does not provide how this proof of interest shall be made. The evidence shows as to this matter that in the proof of loss the plaintiff claimed that he was entitled to the amount of the policy as the "absolute owner," by virtue of the assignment. A few days subsequently, in replying to letters from the insurance company asking for information as to his interest, he wrote that he was the absolute owner of the policy, having bought the same outright for a valuable consideration, and subsequently, when the special agent of the company was sent to him for the purpose of obtaining more definite information on this subject, and for the further purpose of adjusting the loss, the plaintiff repeated what he had already written to the company, that he was in fact the absolute owner of the policy for a valuable consideration, that he had bought it outright, and that he did not hold it as collateral security for any indebtedness which the insured owed him. We think this evidence shows that there was a compliance with this provision of the policy. We do not see how there could have been a more definite and specific compliance than was made both in the letters written to the company on the subject and in the information directly given to the special agent.

[1, 2] The second defense relied upon, and which was the principal defense, was the contention of the company that the contract of insurance was invalid because it was a wagering contract; that the insured and the plaintiff (the assignee) had entered into an agreement that the insured should apply for the policy, and that after it had been obtained he would transfer it to the plaintiff in consideration of an advancement made the insured by the plaintiff of a sum of $300 or $400; that the insured was not able to pay the first premium, and in compliance with this mutual agreement made the application through the agent of the company; that when the policy was delivered to the insured he went to the assignee for the money to pay the first premium, and the money was advanced to him by the plaintiff for the purpose of paying the premium, and that three or four days thereafter the assignment was made in consideration of this advance and in performance of the previous agreement between the two in reference thereto, that the plaintiff knew that the insured, at the time he made the application for insurance, was a habitual drunkard, and knew that he was in a delicate state of health, and would probably die prematurely from the excessive use of liquor, and on this account the plaintiff was willing to hazard the premiums on the policy of insurance, with the hope and belief that he (the plaintiff) as the assignee, would in a short time receive the full amount of the policy; in short, that the policy was taken out by Holt and the assignment made by him to the plaintiff for the purpose of evading the law in reference to gambling contracts, and the means adopted were simply a cover for a wager policy.

As to this defense it may be stated that there were some strong circumstances tending to show that it was the truth of the transaction, except as to the charge that the insured was a habitual drunkard. This fact was not proved; but it was shown by circumstances that Holt was unable to pay the first premium, and that he did make application to the plaintiff for the money out of which the first premium was paid. But the plaintiff swears positively that Holt came to him with the policy and offered to sell it to him for $300, and after some negotiations he did buy outright the policy from Holt, and held it under a written assignment, which was subsequently approved by the company; and he gave the $300 to Holt and took the assignment in ignorance of the fact that the premium had not been paid. There is other testimony which bears more or less on this defense, but the question was one exclusively for consideration by the jury. The learned trial judge clearly and fully charged the law as laid down by the Supreme Court in the case of Rylander v. Allen, 125 Ga. 206, 53 S. E. 1032, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 128, that "one has the right to procure insurance on his own life and assign the policy to another, who has no insurable interest in the life insured, provided it be not done by way of cover for a wager policy."

The law which controls this question of wager contracts of insurance is so fully and clearly set out in the learned and elaborate opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Fish in the decision which is cited that it will be unnecessary to add any other authority or to discuss the question any further. The law, therefore, having been correctly charged by the court, and the question of the intent with which the policy was taken out and assigned being a matter for the jury exclusively, this court cannot interfere, unless there was in the trial of the case some material and prejudicial error against the defendant. We have examined the special assignments of error very carefully and will dispose of them briefly.

[5] 1. In support of the contention by the defendant that the contract in question was a wager contract, testimony is offered that the local agent of the company, through whom the application for the insurance was made, had expressed himself as being opposed to writing this kind of insurance (meaning speculative), and that in the years 1905 and 1906 there was a good deal of speculative insurance written in Americus, the home of the applicant in this case. We think the testimony was inadmissible and immaterial for the purpose of showing that the contract in question was a wager contract, and that the citations relied upon in support of the admissibility of the evidence are not in point. The authorities cited are to the effect that other transactions than the one under investigation may in some cases be admitted for the purpose of illustrating intention. Mutual Life Insurance Company v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 6 Sup. Ct. 913, 29 L. Ed. 1000; Small v. Williams, 87 Ga. 681, 13 S. E. 589; 6 Enc. of Evidence, p. 23.

[6] 2. Several written requests to charge were duly made by the defendant. The instructions requested were pertinent to the defense, if the contract in question was a wager contract, and was therefore void. We have examined these requests in connection with the general instructions, and we find that they are fully—indeed, most favorably to the insurance company—covered by the general instructions on that subject, and it would have been superfluous reiteration for the court to have given them in charge.

[6] 3. It is also contended that the court erred in charging the jury that under the terms of the contract of insurance "it would be incontestable after the expiration of two years, except that the insured participate in the military service—the army or navy.” It is said this instruction was not applicable to the facts of the case and was prejudicial to the defendant. This was the provision of the contract, and the court gave it in connection with the instruction that, unless the jury found that the contract was a valid contract, it would not be applicable, because, if it was a wager contract, it was void ab initio. The instruction objected to, therefore, was beneficial to the defendant, for otherwise the jury might have inferred that after two years (and it was undisputed that the contract had been in force for more than two years), it was incontestable, even if they found it was a wager contract. Besides, one of the defenses relied upon as to which some evidence was introduced, but which, as before stated, was not satisfactorily proved, was that the insured at the time he took out the policy was a habitual drunkard, and it was contended that, if this was true, he falsely represented the condition of his habits to the company, and for this reason the policy was void. The charge, therefore, as to its being incontestable after two years was referable to this defense.

[7] The foregoing is a brief discussion of the essential questions raised by the record. After a careful examination of the evidence and the charge of the court, and also the law applicable, we have come to the conclusion that the court committed no error in the trial, and that, while there were some strong circumstances tending to establish the defense that the contract was a wager contract, yet there was positive evidence on the part of the plaintiff to the contrary; and, as this was a matter exclusively for the decision of the jury, the judgment of the lower court in refusing a new trial must be affirmed.

FORD v. STATE. (No. 3,806.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DRUNKARDS (§ 10*)—OFFENSES.

A violation of the statute which forbids one to be drunk or intoxicated within the curtilage of any private residence which is not in his exclusive possession may be manifested by the indecent condition or acting of such intoxicated person. The indecent condition may exist in the degree of the intoxication, even if there is no harmful act perpetrated by the accused and no unbecoming language or loud and violent discourse.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drunkards, Cent. Dig. §§ 10, 11; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

2. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the judgment of guilty.

Error from City Court of Valdosta; J. G. Cranford, Judge.

Fred Ford was convicted of drunkenness and brings error. Affirmed.

G. A. Whitaker and S. M. Varnedoe, for plaintiff in error. Jas. M. Johnson, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. [1, 2] The only question presented by this record is whether the mere fact that the defendant went to the private dwelling house of another in such an intoxicated condition that, in attempting aimlessly to grab at a little child, he fell in the middle of the floor, and thereafter, without resistance on his part, was ejected from the residence. The point is made that there can be no violation of the act of 1905 (Acts 1905, p. 114), which forbids any person appearing drunk or intoxicated on any public street or within the curtilage of any private residence, unless the intoxication is made manifest by some act or language on the part of the intoxicated person. Counsel cite the rulings of this court in Coleman v. State, 3 Ga. App. 298, 59 S. E. 829, Dorsey v. State, 7 Ga. App. 366, 372, 66 S. E. 1096, and Haines v. State, 8 Ga. App. 631, 70 S. E. 84, in support of this position. There is no ruling in any of these cases upon the precise point here presented, and certainly nothing which conflicts with the view that the language of the statute which declares that the intoxicated condition may be manifested by indecent condition is for any reason to be disregarded.

In the Coleman Case, supra, it is true that the defendant was shown to have been guilty of using profane language and of doing other acts which clearly demonstrated that he was drunk, and in the opinion Judge Hill was dealing with the facts as presented. But the statement that “the purpose of the statute is to protect the public streets and highways and private residences, not so much from the presence of the drunkard as from the conduct of the drunkard as described in the act,” cannot be construed as a ruling directed in any sense to that portion of the statute which declares that the intoxication may be manifested by indecent condition alone; for, in commenting on the evidence, Judge Hill states that in the case under discussion the plaintiff in error “made clearly manifest his drunken condition by boisterousness, by indecent condition and acting, and by loud and violent discourse.” The Coleman Case was one in which the numerous acts of the defendant overshadowed any reference to his condition, and pretermitted any necessity for reference to that portion of the statute; but there is certainly nothing said in the opinion that could warrant the conclusion that the intoxication forbidden by the statute might not be manifested by the indecent condition of the accused, without anything more being shown.

The same is true as to the comments of the writer in Dorsey v. State, 7 Ga. App. 366, 372, 66 S. E. 1096, which is cited. The statement in the Dorsey Case, that "one may be intoxicated without violating the statute, provided he is guilty of no act which violates public decency," is not exclusive of such an act as would be committed if one went to the private dwelling house of another in such a condition of beastly intoxication as to violate every rule of decency and propriety. The going is an act. The appearing within the curtilage of a dwelling house is an act on the part of the person who appears, and the indecency would depend largely upon the degree of the intoxication. The intoxication might, of itself, be so complete as to evidence an "indecent condition."

In the Haines Case, 8 Ga. App. 627, 70 S. E. 84, reference was made to the specific charge upon which the defendant was being tried, and to the fact that one of the acts specifically mentioned in the statute was the use of vulgar, profane, and unbecoming language. But in a subsequent portion of the opinion, the writer said that "to appear in an intoxicated condition in any portion of the area inclosed by the curtilage, whether within or without the dwelling house, is a violation of the statute." It is true that the question then under discussion was whether the law penalized drunkenness in a dwelling house, inasmuch as the language used in the statute was "within the curtilage of any private residence"; but the language quoted from the decision clearly indicates the opinion of this court that it was the intention of the Legislature to penalize the appearance of any one so intoxicated as to be in any way offensive, by reason of such intoxicated condition, to others at any dwelling house not his own. In the opinion of the writer, laws directed against the abuse of intoxicants cannot be too strictly enforced. The writ of error is without merit.

CARRIERS (§ 69*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—ACTION FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT.

The court did not err in sustaining the general demurrer and dismissing the plaintiff's petition. The petition, as amended, was fatally defective, in that it was not alleged that the special contract for milling in transit privilege was within the power or authority of the defendant to grant. Under Act Cong. June 29, 1906, c. 3591, § 4 Stat. 584 (U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 892; Supp. 1909, p. 1149) regulating interstate transportation, a carrier could not grant this special contract, unless the rate had been approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The petition did not allege that the special milling in transit privilege, at the special rate mentioned, had been established by the defendant and included in the schedule of rates, and published as required by the act of Congress above referred to, nor allege that such privilege or the rate mentioned was open to all shippers under like conditions, or that the charges agreed to be made on the interstate transportation mentioned had been fixed and regulated in accordance with law, and therefore that the defendant was under duty to the plaintiff to make shipments for it in accordance with the contract.

POWELL, J. [2] The general theory of the plaintiffs' case was that the defendants contracted to act as their sales agents and to aid them in the distribution of their melon crops, by directing them how and where to ship and sell most advantageously, and that they breached this contract by negligently advising them, so that they shipped the melons to places where, on account of market conditions, a fair price could not be obtained. Evidence that the melons could have been disposed of at the initial point for sums largely in excess of the price at which these sales agents sold them at the places to which they directed the melons to be shipped had some relevancy toward establishing the negligence thus charged by the plaintiffs against the defendants; and the court did not err in admitting the testimony.

[3] Under the contract the defendants agreed to make reports of sales. The plaintiffs offered in evidence certain writings, purporting to be sales reports made by the defendants and signed in their name, proving that they came by due course of mail, in envelopes bearing the defendants' return card, and postmarked at their address. The defendants objected on the ground of lack of sufficient proof of execution. As no other sales accounts were received, and as in the absence of these reports the defendants had not accounted for these shipments at all, the error, if any, was not prejudicial.

[1] Other similar errors are complained of; but, without going into detail (for no novel or important point is presented), we may say, in fine, that the evidence, while not demanding the verdict, authorized it, and that, even if any errors were made, they were harmless.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FENCES (§ 28*)—MALICIOUS DESTRUCTION—EVIDENCE.

While good faith may be pleaded as a defense by one prosecuted under Pen. Code 1910, § 781, for maliciously and willfully injuring and destroying private property, a mere assertion of ownership, though made at the time the property is injured or destroyed, and subsequently repeated, does not demand a finding that the accused acted under an honest claim of right, especially so in the absence of any evidence to support such claim.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fences, Cent. Dig. §§ 62-67; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

2. FENCES (§ 28*)—MALICIOUS DESTRUCTION.

One guilty of maliciously injuring and destroying the private property of another, to wit, "a certain plank and board fence," on his farm, "by then and there tearing down said fence, and by splitting and destroying the plank and boards of said fence," may be prosecuted and convicted under Penal Code 1910, § 781.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fences, Cent. Dig. §§ 62-67; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 786*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PRISONER'S STATEMENT.

It is not error to instruct the jury, in reference to the prisoner's statement, that they may believe it in whole or in part, in preference to the evidence, nor to add: "It is a question entirely for you to say just what weight and credit, if any, you will give to the statement."

4. FENCES (§ 28*)—MALICIOUS DESTRUCTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

In the present case it was not error, prejudicial to the accused, to charge that "the title to the land in question will not in any way be affected by your verdict in this case. We cannot settle disputes to titles to land in this court."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fences, Cent. Dig. §§ 62-67; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

5. FENCES (§ 28*)—WILLFUL DESTRUCTION—EVIDENCE.

Where it appears that the property described in the indictment was the private property of the person therein named, and that it was willfully injured or destroyed in manner and form as alleged, a prima facie case is made out for the state.

6. REVIEW.

No error of law appears, and the evidence warranted the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Wayne County; C. B. Conyers, Judge.

W. S. Woods was convicted of willfully destroying a fence. From an affirmance on certiorari, he brings error. Affirmed.

Wilson, Bennett & Lambdin, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Thomas, Sol. Gen., for the State.

POTTLE, J. The accused was tried and convicted in the county court under an indictment based upon Penal Code 1910, § 781, charging that he had willfully and maliciously injured and destroyed a plank and board fence, the private property of one Broadhurst, located on his farm, known as the "Moody Place." The judge of the superior court refused, on certiorari, to disturb the verdict, and this is the error assigned.

[1] 1. The evidence for the state showed that the land on which the fence in question was located was the property of the prosecutor, Broadhurst. The fence had been built by him several years before the transaction referred to in the indictment took place, and during all this time was in the possession of the prosecutor and claimed by him. The accused owned the adjoining farm. On or about the time alleged in the indictment he injured and destroyed a portion of the fence by sawing out of the plank sections about six inches long and pulling down a portion of the fence. Other portions fell down after having been sawed through, as above described. The accused claimed that he owned the land upon which the fence was located. He told the prosecutor and one or two others that he intended to tear down the fence, because it was on his land. His counsel insist that the evidence demanded a finding that he destroyed the fence under an honest claim of right, and that for this reason his conviction was unauthorized. Good faith is peculiarly a question for the jury. The accused introduced no evidence of his title or previous possession of the disputed land, but contented himself merely with proof of his own prior declarations in reference to his claim of ownership. A mere claim of ownership could not excuse him, nor would it be conclusive evidence of good faith. Certainly one cannot justify an injury to his neighbor's dwelling, in which he has resided for many years, upon mere proof that at the time the injury was done the perpetrator of the act said the dwelling was his, and not his neighbor's, without offering something in support of his claim of ownership other than his own assertion of title. The jury had a right to find in the present case that the claim of the accused was a mere pretext, and not made in good faith. The judge of the superior court has approved their verdict on certiorari, and this court cannot say that there was not some evidence to justify this finding.

[2] 2. It is further contended that, while the acts of the accused may have amounted to an indictable trespass, under Penal Code 1910, § 216, par. 3, he cannot be convicted under section 718. Counsel rely upon the language of Mr. Justice Simmons in Crockett v. State, 80 Ga. 105, 4 S. E. 254, to the effect that the law now embodied in Penal Code 1910, § 781, does not embrace any crime already defined in the Penal Code. In that case the accused was indicted for setting fire to a dwelling house and convicted of malicious mischief. The Supreme Court held that his motion in arrest of judgment should have been sustained, because the offense for which he was convicted was not involved in the indictment. In the present case there was neither demurrer nor motion in arrest. The indictment charges the offense generally, in the language of section 781, and then specifically describes the particular act complained of. So there can be no doubt that the grand jury intended to charge a violation of this particular section. The real complaint of the plaintiff in error is against the indictment, and the point should have been raised by motion to quash, or at least by motion in arrest. So far as this point is concerned, a new trial under this indictment would be of no benefit to the accused. But Penal Code 1910, § 216, par. 3, makes criminal only "the pulling down or removing any fence or inclosure," and the act need not be willful. Shrouder v. State, 121 Ga. 615, 617, 49 S. E. 702. Here the charge is more comprehensive, and involves some elements not covered by the section last mentioned.

[3] 3. Complaint is made that in charging upon the prisoner's statement the court used this language: "They may believe it in whole or in part, or they may disregard it entirely, or they may believe it in preference to the sworn testimony in the case, if they see proper to do so. It is a question entirely for you to say just what weight and credit, if any, you will give to the statement." In Smith v. State, 8 Ga. App. 680, 682, 70 S. E. 42, this court said: "It must be understood that the jury has the right to believe the accused's statement in whole or in part, or to disbelieve all of it. They may believe part of it in preference to the testimony, and then disbelieve other parts, even though there is no contradictory testimony." The words, "if any," did not unduly minimize the importance of the statement, and this court will not assume that they were uttered in such a way as to have this effect. However, as repeatedly held, both by the Supreme Court and this court, the practice of confining the charge to the exact language of the statute is much better.

[4] 4. Error is assigned upon the following charge: "The title to the land in question will not in any way be affected by your verdict in this case. We cannot settle disputes to titles to land in this court." The complaint is, not that the instruction is abstractly wrong, but that the court should have charged the jury to consider whether, at the time the fence was destroyed, the accused bona fide claimed the land. We have read the entire charge carefully, and we think the instructions in reference to the guilt or innocence of the accused were sufficient, in the absence of proper request for a more specific statement of his contentions. The charge could not have been prejudicial to the accused, but was rather more harmful to the state, because the accused introduced no evidence of his title, and the prosecutor did. In this respect the case differs from Hateley v. State, 118 Ga. 79, 44 S. E. 852.

[5] 5. Complaint is made of the following extract from the charge: "The court charges you further that, should you find that the defendant did injure or destroy the fence in question of W. J. Broadhurst, you would be authorized to presume that such injury and destruction was done maliciously and willfully, and you should so find, unless this presumption has been rebutted to your satisfaction." We find no error in this instruction. If the fence was in fact Broadhurst's, and at a place where he had a right to put it, proof that the accused injured the fence in the manner described in the indictment would cast upon him the onus of proving that he destroyed the fence, honestly believing he had a right to do so. See McClurg v. State, 2 Ga. App. 624, 58 S. E. 1064.

[6] 6. It was not error, under the evidence, to instruct the jury not to consider any of the prosecutor's subsequent acts. The charge sufficiently covered the issues, in the absence of a request for more explicit instructions. Judgment affirmed.

Error from City Court of Quitman; J. G. McCall, Judge.

Action by the Lanier Armstrong Company against the Cherry Lake Turpentine Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Bennet & Long, for plaintiff in error.
Branch & Snow, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The Lanier Armstrong Company brought suit in the city court of Quitman against the Cherry Lake Turpentine Company to recover damages for alleged trespasses, alleging that on the 15th day of November, 1907, it was the owner by lease of all and singular the timber suitable for turpentine purposes on certain described lots of land in Brooks county, Ga.; that there was a sufficient number of pine trees on these lands to cut 25,000 turpentine boxes, of the aggregate value of $3,750; that on said date the Cherry Lake Turpentine Company entered upon these lands without legal authority or right, unlawfully took possession of the timber thereon suitable for turpentine purposes, and boxed it, and since said date had exclusively appropriated to its own use this timber, adversely to the rights of the Lanier Armstrong Company, and had been since said date, and was still at the time of the filing of this suit, extracting turpentine from the timber. The defendant company admitted the allegations that they were using the timber described in the petition, but set up that it had a right to do so under leases which it fully set up in its plea. The jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $2,075.02, the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, and the case is here for review.

On the trial it was admitted that both plaintiff and defendant claimed the timber in dispute and the right to take the turpentine therefrom under common grantors, and it was not denied by the defendant that it was cutting timber on the land for turpentine and was extracting turpentine therefrom, claiming that it had the right to do so under lease. The evidence showed that the lease under which the plaintiff held the timber and the right to the turpentine was prior in date and was recorded prior to the lease held by the defendant; and the evidence for the plaintiff also showed that the defendant had actual notice of the existence of this lease, when it took its lease and entered upon the land, taking possession of the timber and boxing the same for turpentine. The leases under which both parties claimed were introduced in evidence, and their execution sufficiently proved. Their terms and conditions will be referred to as it becomes necessary to illustrate the questions raised by the record and discussed in the course of the opinion.

Defendant's motion for a new trial contains numerous assignments of error; but the same questions involved are substantially made in several grounds of the motion, which makes it unnecessary to consider the grounds seriatim, but on the questions involved.

[1] 1. The general grounds of the motion may be disposed of by the statement that the only questions at issue between the parties were as to the value of the turpentine which the defendant had taken from the trees, and whether or not plaintiff in the court below had exercised its right under the lease to take the turpentine from the timber within a reasonable time. The other questions of fact are controlled by assignments of error in law, and need not be separately considered.

[7] There was evidence to support the verdict, and, having been approved by the court, it will not be disturbed, unless material error of law appears.

[2] 2. The leases under which the plaintiff claims title to the timber were all attested by only one witness, and all were recorded in the clerk's office of the superior court of the county where the timber was located. Defendant objected to admission of these leases in evidence: (a) Because the description of the property conveyed therein was too vague and indefinite; (b) because the leases were not attested by two witnesses, it being insisted that, being conveyances of interest in land, it was necessary that they be executed as deeds and attested by two witnesses, one of them an official witness; (c) that without such attestation their record was unauthorized, and therefore afforded no constructive notice. These objections apply specifically to what is known as the "White lease," which is the lease under which both parties claim from a common grantor. Here it may be stated that the leases under which the defendant claimed were properly attested as deeds and were properly admitted to record. The description contained in the White lease, through which the plaintiff claimed title, described the property as follows: "All and singular the timber suitable for turpentine purposes growing on the following described lots of land, to wit: Lot No. 151, in district 15, land lying in Brooks county, state of Georgia." Was this description sufficiently definite? It gives the number of the lot of land, the district in which located, and the county and state. The only particular in which this description is not absolutely specific and definite is in the fact that it does not state the number of acres contained in the lot of land. We do not think this important, in view of the fact that it does "convey all and singular the timber suitable for turpentine purposes growing on the land lot mentioned." It is wholly immaterial how many acres the land lot contained. All the timber located thereon suitable for turpentine purposes was specifically conveyed by the instrument. In the case of Carter & Elliott v. Williamson & Co., 106 Ga. 280, 31 S. E. 651, the Supreme Court held that a description in the same language as the above was unambiguous and clear, and conveyed all the timber standing on the lands described in the lease.

The cases cited by counsel for plaintiff in error in support of the contention that the description was vague and indefinite are distinguishable on the facts from the present case. In Douglass v. Bunn, 110 Ga. 162, 35 S. E. 339, the conveyance failed to designate the number of the lot, or the county or district in which it was situated. In Clarke Bros. v. Stowe, 132 Ga. 621, 64 S. E. 786, the deed contained no other description of the timber or land included in the lease, except "all that tract or parcel of land known as lot 162½ acres on lot 169 in the Sixth district of Montgomery county, Georgia." In this instrument the 162½ acres of land in the land lot was not specifically described. In the present deed, as above suggested, it was immaterial to describe the number of acres in the land lot, because all the timber thereon suitable for turpentine purposes was covered by the lease. Where a deed conveys a designated number of acres, it should indicate by boundaries, or other description, the particular number of acres conveyed, in order to furnish indicia by which the particular tract in the land lot could be identified. The words of description in the Clarke Case, supra, were not even sufficient to furnish a basis for making more specific the description by parol testimony. The other cases cited by learned counsel, Crosby v. McGraw, 133 Ga. 560, 66 S. E. 897, Richardson v. Perrin, 133 Ga. 721, 66 S. E. 899, Singleton v. Close, 130 Ga. 717, 61 S. E. 722, and Harper v. Kellar, 110 Ga. 420, 35 S. E. 667, are all distinguishable on the facts, as regards the description of the property conveyed, from that in the present case.

[3] The next objection which was made to the admissibility of what is known as the "White lease," under which the plaintiff claimed title, was that it was not attested by two witnesses, one of whom should have been a notary public or other judicial officer. This objection is based upon the contention that timber is realty, and that a conveyance of all the timber suitable for turpentine purposes was a sale of realty. In several cases the Supreme Court of this state has held that standing timber is realty, and that conveyances of standing timber are to be treated as deeds, and are to be executed with the same formality; in fact, have all the incidents of ordinary deeds to realty. Powell on Actions for Land, § 54; Coody v. Gress Lumber Co., 82 Ga. 793, 10 S. E. 218; McRae v. Stillwell, 111 Ga. 65, 36 S. E. 604, 55 L. R. A. 513; McLendon v. Finch, 2 Ga. App. 421, 58 S. E. 690, and citations. There are numerous decisions by the Supreme Court of this state to the same effect. The fact, however, that a deed to realty is not properly attested, does not affect its validity between the parties thereto and their privies. The defect in the attestation relates to the right of recordation and to the method of proof. In the present case, while the deeds conveying the timber rights to plaintiff were not attested by two witnesses, and were therefore not properly recorded, yet their execution was not denied, and in fact it was admitted by the defendant that, when it took its subsequent lease covering the same property, it took with actual notice of the existence of this prior conveyance. It follows, therefore, that it was wholly immaterial, in so far as any right which the defendant had, that these deeds were not attested as deeds to realty. In the case of Coody v. Gress Lumber Co., supra, it is distinctly held that a failure to have attesting witnesses to a deed did not render the instrument void, and upon proper proof of its execution it was admissible in evidence. See, also, to the same effect, Parker v. Gortatowsky, 127 Ga. 561, 56 S. E. 846. It is too well settled, however, to require further citation of authority, that an improper attestation does not affect the validity of a deed, but only its fitness for record and the method of proving its execution. The deed is still a valid contract, and is binding upon any one who subsequently takes with notice of its existence. Johnson et al.

v. Jones et al., 87 Ga. 85, 13 S. E. 261; Lowe v. Allen, 68 Ga. 226; Gardner, Dexter & Co. v. Moore, Trimble & Co., 51 Ga. 268; King v. Sears, 91 Ga. 577, 18 S. E. 830.

[4] 3. The next assignment of error is that the transfer of the White lease, relied upon by plaintiff in error in the court below as one of the links in the chain of title, was improperly executed, and was invalid, in that the transfer was made by one of two partners in the partnership name, and was not signed by the individual members of the firm. This objection is based upon the idea that a deed or lease to take the turpentine from standing trees conveys realty, and title was vested in the members of the partnership as tenants in common. This objection would be material, but for an admission made in the record. The transfer in question was made by J. F. Fender in the name of Fender, Tomblinson & Co., and it was admitted that the transfer of the lease in question by J. F. Fender was made "for the partnership, and by the authority of each member thereof, and in the due course of the partnership business." This admission cures the formal defect in the execution of the transfer or assignment, so far as this defendant is concerned, and places in the transferee all the title of the firm, as well as of the individual members thereof, to the property described in the transfer. In view of this admission, it is not necessary to discuss the point raised in the brief of learned counsel for defendant in error that a transfer of the right to take crude turpentine from growing trees is in the nature of a usufruct, especially where the transfer is by lease during a period stipulated for a less time than five years, and that this is distinguishable from an alienation of an interest in land.

[5] 4. It is next objected that this transfer by the partnership of the lease in question to the plaintiff was incompetent to be admitted in evidence, because the transfer was not in fact dated. The failure to date the transfer is not material, in view of the fact that the defendant had actual knowledge of the previous existence of the lease when it took the lease under which it claims. Besides, the parol evidence shows that all of the transfers of the White lease in question were made on the same day, to wit, January 25, 1907, and this was prior to the date of the instrument under which the defendant claimed its right.

[8] The defendant in the court below offered evidence to prove that there was a parol agreement, before the leases were signed and the transfer made to plaintiff, that the boxing of the timber should commence at once, and this testimony was excluded. There was no effort to show that the time limit was left out of the contract, either by accident or mistake. In the absence of a time limit, the law would give the lessee a reasonable time within which to exercise its rights under the lease; the reasonable time being a question of fact to be determined by the jury. The rule laid down on this subject as to what would be a reasonable time would be dependent altogether upon the local conditions and the peculiar circumstances of each case. McRae v. Stillwell, supra; Lufburrow v. Everett, 113 Ga. 1056, 39 S. E. 436; Goette v. Lane, 111 Ga. 400, 36 S. E. 758. Besides, it further appeared from the leases to previous grantees, under which plaintiff in the court below claimed title, that from three to four years were allowed for the purpose of working timber for turpentine purposes after the boxing thereof, and that, before the expiration of this period of three or four years, the alleged trespass by the defendant had been committed.

[6] We have considered all the assignments of error that we think material to be decided, and we conclude that the verdict was right. The plaintiff in error knew that these prior leases were outstanding and in the plaintiff in the court below, and that it had been in the actual exercise of these rights, and we are satisfied that the verdict, under the evidence, was just, right, and equitable. The defenses relied upon are in the main purely technical. The essential facts are that the plaintiff held a prior written contract under which it had the right to all of the turpentine in the timber on the lands in question; that the defendant knew of this prior right, and with this knowledge took conveyances, and under these conveyances as an excuse entered upon the lands in question and deprived the plaintiff of a very large amount of the profits which it could have realized under its contract; and that the amount of turpentine which it took from the trees to which the plaintiff was entitled under its previous contract was larger than the amount of the verdict which the jury found against it. We are impressed with the view that the defendant in the court below simply took the chances of defeating the rights of the plaintiff on mere technicalities, and in the meantime securing for itself a large amount of turpentine to which it was not equitably entitled, and that to a certain extent at least this chance of speculation or profit has been reaped by it to the damage of the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

BALCHIN v. JONES. (No. 3,489.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SALES (§ 53*)—VALIDITY—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—QUESTION OF FACT.

It is only when the terms descriptive of property sought to be conveyed by a written instrument are manifestly too meager, imperfect, or uncertain to serve as adequate means of identification that the court can, as a matter of law, adjudge the description to be insufficient. "Whether such terms will serve to identify the premises is a question of fact, and not of law."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 460*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITING—BILL OF SALE.

Parol evidence is admissible in aid of a defective description of personal property conveyed by a bill of sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 460.*]

3. SALES (§§ 148, 465*)—EVIDENCE (§ 353*)—CONDITIONAL SALES—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—AUTHENTICATION.

Failure to record in time may subject the holder of a bill of sale to the risk of loss by reason of the superior diligence of the holder of some junior lien created by contract; but if he really has obtained title prior to the creation of a lien by law, his title will not be defeated by the mere failure to record. It is not essential to the validity of a reservation of title embraced in a written contract for the sale of personalty that the contract be recorded. Hill v. Ludden, 113 Ga. 320, 38 S. E. 752; Donovan v. Simmons, 96 Ga. 340, 22 S. E. 966. A bill of sale may be admissible as evidence, though it has not been recorded; and especially is the failure to record not a good ground of objection to the introduction of a bill of sale, when there is evidence that actual notice of the bill of sale was brought home to the party sought to be affected by the instrument.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. §§ 148, 465; Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 353.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 105*)—JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 208*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—OBJECTIONS—WAIVER.

The court did not err in overruling the objection to the attestation of the bill of sale. Inasmuch as the specific objection was not made that the bill of sale was inadmissible for want of proof of proper execution, the necessity for such proof was waived. Furthermore, the admission in the petition for certiorari that the bill of sale in question was signed by the parties by whom it purported to have been executed must be treated as an abandonment of the objection upon the hearing in the superior court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 105; Justices of the Peace, Dec. Dig. § 208.*]

5. SALES (§ 145*)—BILL OF SALE—ATTESTATION—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The requirement of section 4203 of the Civil Code of 1910 relative to attestation is merely a provision for the admission of the paper to record.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 145.*]

Error from Superior Court, Elbert County; D. W. Meadow, Judge.

Claim by W. J. Jones to property levied on under attachment in favor of J. J. Balchin. Judgment for claimant, and the attachment creditor brings error. Affirmed.

Worley & Nall, for plaintiff in error. C. P. Harris, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. H. F. B. Paddock owed J. J. Balchin an open account, and, absconding, left certain personal property in Elbert county. After Paddock had absconded, Balchin procured the issuance of an attachment, which was levied on certain personal property of Paddock described in the attachment. Later a special judgment was entered on this attachment in favor of Balchin against Paddock, but it does not appear that there was any record of the execution. Jones, the defendant in error, had procured a bill of sale from Paddock, by which the latter, for the purpose of securing an indebtedness of $500, due by him to Jones, conveyed "a full and complete title" to Jones, his heirs and assigns, to "the following property, to wit: All household furniture, pictures, stove and kitchen utensils, wash pot, tubs, canned fruit, sewing machine, harness, fodder, oats, etc., and all articles not mentioned in the above; also the following in office, drugs, books, instruments, etc., with the exception of desk and bookcase, property of Tunnison & Co., and a certain amount of instruments, property of Dr. J. Matthews." The contract of sale recited that "this deed is made and executed in pursuance of the provisions of section 2771 et sequitur of the Civil Code of 1895," and purported to be signed also by Beulah D. Paddock, and to have been executed in the presence of John T. Fagan, "Commissioner of Deeds, Troy, New York" (as evidenced by that officer's certificate), in January, 1910. The fact that it bore evidence of having been recorded is immaterial, because the entry of the clerk shows that it was put to record after the suing out of the writ of certiorari in this case.

Balchin's attachment, based upon the ground that Paddock "absconds," was on October 15, 1910, levied on certain household effects, and also on certain drugs, books, and instruments, such as were referred to in the bill of sale to Jones, as well as on some articles, minutely described in the levy, which were not claimed. Upon the levy of the attachment Jones filed a claim to such of the property as is apparently within the descriptive terms employed in the bill of sale. He interposed no claim to several articles mentioned in the levy. Jones' claim of title was based on the bill of sale hitherto mentioned. On the trial of the claim case the jury in the justice's court found the property not subject to the lien of the attachment, and Balchin's certiorari, complaining of error in the justice's court, was overruled. This judgment of the superior court is the error complained of, and error is assigned upon each of the grounds upon which an assignment of error was predicated in the petition for certiorari. As the errors assigned on the ruling of the judge of the superior court in overruling the certiorari comprise the errors alleged to have been committed on the trial of the claim case in the justice's court, and pertain to the admission of testimony, it is perhaps proper that we shall state briefly the contentions of the plaintiff in error as to the several rulings complained of.

[1] 1. The first objection urged by the plaintiff below against the admission of the bill of sale, which we have quoted, was that the description of the property intended to be conveyed was insufficient to serve as an adequate means of identification, so as to make the instrument a valid conveyance. In support of this contention he cites section 3257 and section 4186 of the Civil Code of 1910; Thomas Furniture Co. v. T. & C. Furniture Co., 120 Ga. 882, 48 S. E. 333; Broach v. O'Neal, 94 Ga. 475 (3), 20 S. E. 113. We do not think that the contention of the plaintiff in error in this regard is sustained by the authorities cited, and, indeed, it appears to be without merit. When the description contained in the mortgage is aided by parol evidence, explanatory of the terms used in the bill of sale, the description was such as to prevent the bill of sale from being void because of insufficiency in the description of the property conveyed. See Beaty v. Sears, 132 Ga. 516, 64 S. E. 321; Duke v. Neisler, 134 Ga. 594, 68 S. E. 327, 137 Am. St. Rep. 250. In Broach v. O'Neal, supra, cited by counsel for plaintiff in error, it was held that "it is only when a description of the premises is manifestly too meager, imperfect, or uncertain to serve as adequate means of identification that the court can adjudge the description insufficient as matter of law." In Patterson v. Evans, 91 Ga. 799, 18 S. E. 31, in which the description of the mortgaged premises was in these terms: "Two hundred and ninety acres, more or less, of land situate in the Fifth district of Wilkinson county, upon which an incumbrance of $125 exists, due October 15, 1888, taking priority of this mortgage; also two gins and one gristmill located on said described land"—the description was held to be "very meager and vague," but it was ruled that "whether such terms will serve to identify the premises is a question of fact, and not of law" (citing Collier v. Yason, 12 Ga. 441, 58 Am. Dec. 481, and Oatis v. Brown, 59 Ga. 711), and that it could not be held, as a matter of law, that the description given was so defective as to render the mortgage void. Cherry Lake Turpentine Co. v. Lanier Armstrong Co., 73 S. E. 610, decided January 15, 1912.

[2] 2. But, even if the description in the bill of sale was defective, parol evidence was admissible in aid of the description. Thomas Furniture Co. v. T. & C. Furniture Co., supra. In the first headnote of this decision it is held that, "in providing that a mortgage or a conditional bill of sale shall specify the property on which it is to take effect, the law does not require such a description as will serve to identify the property without the aid of parol evidence." There was, therefore, no error in the admission of parol evidence in aid of the description contained in the bill of sale.

[3] 3. Balchin's next ground of objection to the admission of the bill of sale in evidence was that "plaintiff's lien on the property claimed dated from the levy of the attachment, and that the bill of sale, not having been recorded before the date of the levy, nor even at the time of the trial of the claim case, could not and would not put plaintiff on notice of claimant's interest in the property claimed based on said bill of sale, and should not be admitted to defeat plaintiff's lien, which was established before the record of said bill of sale; plaintiff's lien having been established by operation of law, and not by contract." We see no error in overruling this objection to the bill of sale. Under the terms of section 4208 of the Civil Code of 1910, the recording of a bill of sale is merely permissive. It is not compulsory. The failure to record in time may subject the holder of a bill of sale to the risk of loss by reason of the superior diligence of the holder of some junior lien created by contract; but if he really has obtained title prior to the creation of a lien by law, his title will not be defeated by the mere failure to record. Donovan v. Simmons, 96 Ga. 340, 22 S. E. 966. In the case at bar the plaintiff had a judgment on an attachment, and this judgment had never been entered upon any execution docket of the county, and, as already stated, Jones' bill of sale had not been recorded, so that neither party's rights were dependent upon the record. In the Donovan Case, supra, the execution, issued on the judgment against James, was entered on the general execution docket on April 19, 1893, and the deed from James to the claimants was not filed for record for more than six months thereafter, nor until November 22, 1893. In the instant case the lien of the attachment dated from the levy on October 15, 1910, before Jones' bill of sale was given, if at all, January 4, 1910. The failure to record the bill of sale afforded no meritorious ground of objection to its admissibility, and under the ruling in the Donovan Case, supra, "while the failure to record such a deed might operate to defeat the conveyance as to one who purchased subsequently of the same vendor without notice of the prior conveyance, a judgment obtained against the grantor subsequently to the conveyance, but entered upon the general execution docket prior to the record of the deed, would not, merely by virtue of such entry, become a lien upon the property previously conveyed." Furthermore, in the present case there was evidence that Balchin had actual notice of the bill of sale held by the defendant before he sued out his attachment, and it would seem that actual notice would be as effectual and binding on the plaintiff as a constructive notice afforded by the recording of the bill of sale.

In Cottrell v. Merchants' & Mechanics' Bank, 89 Ga. 508, 15 S. E. 944, it was held that "the retention of title by the vendor in a written contract of sale of personal property, with the condition affixed that the title is to remain in the vendor until the purchase price shall have been paid, though the instrument be not recorded within the time prescribed by law, will prevail over the lien of a subsequent mortgage on the same property, executed by the conditional vendee to a creditor who gives credit and takes the mortgage without notice of the vendor's title, the mortgage also not being recorded in time." In ruling on the point Justice Simmons held that, "where both parties fail to record, both are lacking in the diligence required by law as a condition for their protection. Neither can claim a better right because the other neglected to record. The law puts them on precisely equal terms in this respect. Neither having complied with the requirement to register, they are left where they would have stood, regardless of the registry statutes. Consequently the first in time must prevail. The same considerations in justice apply to the case of a vendor reserving title; and it suffices to say that the statute manifestly intends to put him on the same ground as a mortgagee of personalty." Justice Simmons cites the case of Steen v. Harris, 81 Ga. 681, 8 S. E. 206, as authority, and the facts of that case are very similar to those in the case at bar, in that a conditional bill of sale under which title was reserved in a piano had not been recorded. The piano was levied upon under an attachment, at the instance of a creditor whose debt was not made on faith of the property, and was levied upon after the conditional sale had been rescinded by agreement. The rescission terminated the relation of conditional vendor and vendee before the attaching creditor levied on the property, and it was held that "the court erred in granting a new trial, setting aside the verdict finding the property not subject, for the reason that the verdict rendered was warranted by the evidence." In Hill v. Ludden, 113 Ga. 320, 38 S. E. 752, it was held that it was not essential to the validity of a reservation of title embraced in a written contract for the sale of personalty that the contract be recorded. The objection of the plaintiff in error upon this point, as made in the court below, was not, strictly speaking, a proper objection to the admissibility of the bill of sale, but was rather an argument against its priority, and was properly overruled.

[4] 4. The objection urged by the plaintiff in error to the attestation of the bill of sale, that it was inadmissible because it purported to have been witnessed by a "commissioner of deeds, Troy, New York," whereas, it was required to be executed before a commissioner of deeds for the state of Georgia, seems to be without merit. The only objection was to the attestation. No objection, based upon the ground that the execution of the instrument in question had not been proved, was made, and, by the failure to object, proof of the execution was waived.

Bowen v. Frick, 75 Ga. 786 (3-b). In that case it was held that the proper exception to be taken to the introduction of the notes was an objection that they were inadmissible for want of proof of execution, and, this specific objection not being made, the necessity for such proof was waived. See, also, Anderson v. Cuthbert, 103 Ga. 771, 30 S. E. 244, where the Bowen case is cited, and it is again ruled that "failure on the part of the defendants to object to the introduction of the paper in evidence would amount to a waiver of the necessity of proof of its execution, for the purpose of its admission in evidence." The objection which should have been made was that the execution of the instrument had not been proven. The objection actually made only raised the point that the person purporting to attest the execution was not a subscribing witness of such a kind as prescribed by law to entitle the bill of sale to registry. Furthermore, in the petition for certiorari, it is admitted that this said bill of sale was signed by H. F. B. Paddock and Beulah Paddock; and this admission in judicio would seem to be so binding upon the plaintiff as to have amounted to an abandonment of this objection on the hearing before the judge in the lower court.

[5] The law relative to the execution of deeds and mortgages, when attested out of this state, provides that, in order to admit such a paper to record, it shall be attested as provided in section 4203 of the Civil Code of 1910. The claimant did not contend in the trial in the court below that the bill of sale had been recorded. As a matter of fact it had not been recorded, and therefore the exception that the attesting witness was not such a one as would have authorized the registry of the bill of sale did not go far enough to amount to a contention that the bill of sale had not in fact been executed so as to convey the title of the vendor to the vendee, even though it might not have been so attested as to convey notice to third parties.

The objection that the bill of sale was void on its face, because signed by the wife as security for her husband, is not insisted upon in the brief, and therefore must be considered as abandoned.

An objection was interposed to testimony on the part of the claimant that he had told Balchin, before the levy of the attachment, that he (Jones) held the bill of sale in question. The objection urged to this testimony was that the only notice which, under the law, could or would be binding on the petitioner under the facts of the case, or that could defeat petitioner's lien on the property claimed, would be notice given by the record of the said bill of sale, and proof of any other notice than that of the record was inadmissible in evidence on the trial of the case then before the jury. As we have already ruled that the rights of Jones, under the bill of sale, if it was in fact executed prior in date to the levy of the attachment, would not be affected by the fact that the bill of sale had or had not been recorded prior to the levy of the attachment, neither the objection nor the ruling upon it would seem to be material in a proper decision of the case. The decision in the Donovan Case, supra, is conclusive upon the point that the registry act of 1899 worked no change in the existing law as to the priority of liens acquired by law in a contest with prior rights acquired by contract. But, if the matter is one of any materiality, the rulings in Hill v. Ludden, 113 Ga. 320, 38 S. E. 752, and Cottrell v. Merchants' & Mechanics' Bank, 89 Ga. 508, 15 S. E. 944, would at least sustain the conclusion that the admission of evidence of actual notice was not harmful to the plaintiff in error, for the reason that the actual notice would seem to be as binding on the plaintiff in attachment as would have been the constructive notice afforded by the recording of the bill of sale.

Judgment affirmed.

CHENEY v. STATE. (No. 3,877.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

WEAPONS (§ 7*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The act of 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 134) makes it a misdemeanor for a person "to carry around with him on his person, or to have in his manual possession, outside of his own home or place of business, any pistol or revolver, without first taking out a license from the ordinary of the county of the party's residence." Where the accused had a pistol in his manual possession, on the public road, without the license thus required, the case was within the express terms of the act, and it would constitute no defense that his possession was only temporary, and solely for the purpose of transporting the pistol and delivering it to the owner, who had previously left it at the home of the accused.

Sid Cheney was convicted of carrying weapons, and brings error. Affirmed.

Roy D. Stubbs, for plaintiff in error. Jos. E. Pottle, Sol. Gen., and S. T. Wingfield, for the State.

HILL, C. J. Sid Cheney was convicted of a violation of the act approved August 12, 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 134), which is in the following language: "An act to prohibit any person from having or carrying about his person, in any county in the state of Georgia, any pistol or revolver without first having obtained a license from the ordinary of the county of said state, in which the party resides. Before such person shall be at liberty to carry around with him on his person, or to have in his manual possession outside of his own home or place of business," etc. On the trial of the case the evidence clearly showed—indeed, it was not denied—that the accused had a pistol in his manual possession on the public road of the county in which he was indicted, and that he had not the license required by the statute. The defense relied upon, based alone upon the defendant's statement to the jury, was that the pistol had been left at his house by a neighbor, to whom it belonged, and that he was carrying it to the house of the owner for the purpose of delivering it to him, and was not carrying it about his person within the purview of the statute, and therefore was not violating its terms; and he requested the court to instruct the jury to the effect that if they believed, under the evidence, that he had the pistol in his manual possession on the occasion referred to, for the sole purpose of returning it to its owner, it would be their duty to acquit him. The refusal to give this instruction is assigned as error.

The judge instructed the jury that if they believed under the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the accused had this pistol in his manual possession outside of his home or place of business, no matter for what purpose, without first having obtained the license required by law, they would be authorized to find a verdict of guilty. This statement of the law was too strong, but under the facts of this case it was harmless. The object of the law is to prohibit any person, without the license required, from having about his person or carrying around in his possession a pistol or revolver. The proviso that he may have in his manual possession a pistol at his own home or place of business is the only exception made by the terms of the act. While statutes must be given a reasonable construction for the purpose of carrying out the legislative intent, they should never be so liberally interpreted as to render ineffective this intent. It certainly would afford the very broadest latitude for the evasion of the terms and purposes of the act in question if it should be held that a person without the license required by the statute could be allowed to take a pistol and carry it on his person and in his manual possession from his own home for the purpose of delivering it to the alleged owner of the pistol, who resided elsewhere, and especially where the alleged owner of the pistol lived some distance from the accused.

The law does not state how long a person shall have in his manual possession and carry about his person a pistol or revolver to constitute a violation of the statute. It simply provides that it shall be unlawful for any person to have or carry about his person a pistol or revolver in any county of the state of Georgia without first taking out a license from the ordinary in the county in which the party resides, and the only exception to the act is that he may have the pistol in his manual possession without taking out the license while in his own home or own place of business. If he carries the pistol around on his person, or has it in his manual possession elsewhere without the license, he violates the express terms of the law. It may be true that the purpose of the statute was to lessen the pernicious habit of carrying on the person a pistol, and to supplement the law forbidding the having and carrying about the person pistols or revolvers concealed. But, if it was necessary to prove more than one act of having on the person a pistol before the evil habit was shown, the object of the law would be defeated; and this court will not construe the statute with such latitude as would not only make evasion easy, but would render the act practically ineffective.

Besides, the express language of the statute forbids the manual possession of a pistol outside of the party's home or place of business without the license, and while it may be, as suggested by Mr. Justice Lumpkin in Strickland v. State, 137 Ga. 1, 72 S. E. 260, a too narrow and strict construction to hold that the act would be violated by picking up a pistol that had fallen from the window of his house on the public street, for the purpose of carrying it back into his house, or in similar cases of emergency, yet it certainly cannot be reasonably contended that the act is not clearly violated under the facts of this case.

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; W. M. Harrell, Judge.

Action by the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Company against J. E. Donalson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The J. I. Case Threshing Machine Company sued John E. Donalson to recover the price of machinery alleged to have been sold to him under a written contract. The allegations of the petition, so far as material, are as follows: Defendant, on June 15, 1909, executed and delivered to plaintiff his written contract (a copy of which is attached as an exhibit), whereby he purchased certain machinery described therein, which was to be shipped to him at Jakin, Ga. The machinery was shipped to Jakin, according to the terms of the contract. Under the terms of the contract Donalson agreed to receive the machinery described therein on the cars, on arrival at Jakin, and to pay freight and charges thereon, and to pay to the order of petitioner $172 in cash and the balance of the purchase price in notes; and if Donalson should fail to make the cash payment, or to execute and deliver the notes for the deferred payments, the written order or contract should, at the option of the plaintiff, "stand as the purchaser's written obligation, having the same force and effect as notes and mortgage," and the whole amount of the purchase money should become due and payable, and the plaintiff should "stand discharged from all warranty." It is also alleged that the plaintiff discharged its part of the contract, but that the defendant failed to execute and deliver the notes as agreed in the contract, and that the full purchase price of the machinery is, therefore, due, to wit, $472 and interest, besides $56 freight. By amendment it is alleged that the machinery described in the contract was shipped to Jakin, Ga., and was there tendered by the plaintiff to the defendant. The defendant filed a demurrer, setting up in effect that the contract was unilateral; that it had not been signed by the vendor, although it was provided by the express terms of the contract that it should be signed by both parties thereto before the machinery was shipped; and that the machinery was shipped against the defendant's consent, and he refused to accept it on its arrival at Jakin. This demurrer was sustained, and the petition dismissed, and the plaintiff excepted.

The contract upon which suit is based was signed by John E. Donalson, the defendant. It is an order addressed to the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Company, Racine, Wis., and requests the company to ship on or before the 15th day of June, 1909 (or as soon thereafter as transportation can be furnished), to Jakin, Ga., or other convenient station in the state of Georgia, to the undersigned purchaser, the machinery described in the contract. It provides that "this order must be signed by all parties before delivery of goods," and that the order "is taken subject to approval, and is to be sent to the company for acceptance or rejection." It sets forth the purchase price, and provides for terms of payment, and contains this condition: "If purchaser fails to pay said money or to execute and deliver said notes and mortgage (properly filed or recorded), it is agreed as a condition hereof that the title to said goods shall not pass, and this order shall, at the company's option, stand as the purchaser's written obligation, having the same force and effect as notes and mortgage for all sums not paid in cash, and the whole amount of purchase money shall be due and payable, and the company stand discharged from all warranty." The contract contains other warranties as to the kind and character of the machinery, and other mutual terms and conditions, and provides that if the purchaser "fails or refuses to accept said machinery upon its arrival as above specified, or in case he cancels this order, he will pay said company the freight and charges on said machinery from the factory to the place of delivery as above provided, and freight for its reshipment, and in addition thereto will pay 15 per cent. of the contract price, which it is hereby agreed shall constitute the liquidated damages for such breach of contract."

J. C. Hale, for plaintiff in error. Erle M. Donalson, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The suit is not for breach of contract, but for the purchase price of the machinery, the petition alleging that the plaintiff fully performed its part of the contract; and the only question presented for the decision of this court is whether the allegations of the petition, if proved, entitle the plaintiff to recover the agreed price of the machinery. This case seems to be fully controlled by the decision of this court in Maine v. Howell, 7 Ga. App. 311, 66 S. E. 804. Indeed, we think that it is even stronger and clearer as to the right of the plaintiff to recover than the case just referred to. In that case it was held that where A., by a written order, bought from B. $180 worth of goods and merchandise, and B., on receiving the order, executed it by shipping the goods covered by it to A., the contract was not within the statute of frauds, and was mutually binding. Here the contract was signed by the defendant himself, and this written order was sent directly to the plaintiff for acceptance and performance. In the case cited the contract, as in the present case, provided that it was not to be binding unless it was signed by the parties thereto, and there was no written acceptance of the order by the plaintiff; but, on receipt of the order, the plaintiff executed the contract by filling the order according to its terms, and in the opinion this court says: "This was the very highest form of acceptance."

[2] It is insisted that the plaintiff was not bound by the express warranties unless the contract was actually signed by it. We do not concur in this view. When the plaintiff performed the contract according to its terms this was an acceptance, and it followed that the plaintiff was thereupon bound by all the warranties, terms, and conditions contained in the contract, just as the defendant was also bound. The plaintiff having, therefore, accepted and performed the contract according to its terms, the defendant was bound on his part to accept the machinery, unless there was some breach of the warranties contained in the contract. He could not arbitrarily refuse to accept the machinery which had been shipped to him by the plaintiff according to his order and tendered to him at the very point of destination to which he had directed that it be shipped and delivered. It is not necessary for the party to whom the contract is addressed to accept it in writing, although expressly stipulated that it should be so accepted, if it is signed by one of the parties and is acted on by the other party. Under these circumstances it is as binding as if signed by both parties. Vogel v. Pecok, 157 Ill. 339, 42 N. E. 386, 30 L. R. A. 491; Sellers v. Greer, 172 Ill. 549, 50 N. E. 248, 40 L. R. A. 591; 9 Cyc. 270. See, also, Sheppard v. Daniel Miller Company, 7 Ga. App. 760, 68 S. E. 451; Cheffield v. Whitfield et al., 6 Ga. App. 762, 65 S. E. 807.

In the Sheffield Case, supra, Judge Russell uses the following language pertinent to the question now under consideration: "An offer may be accepted, either by a promise to do the thing contemplated therein, or by the actual doing of the thing." In Brown v. Bowman, 119 Ga. 153, 46 S. E. 410, it is held that "a promise may be a nudum pactum when made, because the promisee is not bound; it becomes binding when he subsequently furnishes the consideration contemplated, by doing what he was expected to do." Chief Justice Fish, in the course of the opinion, uses the following language: "A contract is often such that, until something is done under it, the consideration is imperfect, yet a partial performance, or a complete performance on one side, supplies the defect. If, for example, one promises another, who makes no promise in return, to pay him money when he shall have done a specified thing, if he does it, not only is the contract executed on one side, but also the consideration is perfected and payment can be enforced" (citing numerous authorities). "A promise may be unenforceable for want of mutuality when made, yet the promisee may render it valid and binding by supplying a consideration on his part before the promise is withdrawn."

This doctrine is well settled by many adjudged cases cited by text-writers. It therefore seems perfectly clear that, when this offer was signed by Donalson and sent directly to the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Company for its acceptance or rejection, and the company accepted it by executing it according to its terms, the offer became a contract fully completed and mutually binding; and when the company performed its part of the contract, and shipped the machinery therein described to the defendant as directed, and there tendered delivery to him at the point of destination, he not having withdrawn his proposition before the contract was fully executed by the plaintiff, he could not without cause refuse to accept the machinery. He was bound then to accept it, and to pay for it as agreed, unless some of the warranties relative to the machinery were breached.

The case of Cable Piano Co. v. Hancock, 2 Ga. App. 73, 58 S. E. 319, relied upon by the defendant in error is distinguishable from the present case on the facts. In that case the offer to buy the piano described in the written contract was signed by the defendant and delivered to the plaintiff's salesman, who turned it over to the company's office for acceptance. The piano had already been delivered into the possession of the defendant for trial, subject to his approval, and to be paid for when the contract was accepted by the Cable Piano Company. Before the Cable Company accepted the contract, the defendant tendered back the piano, telling the plaintiff that he had decided to cancel the order. Judge Powell, in delivering the opinion of the court, expressly states that "the delivery of the piano under the contract, and acceptance thereof by the buyer, would have been sufficient to make the contract complete. The buyer's custody of the piano, under the circumstances stated, however, did not have this effect." And it was held that under the facts of that case the contract never became mutual, because the proposed buyer had a right to withdraw his consent there to before acceptance by the seller, and he exercised this right before the seller accepted the contract. There is nothing in this decision that is in conflict with what is herein decided.

For the reasons stated, we conclude that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer and in dismissing the petition.

MARTIN v. MENDEL. (No. 3,324.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

NEW TRIAL (§ 132*)—PROCEEDINGS TO PROCURE—DISMISSAL OF MOTION.

The decision in this case is controlled by the rulings of the Supreme Court in Williams v. Johnston, 94 Ga. 722, 19 S. E. 838, Anderson v. McClain, 94 Ga. 798, 801, 22 S. E. 302, and Gwinn v. Almand, 110 Ga. 318, 35 S. E. 150.

Where more than a year had elapsed since the filing of a motion for a new trial, there was no abuse of discretion in dismissing it, on the ground that no brief of evidence had been filed, though it appeared that, at the time first set for the hearing of the motion, counsel for the movant presented to and left with the trial judge a paper which purported to be a brief of the evidence; it appearing that it was not approved as such by the judge, because it was not correct, and it further appearing that the court had several times continued the hearing, in order to enable the movant to correct the brief, or to agree thereon with opposing counsel, and that the judge, on account of the lapse of time, was unable to remember the evidence. It would in any event be fruitless to reverse the judgment dismissing the motion for new trial; for, if the trial judge does not remember the testimony, the brief of evidence cannot be approved, and without it the motion is so incomplete as to be absolutely nugatory.

Error from City Court of Monroe; A. C. Stone, Judge.

Action by M. Mendel against A. W. Martin. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

W. O. Dean, for plaintiff in error. O. Roberts, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The sole question presented by the present writ of error is whether the trial judge erred in dismissing the motion for new trial upon the ground that no brief of the evidence had been filed as required. It appears that a judgment was entered in favor of Mendel against Martin on January 7, 1910. A motion for new trial was made, and the court thereupon passed an order providing that the movant should have until the hearing to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence, and that the judge might enter his approval upon the brief of evidence at any time in term or in vacation. The time set for the hearing of the motion for new trial was January 20th, and on that day the movant presented what he claims to be a correct brief of the evidence adduced upon the trial. The judge declined to approve the brief, holding that it was incorrect, and the case was duly continued until January 27th, when, the judge not being present, the hearing went over to the next regular April term of the court. It was thereafter continued from time to time until the 10th of January, 1911, when a motion of plaintiff's counsel to dismiss the motion for new trial was sustained by the court, in the following order: "On hearing the foregoing motion to dismiss movant's motion for new trial, and it appearing that counsel cannot agree upon a brief of the evidence in the case, and the court not being able to remember the evidence at this time, [owing] to the great lapse of time since said case was tried, and the amount of business disposed of by the court, it is therefore ordered and adjudged by the court that said motion to dismiss be, and the same is, hereby sustained, and the motion for new trial dismissed."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Plaintiff in error excepts to the order dismissing the motion for new trial, and urges that under the plain provisions of the Code it was the duty of the judge, if movant's brief was not correct, to correct and approve it; that after a lapse of several months the court cannot refuse to approve a brief of the evidence because counsel cannot agree to it and the court does not remember the evidence, for the reason that, in any case where a motion is made, it can be dismissed by the will of the court by his mere refusal to approve the brief. The history of the case is to be found in the judge's explanatory note to the bill of exceptions, and we cannot go anywhere else to ascertain the truth as to what occurred antecedent to the motion for new trial. The qualifying statement of the judge in certifying the bill of exceptions is as follows: "On January 20th, the day set for the hearing of the motion, counsel for both parties appeared, but had not agreed upon the brief of the evidence. They could not then agree upon it. The court then read over the brief presented by movant, and could not approve the same, because it was not correct. At the request of both counsel, an order was passed setting the hearing for January 27th, in order to give counsel an opportunity to agree upon a brief—all of the papers in the case then being handed back to counsel for movant. I may have been absent on the 27th, but several times thereafter I urged both counsel to try to agree upon a brief, and upon such parts of it that they could not agree the court would settle the differences, and hear the motion any day they agreed on. Counsel for movant took the position that as the 27th had passed, and no order was taken setting the hearing for a later date, the case could not be heard, except at a regular term of the court. At the regular April term of the court counsel for movant complained of being unwell and did not appear with the motion, and no order was then taken in the matter. Thereafter the court again urged counsel to dispose of the motion while the facts in the case were comparatively still fresh in the mind of the court. During all of this time the papers in the case were not in my hands. On April 28th counsel for Mendel drew an order for the court's signature setting the hearing for the next day. The court did not sign this order, for the reason that it was reported to him that movant's counsel would not agree to any day except at a regular term of the court. In the meantime counsel for Mendel presented to the court a brief containing his contention as to the evidence. The court refused to approve it, for the same reason it refused to approve movant's brief—it was not true and correct. The papers were then left in my office until some time after the July term of the court, when they were again taken out by movant's counsel, with the understanding that counsel would get together and try to agree on a brief of the evidence. I do not now remember why the motion was not heard at the July term of the court, but I do know that counsel made no effort to have it heard or took any order for its hearing in the future. At the October term the court, of its own motion, called the case and asked if counsel had yet agreed on a brief. They answered that they had not, whereupon the court, by consent of both counsel, orally set the motion for a hearing the next day in my office. Counsel for Mendel appeared at the hour set, but counsel for movant failed to appear. The court then again set the hearing for 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and requested counsel for Mendel to notify movant's counsel. At the appointed time counsel for Mendel again appeared, and reported that he had notified counsel for movant. The court waited all day, but movant's counsel never did appear. At the January term, 1911, the court again called the case. Counsel for both parties then stated that they had not agreed upon a brief of the evidence and could not agree. At the request of counsel for movant, I then took up the evidence with counsel, but found that they could not agree on material parts of it, and on account of the length of time intervening since the trial of the case, and the great number of cases tried, and other business disposed of by the court in the meantime, I was totally unable to remember the evidence. I know that the brief originally presented by movant was not correct, but in what particulars I could not then remember, and could, for that reason, not approve a brief. The court, therefore, sustained the motion to dismiss the motion for new trial, for the reasons therein mentioned. All of the papers in the case were in the possession of movant's counsel from the time the original motion for new trial was filed until some time after the April term of court, and again from some time after the July term, 1910, to the January term, 1911, but no other brief of the evidence was ever presented to the court by movant's counsel for the court's approval, except the first one, which the court then could not approve as being correct."

From the statement of the judge it appears that the real ground upon which the motion was dismissed was that the court, after the long lapse of time, could not remember the evidence, so as to approve the brief. Of course, it followed that, if there was no brief, there could be no motion for new trial, and, the motion being defective, there was no error in dismissing it. After reading the statement of the judge, we cannot say that he abused his discretion in dismissing the motion. It is well settled that in a case like the one at bar the approval or disapproval of the brief is a matter of discretion, and it does not appear that the plaintiff in error would gain any advantage in the case like this if the reviewing court should hold that the lower court had abused his discretion. We could not order a new trial, because the judge has not passed upon the motion. We could not direct him to approve the brief of evidence as presented, because it is not correct. We could not require him to correct it, because he does not remember what the evidence was. If in a case such as that now before us the reviewing court should hold that the judge abused his discretion, because the long delay which caused the lapse of memory was due to his laches and should reverse the judgment on the dismissal of the motion, thereby directing the judge to use his discretion in approving the brief and in passing upon the motion, we would move in a circle, because the judge does not remember the evidence, and, no matter to whom fault for the delay is to be charged, the brief cannot be approved nor the motion perfected. This would seem to be a case of a right without a remedy, because, in our view of it, where a brief of evidence is presented to the judge any time within the terms of the order of the court, it would seem that counsel for the movant has done all that is required of him under the provisions of Civil Code 1910, §§ 6089, 6090, 6093. There is no requirement that counsel for the movant for new trial should agree to the brief of evidence with his adversary. The statute says it is to be approved by the judge, and it would seem that where a bona fide effort has been made to prepare a correct brief of the evidence, and such a brief is timely presented to the court, the judge should himself correct any errors he may detect, or at least call the attention of movant's counsel to these errors, and, after pointing them out, require counsel to correct them. There is, to our minds, a striking analogy, so far as the duty of the judge in this regard is concerned, between the approval of the brief of evidence in a motion for new trial and the certifying of a bill of exceptions. However, with relation to the approval of the brief of evidence there is no statutory provision similar to that which requires a judge, upon the presentation to him of an incorrect bill of exceptions, to return it and, pointing out specifically the errors to be corrected, require the correction within a reasonable time of the errors pointed out by him.

It is true, as insisted by counsel for the plaintiff in error, that under this view of the law a judge can absolutely deprive a litigant of his rights, by refusing to approve a brief of evidence, or to point out the defects in it, until such lapse of time has occurred that the judge, not being able to remember the testimony, cannot approve any brief in the case. And yet the same thing is true as to the grounds of a motion for new trial, which may not be based upon the evidence at all, but relate to the errors in the charge, injurious conduct of the judge, or a variety of matters which may affect the trial. As to each of these the discretion of the judge to approve, or to refuse to approve, any or all of the grounds of the motion for new trial, is unconditional and uncontrollable. The judge cannot be required to approve the statements of the grounds of a motion for new trial, however vital they may be to the movant's rights. The law leaves the exercise of the judge's discretion as to such matters solely in his hands, and without any reference to the judge who presided in the case now before us (and whom the writer knows to be absolutely honest, impartial, and just), we might repeat the old joke, that the only remedy for the wrong, if any is committed, is to get another judge at the expiration of the incumbent's term.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 219*)—CRIMINAL LAW (§ 785*)—INSTRUCTIONS—IMPEACHMENT OF DYING DECLARATION.

"The credibility of a witness, whose testimony goes to the jury through the medium of dying declaration, is subject to the same attack as, and should be determined under the same rules governing, the testimony of living witnesses who testify upon the stand." Where therefore, the state introduces in evidence a dying declaration, and the accused attacks the credibility of the declarant, by proof of general bad character, or in any other way in which the law authorizes the impeachment of witnesses, it is the duty of the court, in response to an appropriate and timely written request, to instruct the jury that the dying declaration, as evidence, should be considered under the same rules that govern in determining the credibility of witnesses who testify from the stand. Hall v. State, 124 Ga. 651, 52 S. E. 891; Nesbit v. State, 43 Ga. 238.

The exception to the charge of the court on the subject of dying declarations is fully controlled by the decision of a majority of this court in the case of Darby v. State, 9 Ga. App. —, 72 S. E. 182.

3. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—ISSUES—VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER.

According to the evidence, the decedent had previously made an assault with a deadly weapon upon the accused. It was a question for the jury to determine whether, between this assault and the homicide, sufficient "cooling time" had elapsed. So the law of voluntary manslaughter was involved.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. VERDICT NOT ERRONEOUS.

The verdict was not, for any reason assigned, erroneous.

2. ADMISSIONS OF STATE'S COUNSEL—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The admissions of the state's counsel were not at variance with the allegations in the indictment, and the verdict of guilty was authorized by the evidence.

3. PERJURY (§ 23*)—INDICTMENT—ADMINISTRATION OF OATH.

When, in the course of a judicial investigation, an attorney at law, by the authority or permission of the court, administers the oath to a witness, he does so in behalf of the court. Consequently it may properly be alleged, in an indictment assigning perjury upon the testimony of such a witness delivered in a court of inquiry, that the oath was administered by the presiding magistrate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perjury, Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

4. PERJURY (§ 29*)—ISSUES AND PROOF.

A conviction of the offense of perjury is authorized when the evidence shows that on the prior investigation the accused testified willfully, knowingly, absolutely, and falsely, in substance, to the effect alleged in the indictment. It is not necessary that the proof as to the alleged false testimony shall correspond literally with the allegations of the indictment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perjury, Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

5. ISSUES AND PROOF—NO ERROR.

None of the assignments of error based upon a variance between the allegations of the indictment and the proof are sustained by the record.

Druke Cain was convicted of perjury, and brings error. Affirmed.

SOLOMON v. STATE. (No. 3,902.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 598*)—CONTINUANCE—GROUNDS.

There was no error in overruling the defendant's motion for a continuance, especially in view of the fact that it did not appear that the movant had subpoenaed the absent witness before he left the jurisdiction of the court, or had exercised any diligence in attempting to procure the presence of the witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1335-1341; Dec. Dig. § 598.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1038*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—ALIBI.

Under the facts of this case, failure of the court to instruct the jury upon the subject of alibi was not reversible error, in the absence of a timely and appropriate written request. Smith v. State, 6 Ga. App. 577, 65 S. E. 300.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2646; Dec. Dig. § 1038.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 563*)—EVIDENCE—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY—IMPEACHED WITNESSES.

It is within the power and right of a jury to believe a witness, no matter what effort may have been made to impeach him, or what testimony has been presented for that purpose, and even though the witness be not corroborated. The credibility of witnesses is exclusively for the jury, and it is not error to instruct the jury that they may accept the explanation of a witness as to why he has made contradictory statements, even though it be not sustained by other facts or circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1252; Dec. Dig. § 553.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—RELEVANCY.

There was no error in allowing a witness to state, in explanation of his reason for leaving his former residence, that he did so because certain persons put him in fear of his personal safety. It not appearing that the defendant was one of the parties who were alleged to have intimidated the witness, the testimony could not have been prejudicial to the defendant, but would seem to have been rather to his advantage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3137-3143; Dec. Dig. § 1169.*]

5. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—No Error.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and the trial appears to have been free from error.

Randall Solomon was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EMBEZZLEMENT (§ 4*)—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—LARCENY AFTER TRUST.

Where a master intrusts to his servant a bill, for the purpose of getting it changed and bringing back the change to him, and the servant fraudulently appropriates the bill to his own use, and does not return it or the change, he is guilty, not of simple larceny, but of larceny after trust.

Error from City Court of Vienna; W. H. Lasseter, Judge.

Addie Basley was convicted of larceny, and brings error. Reversed.

Alexander Akerman and John R. Cooper, for plaintiff in error. Watts Powell, Sol., for the State.

POTTLE, J. Basley was a servant upon the farm of Nobles, in Dooly county. Nobles agreed to advance Basley $21, and Basley agreed to go to Macon and use this money in transporting his wife and household goods to Dooly county. On Wednesday Nobles gave Basley five $5 bills in Dooly county, and Basley agreed that he would get the money changed in Macon, where he was going, and repay the $4 the next Friday, on his return. He converted the whole amount to his own use. He was convicted of simple larceny, under an accusation charging that offense.

The case seems to fall squarely within that of Mobley v. State, 114 Ga. 544, 40 S. E.

728, where it was held: "When a master intrusts to his servant a bill, for the purpose of getting the same changed and bringing back the change to the former, and the latter fraudulently appropriates the bill to his own use, and does not return either it or the change, he is guilty, not of simple larceny, but of larceny after trust." The distinction between the case in hand and cases like Finkelstein v. State, 105 Ga. 617, 31 S. E. 589, and Walker v. State, 72 S. E. 446, was pointed out in the Mobley Case. In those cases no fiduciary relation existed between the owner of the money and the thief, and there was no bailment in a legal sense. In contemplation of law, the legal possession never passed out of the owner. Here there was a technical trust to a person standing in a fiduciary relation, and both the actual and legal possession had been voluntarily surrendered, without any fraud or artifice on the part of the person intrusted, other than that involved in the promise to repay the money at a stated time. Cunningham's Case, in 118 Ga. 125, 44 S. E. 846, Martin v. State, 123 Ga. 478, 51 S. E. 334, and Bryant v. State, 8 Ga. App. 389, 69 S. E. 121, may also be distinguished, upon the principle of Barron v. State, 126 Ga. 92, 54 S. E. 812, where Mr. Justice Atkinson very clearly points out the difference between simple larceny, where possession is obtained by fraud, and larceny after trust, where possession is voluntarily surrendered, and the relation of bailor and bailee created.

Woods, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Bamberg County; George E. Prince, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Nettie Speaks and another against the Southern Railway Company, Carolina Division. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harley & Best, for appellant. S. G. Mayfield and H. M. Graham, for respondents.

GARY, C. J. [1] This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff Mrs. Nettie Speaks on account of the defendant's refusal to provide for her a lower berth in a Pullman car, in accordance with the terms of the contract entered into by them. The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions presented by the exceptions, are as follows: "That the plaintiffs, being desirous of going from the city of Bamberg, on defendant's trains, to the city of Baltimore, bought a ticket from defendant's said agent, and paid the price asked therefor by the defendant. That before buying the said ticket, and being desirous of securing sleeping accommodations, the plaintiffs applied to the agent of defendant at the city of Bamberg for said accommodations to be reserved, and the agent of the said defendant, on said application, applied to the traveling passenger agent of the defendant to make said reservation, and, when informed by the said traveling passenger agent that said reservation had been made for the plaintiffs, thereupon the plaintiffs purchased a ticket from the said agent at Bamberg, to the city of Baltimore, over the roads of the defendant herein and its connecting lines, and tendered the full pay for the said ticket, together with the reservation of sleeping apartments, as aforesaid, but the agent of the defendant at Bamberg declined to receive the amount of the reservation, which had been allotted to the plaintiffs, and directed them to pay for the said reservation aboard the cars at Columbia, which connecting railway arranged with the railway of defendants. That these plaintiffs, relying upon the good faith of the defendant, its agent, servants, and employes, as aforesaid, bought the ticket, as aforesaid, from the county of Bamberg to the city of Baltimore, over the lines of the defendant and its connecting lines, and paid the price asked therefor in the city of Columbia, according to the arrangements agreed upon with the agent, servant, and employe of the defendant; and these plaintiffs arranged to take the train, and to occupy the sleeping apartments which had been so assigned unto them, but before taking said train inquired of the agent, servant, and employe of the defendant in the city of Columbia as to the pay for said reservation, and was directed by him to pay the same aboard the train, and that said reservation had been made, as was evidenced by the telegram sent by the traveling passenger agent of the defendant to the agent of the defendant at Bamberg, S. C. That these plaintiffs boarded the said train, believing that said reservation was made, and upon the assurance of the officer, agent, servant, and employe of the said defendant herein, to the person in charge of the said sleeping reservations connected with said train, assuring them that the reservations were made, and that they would be furnished with the same aboard said train. That the plaintiffs boarded the train, as aforesaid, with the said assurance of the agent, servant, and employes of the defendant herein, of its agents in charge of the said sleeping reservation; but the said agent, servant, and employe refused to put these plaintiffs in possession of the reservation, which had been made to them, although plaintiff tendered and often entreated and insisted upon their being given the reservation assigned to them, so that these plaintiffs were compelled to be up and ride in the open cars, without the sleeping reservation that had been made for them, and for which they had agreed with the defendant, its agent, servant, and employe, as aforesaid, should be furnished, and without such reservation these plaintiffs would not have bought said ticket, so that the plaintiffs grew weary, were broken down in health, and for a long time made sick by the acts and conduct of the defendant, its agent, servant, and employe. That the acts of the servants, agents, and employes of the defendant were wanton, willful, malicious, wicked, unlawful, and was intended to, and did subject these plaintiffs to great hardships, and made them sick and unfit to attend to their business, and entailed upon them additional costs, hardships, and privations, to their damage $1,500." There was a motion for a nonsuit, also for the direction of a verdict; but both motions were refused. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff Mrs. Nettie Speaks for $625. The defendant appealed upon exceptions, all of which were withdrawn except those raising the question whether there was any testimony tending to show that the plaintiff was entitled to punitive damages.

There was testimony tending to sustain all the allegations of the complaint, with reference to the plaintiff Mrs. Nettle Speaks; and it tends to show a reckless disregard of her rights. It would subserve no useful purpose to discuss the testimony at length.

[2] The rule is thus stated in Railroad v. Partlow, 14 Rich. 237, and quoted with approval in Dantzer v. Cox, 75 S. C. 334, 55 S. E. 774: "It may be that no one of the facts would of itself warrant the inference, and yet, when taken together, they may produce belief, which is the object of evidence."

Judgment affirmed.

WOODS, J. (dissenting). The allegations of the complaint upon which the plaintiffs recovered a verdict for $625 are fully set out in the opinion of the Chief Justice. The testimony on the part of the plaintiffs was to the effect that the defendant had contracted to furnish Mrs. Speaks with a lower berth on a sleeping car from Columbia to Baltimore, and that it failed to discharge the duty it had assumed to her as a passenger on its train. For such breach of duty the plaintiffs were, of course, entitled to recover the actual damages which resulted. But it seems to me there was not a particle of evidence warranting the conclusion that the defendant's agents were guilty of any wanton or willful disregard of the plaintiffs' rights, and that the motion for nonsuit as to the cause of action for punitive damages should have been granted.

Courteous consideration is the rule of conduct of nearly all men in their treatment of each other, and none but the abnormally brutish are willfully or wantonly inconsiderate of the rights of women. It follows that, when there is a breach of a duty owed by one man to another, the presumption of fact is strong that it is due to inadvertence or mistake, and not to willfulness or wantonness; and the presumption is still stronger when the breach is of a duty owed to a woman.

The train was run on the 18th of August as a special excursion train from Augusta to Baltimore. Accepting as true the testimony of the plaintiffs, no inference can be drawn from it more adverse to the defendant than that the train was crowded and that the failure to give Mrs. Speaks a lower berth was due to confusion and mistake in the engagement and assignment of the berths. The evidence that a passenger getting on at Chester claimed and was allowed a berth in the section where the plaintiffs were sitting does not tend to prove wanton or willful disregard of the rights of Mrs. Speaks by giving preference to another passenger, for the plaintiffs did not claim to have engaged a berth in that particular section, and it does not appear that the Chester passenger got a lower berth which was the only kind the plaintiffs would accept. There was not the slightest evidence of disrespect to Mrs. Speaks or her husband; on the contrary, both of them testified that the conductor assured them there had been a "mix-up," but that he would do his best to furnish a berth, and that this assurance was repeated up to the moment when they insisted on leaving the train at Chester with the intent of taking a berth on the next train.

For these reasons, I think the circuit court erred in refusing the motion for a nonsuit as to the alleged cause of action for punitive damages.

FOWLER v. TOWN COUNCIL OF TOWN OF FOUNTAIN INN et al

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 7, 1912.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 918*)—BOND DEBTS—STREET LIGHTING—AUTHORITY TO CONTRACT.

A contract between a town and a corporation to light the streets of the town for a period of 10 years is of the nature of a bond debt, which, under Const. art. 8, § 7, cannot be created without the sanction of a majority of the qualified electors of the town.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 918.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 279*) — STREET LIGHTING—CONTRACT—APPROVAL BY VOTERS—ELECTION—AUTHORITY TO CALL.

Under Civ. Code 1902, § 1999, which confers upon the councils of all cities and towns power to make such rules, by-laws, regulations, and ordinances as are necessary for their security and welfare, a city council may provide for the lighting of the public streets and buildings and order an election to ascertain the wishes of the qualified electors in regard to such improvement, as the Constitution requires.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 739; Dec. Dig. § 279.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 918*)—CONTRACTS—STREET LIGHTING—AUTHORITY TO MAKE.

Under Civ. Code 1902, § 2021, as amended by Act Feb. 24, 1908 (25 St. at Large, p. 1038), which makes it the duty of town authorities, upon the petition of a majority of the freeholders, to order a special election on the question of issuing bonds for any corporate purpose, set forth in the petition, a town council was authorized upon such a petition to submit to the electors the question whether the council should contract for the lighting of public streets and buildings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 918.*]

4. ELECTIONS (§ 95*)—TOWN ELECTIONS—REGISTRATION OF VOTERS.

Const. art. 2, § 11, provides that the registration books shall close at least 30 days before an election, during which time transfers and registration shall not be legal. Const. art. 2, § 12, deals specifically with the registration of electors in municipal elections, and provides their qualifications and disqualifications, but contains no requirement for the closing of the registration books at any time before the election. Held, it is apparent from the context that the registration books mentioned in section 11 are the county registration books, and Civ. Code 1902, § 195, as amended by Act Feb. 26, 1908 (25 St. at Large, p. 1026), which provides that 20 days prior to a special municipal election the books of registration shall be open for the registration of qualified electors and shall remain open for 10 days, is not unconstitutional, as, in the absence of a constitutional requirement as to the time of closing, the Legislature may fix any time within its discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. §§ 95, 96; Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

"To be officially reported."

Petition for injunction by J. W. Fowler against the Town Council of the Town of Fountain Inn and others. Petition dismissed.

Bomar & Osborne, for petitioner. R. M. Babb, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. The petitioner, who is a citizen and taxpayer of the town of Fountain Inn, seeks to enjoin the town council of said town from making a contract with the Enoree Power Company to light the streets and public places and public buildings of said town for a period of 10 years.

[1] It may be conceded that the proposed contract is of the nature of a bond debt (Duncan v. Charleston, 60 S. C. 532, 39 S. E. 265), which cannot be created without the sanction of a majority of the qualified electors of the town. Constitution, art. 8, § 7.

It appears from the record that on September 1, 1911, a special election was held in said town, in which the question of making said contract was submitted to the qualified electors thereof, and the majority of them voted in favor of making the contract. It also appears that the election was duly and regularly ordered, but the petitioner questions the legality of it on two grounds: First, he contends that the town council had no authority from the Legislature to order such an election, and that, without such authority, it was void.

[2] Section 1999 of the Code (volume 1, Code 1902) confers upon the councils of all cities and towns in the state "power and authority to make, ordain and establish all such rules, by-laws, regulations and ordinances respecting the roads, streets, markets, police, health and order of said cities and towns, or respecting any subject as shall appear to them necessary and proper for the security, welfare and convenience of such cities and towns, or for preserving health, peace, order and good government within the same." Certainly the language quoted is broad enough to include the power to take every step necessary and proper to make provision for the lighting of the streets, public places, and public buildings of the town; and therefore, upon the filing of a petition signed by a majority of the freeholders of the town, as required by the Constitution and statutes, the town council had authority to order the election.

[3] Moreover, as the making of the contract is the creation of a bond debt, section 2021 of the Code (volume 1, Code 1902) also seems to us to be applicable and to confer the necessary authority. That section, as amended by the act of 1908 (25 Stat. 1038), makes it the duty of the authorities of any city or town, upon the petition of a majority of the freeholders thereof, to order a special election "for the purpose of issuing bonds" for various purposes enumerated, concluding with the words "or any corporate purpose set forth in said petition." It cannot be denied that the contract in question is for a corporate purpose which was set forth in the petition.

[4] The second ground upon which the validity of the election is contested is because the registration books of the town were opened 20 days before the election and kept open 10 days for the purpose of registering the qualified electors of the town, and because the voters who were registered within that time voted in the election. This was done in pursuance of section 195 of the Code (volume 1, Code 1902) as amended by the act of 1908 (25 Stat. 1026). The petitioner contends that this statute violates section 11 of article 2 of the Constitution, which provides: "The registration books shall close at least thirty days before an election, during which time transfers and registration shall not be legal." It clearly appears from the context—that is, from the preceding and following sections—that the registration books mentioned in section 11 are the county registration books, in which electors in state and county elections are registered, for the very next section (section 12) deals specifically with the registration of electors in municipal elections, and provides: "Electors in municipal elections shall possess the qualifications and be subject to the disqualifications herein prescribed. The production of a certificate of registration from the registration officers of the county as an elector at a precinct included in the incorporated city or town in which the voters desire to vote is declared a condition prerequisite to his obtaining a certificate of registration for municipal elections," etc. The case of Gunter v. Gayden, 84 S. C. 48, 65 S. E. 948, cited by counsel for petitioner, is authority for the position that the registration books of the county must be closed, as to any city or town election, 30 days before such election; but there is nothing in the opinion in that case which sustains the contention that the provision of the Constitution above quoted from (section 11) requires the registration books of a city or town to be closed 30 days before an election. There being no provision in the Constitution as to when such books shall be closed, the Legislature may fix any time within its discretion.

The petition is therefore dismissed.

Mandamus by R. L. Golden against J. B. Wharton and others. Petition dismissed.

D. H. Magill, for petitioner. Giles & Ouzts, for respondents.

WOODS, J. The petitioner, R. L. Golden, alleging that he is acting in good faith as a de facto rural policeman for the county of Greenwood, and as such de facto officer is entitled to the salary of the office from the 7th day of June, 1911, till the 7th day of January, 1912, asks this court to issue its writ of mandamus commanding J. B. Wharton, foreman of the grand jury, and T. G. Burnett, supervisor, G. B. Riley and George Dorn, constituting the county board of commissioners, and F. Graham Payne, treasurer of said county, to draw the order and issue a warrant to pay the salary alleged to be due the petitioner, amounting to the sum of $583.31. The rights of the petitioner have been adjudicated in proceedings heretofore instituted by him under the following provision of Act Feb. 18, 1911 (27 St. at Large, p. 194): "Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of South Carolina, that upon the approval of this act it shall be the duty of the Governor, upon the recommendation of the delegation of Greenwood county, to appoint three able-bodied men of the county of Greenwood, who are of good habits and of courage, coolness and discretion, known as men who are not addicted to the use of alcoholic liquors, or of drugs, and shall commission them as county policemen, for a term of four years, subject to removal by the Governor for cause: provided, however, that no person shall be eligible to appointment who makes application for such appointment." On the petition of Golden and Elledge, this court issued its writ of mandamus requiring payment to them of the salaries provided by law for rural policemen for the two months ending May 7, 1911. In that cause reported in 89 S. C. 113, 71 S. E. 657, the court thus stated the manner of appointment of the petitioners and the invalidity of it: "It appears that the act was approved Saturday night, February 18, 1911, the last day of the legislative session, and that the Governor on the same night appointed petitioners as rural policemen upon the recommendation alone of Hon. D. H. Magill, one of the Greenwood delegation. It is stated in the affidavit of Sen. C. A. C. Waller and Rep. W. H. Nicholson and J. W. Bowers, the other members of the Greenwood delegation, that the appointments were made without their recommendation before they had knowledge of the approval of the act or opportunity to recommend. * * * Appointment to office not being inherently an executive prerogative, it is competent for the Legislature, in conferring the power of appointment, to attach such limitations and conditions to its exercise as may be deemed proper. The statute expressly provides that the appointment of rural policemen for Greenwood county shall be upon the recommendation of the legislative delegation of Greenwood county. No such recommendation having been made, the appointment was made without authority, and the petitioners cannot be held to be officers de jure."

Considering, however, that the petitioners had performed the duties of the office in good faith under the commission of the Governor which had not up to that time been declared invalid, the court held that the petitioners were de facto officers, and that they were entitled to receive the salary for the two months ending May 7, 1911, inasmuch as neither the office nor the salary was claimed by any other persons. The writ of mandamus was accordingly issued. Subsequently, under proper proceedings, Mr. Justice Gary, applying the rule thus laid down by the court, issued at chambers another writ of mandamus requiring payment of the salary of rural policemen to the same parties for the month ending June 7, 1911, on the ground that they should be regarded de facto officers, and entitled to the salary up to June 14, 1911. When the decree was filed adjudging the petitioners to have no legal title to the office.

In the proceeding now under consideration, the petitioner claims to be still a de facto officer and entitled to the salary in the face of the decision of this court above referred to that he has no claim whatever to the office. To state the position is to demonstrate its unsoundness. It is impossible that the petitioner could have continued to assert a claim to the office or to assume to act as a rural policeman under a bona fide belief that he was an officer after it had been finally adjudged that his claim to the office was without foundation. From the date of the judgment that the petitioner was not legally appointed, and was not entitled to the office,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

his attempt to act as a policeman was a mere usurpation. Such disregard of judicial authority is nothing less than an attempt to subvert the law, and is not to be sanctioned nor tolerated.

The petition is dismissed.

2. STREET RAILROADS (§ 24*)—STREET RAILROAD FRANCHISE—DELEGATION OF LEGISLATIVE POWER.

A city ordinance, authorizing a street railway company to construct and lay such double tracks in the streets where it already has single tracks as it may from time to time deem proper for the purpose of rendering efficient service, sufficiently designates the streets in which the company may lay the double tracks. And the fact that the time at which such double tracks may be laid is thus left to the discretion of the company, to be exercised by it for the purpose of "rendering efficient service," does not divest the city of the legislative power involved in the grant of a franchise to the street railway company, nor does it confer upon the company itself the right to exercise an authority involving the element of governmental or legislative power.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

3. STREET RAILROADS (§ 24*)—FRANCHISE—REPEAL OF ORDINANCE.

An ordinance providing that a single track may be laid in any given street is not in any sense repealed by a subsequent ordinance authorizing a street railway to lay double tracks in all streets where single tracks had been laid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

4. INTERLOCUTORY INJUNCTION REFUSED—NO ERROR.

Under the evidence and the pleadings, the court did not err in refusing the interlocutory injunction.

5. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 119*)—NATURE AND EXTENT OF POWER—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISION.

A provision in an ordinance granting a franchise to a consolidated electric railway company, authorizing the company to physically connect, merge, and consolidate the properties which it may acquire wherever it desires and to construct and lay such double tracks, curves, switches, etc., as it may deem proper for this purpose or for the purpose of rendering efficient service, is not violative of Const. art. 1, § 3, par. 1, providing that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public purposes without just and adequate compensation being first paid, though it makes no provision for the assessment or payment of damages to the property of petitioners in constructing a double-track line.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by Jerome Silvey and others against the Georgia Railway & Electric Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Henry A. Alexander and Smith, Hammond & Smith, for plaintiffs in error. Colquitt & Conyers, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. Jerome Silvey and other citizens and taxpayers of the city of Atlanta, all of whom resided on Forrest avenue, a public street in the city of Atlanta, and who owned property abutting on that street, filed their equitable petition against the Georgia Railway & Electric Company, alleging as follows: The defendant is preparing to construct and operate on Forrest avenue a line of double tracks in lieu of the present single track now being operated. If this purpose should be consummated, it would, on account of the narrowness of Forrest avenue, result in the creation of a public nuisance by making it difficult and dangerous for other vehicles to use said street, and would inflict a special damage upon petitioners, not shared by the general public, by destroying the right of ingress and egress to and from their property by vehicles in the street, and would inflict upon them irreparable damages which cannot be estimated in money. The company has never been given the right, by any valid ordinance, to construct a double track, and the construction and operation of a double track would constitute an additional servitude and burden upon the fee in the street, which was not contemplated in the original dedication of the street. A large part of the value of the property of the plaintiffs is in the shade trees growing on the sidewalk, some of which are 40 years old; and in the construction of a double-track line which is to be operated by a trolley system of electric wires, it would be necessary to make a place for the trolley wires, and in doing so it would be necessary to cut off many large limbs and branches of said trees and greatly impair their beauty and symmetry. The fee of the sidewalk and roadway of Forrest avenue is in the abutting owners, and the trees are their individual property, and that the cutting and defacing of these trees would constitute an actual taking of their property. The defendant has not tendered to them any sum for the damage to be done to their property, and has made no effort to ascertain the same; and until this is done the proceedings of the defendant are without authority and void, and are a trespass upon petitioners' property. They pray for the grant of an injunction against the defendant, restraining it from constructing the double track as proposed. The defendant contends that it has authority to construct a double track, given to it in a valid ordinance passed by the municipal authorities. It denies that it would injure or damage the plaintiffs' property, or that it would actually take any of their property, or that the laying of the double track would be an additional servitude and burden upon the fee in the street; and it shows that while it will be necessary to trim some portion of the branches of the trees which grow over the sidewalk to a certain extent, the same will be done under the supervision of the park commission of the city of Atlanta, or by the authorities of said city, and will not result in any damage to the value or the beauty of the trees. Also, that on account of the growth and development of the city of Atlanta the construction of a double track is necessary in order to render efficient service to the public. At the interlocutory hearing the court refused the injunction, and the petitioners excepted.

In an ordinance of the city of Atlanta, granting to the Atlanta Rapid Transit Company a franchise to construct a street car line on Forrest avenue, approved February 26, 1901, it is provided that "authority and consent be and the same are hereby granted to the Atlanta Rapid Transit Company, its successors and assigns, to construct, electrically equip, and operate a line of single track of street railway, with all the necessary and proper turnouts, switches, curves, and connections along and over the following route, to wit: Commencing on Forrest avenue at the intersection of said street with Peachtree street and Ivy street, and running thence on Forrest avenue to Piedmont avenue, and from Piedmont avenue to Jackson street, and if Forrest avenue be subsequently extended from Jackson street to Boulevard, thence to Boulevard. The right being given to construct, equip, and operate either a single or double track on said street from Piedmont avenue to Jackson street or Boulevard in the event Forrest avenue be so extended." The ordinance embraces certain qualifications, limitations, restrictions, and conditions upon the authority granted in the section quoted above. Another ordinance by the mayor and general council of the city of Atlanta was adopted January 27, 1902, and approved February 8, 1902, which provided for the consolidation of the Atlanta Railway & Power Company, the Atlanta Rapid Transit Company, the Georgia Electric Light Company, and the Atlanta Steam Company. The consolidated company resulting from the merger of the companies just named is the defendant in the present suit, and is the successor in title to all the rights, privileges, and franchises of the constituent companies named above, with certain specified exceptions not necessary here to note. The tenth section of the above ordinance passed in 1902 provides as follows: "Be it further ordained that said consolidated company, its successors and assigns, are hereby granted the right and permission to physically connect, merge and consolidate the said properties which it may acquire, wherever it desires, and to construct and lay such double tracks, curves, switches, connections, wires, tracks, etc., as it may from time to time deem proper for this purpose, or for the purpose of rendering efficient service, and to straighten out the kinks in its tracks and lines; it being the intention hereof to allow the full and complete consolidation of the companies hereinbefore referred to and their properties whereby the freest possible use and profit thereof may result to said consolidated company, and so that said company may consolidate, control, and operate all of said properties as it may desire, subject only to proper police laws and restrictions."

[1, 5] 1. It is insisted by petitioners that this section of the ordinance of 1902 is violative of paragraph 1, § 3, art. 1, of the Constitution of the state of Georgia, providing that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public purposes without just and adequate compensation being first paid, in that it makes no provision for the assessment and payment of damages for injury to the property of petitioners in constructing a double-track line. The question of the validity of section 10 of the ordinance of 1902, on the ground that it is violative of the constitutional provision just cited, is controlled by the decisions in the cases of Moore v. City of Atlanta, 70 Ga. 611, and Brown v. Atlanta Railway & Power Co., 113 Ga. 462, 39 S. E. 71. We have been requested to review and reverse these cases. In our opinion the rulings made in those cases should not now be disturbed, and we accordingly decline to overrule them. See, in this connection, Fleming v. City of Rome, 130 Ga. 383, 61 S. E. 5.

The court was authorized to hold, under the evidence in the case, that the trimming of shade trees standing on the sidewalk in front of petitioners' property would not constitute an actual taking of petitioners' property. And where the branches of these trees extend over the streets in such a manner as to interfere with the enjoyment of the easement in a street, the city authorities would have the right to cut and trim the branches, though in so doing they should exercise due care not unnecessarily to injuriously affect the trees, their beauty and their symmetry. City of Atlanta v. Holliday, 96 Ga. 546, 23 S. E. 509.

[2] 2. In paragraph 9 of the petition it is conceded that section 10 of the ordinance of 1902, already set forth, gives to the consolidated company, in a general clause, a right to double track any of its existing lines, but the plaintiffs contend that this general grant of authority to lay double tracks should not be given effect, as it does not specify the streets in which the double tracks shall be laid, but leaves to the beneficiary company the right to select the streets and choose the time at which the double tracks shall be laid; that the grant of a right to construct a street railway in the streets of a city is the exercise of governmental power; that the legislative power thus involved in granting a street railway franchise cannot be delegated by a municipal government, and especially that such delegation would be void if made to the street railway company itself; and that if effect is given to this general clause in section 10 of the ordinance of 1902, it would amount, in effect, to divesting the city council of this governmental power in this particular respect and conferring it upon the street railway company. We do not think this contention is sound. The franchise authorizing the laying of a single track in the street had been duly granted, so far as appears from the record; and no suggestion to the contrary is made. So far as the granting of the right to lay a double track where only a single track had previously been laid may be considered as a franchise. That, too, was granted by the city council in the exercise of its governmental power. The franchise was granted in all of the streets where single tracks had already been laid. The council knew in which streets these single tracks then existed, and this designation of the streets in which the defendant company might lay double tracks was as effectual as if it had named each one of them. The fact that the company was to exercise a discretion as to the time at which the improvements along its line should be made and double tracks should be laid was not in the nature of the exercise of any creative or legislative power, in which franchises like those under consideration must have their origin. It did nothing more than confer upon the company the authority to decide when the exigencies of traffic resulting from the growth and expansion of the city required it to increase the facilities for handling the traffic. It no more conferred upon the company the right to exercise a legislative or governmental function than would an ordinance which granted a franchise to lay a street railway in the streets of a city and which provided that the track might be laid at any time within one or two years. In each case—that supposed as well as in the actual case—discretion as to the exact time at which the work of laying the track should be commenced and performed would be vested in the company receiving the franchise; the only difference being that in the supposed case there was a limitation of time within which the privilege conferred should be exercised.

[3] 3. We cannot agree with the contention of counsel for plaintiffs in error that so much of the ordinance of 1902 as grants the right to lay a double track in streets where there was already a single track in any way contravenes or conflicts with that part of the ordinance of 1901, which allows the laying of a single track in a designated portion of Forrest avenue or throughout the length of that street. But where a single track had been originally laid under the ordinance of 1901, a double track could be laid under the provisions of the ordinance of 1902.

[4] 4. Under the evidence and the pleadings the court did not err in refusing the interlocutory injunction.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. KING BROS. & CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. ASSIGNMENTS (§ 48)—CONSTRUCTION—LEGAL OR EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT.

A writing executed by an employé of a railway company recited that: "I hereby sell, transfer, and assign to King Bros. & Co., doing business in the city of Atlanta, Ga., my account for salary or wages already earned by me during the month of May, 1910, and amounting to $27.75, and due me by Central of Georgia Railway Company. I hereby direct my said employer to pay to King Bros. & Co. said account, amounting to $27.75. This is an absolute and unconditional sale of said account, and is not a loan or advance of money, and is not a discount. I am not a debtor to the purchaser. This is an original transaction, and is not a renewal or extension of any kind." Held, that the instrument is an assignment of the legal title to the particular money therein specified, and is not a partial assignment of a general fund belonging to the assignor in the hands of the railway company, and therefore is not governed by the law as to equitable assignments.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

2. VENUE (§ 27*)—ASSIGNMENT—JOINT DEFENDANTS.

The venue of the action brought by the assignee in the instrument above referred to against the Central of Georgia Railway Company and the assignor, in which the petition prayed for a judgment against the company for the amount named in the assignment, that the salary account of the assignor while in the employment of the company, to the extent of the sum stated in the assignment, "be decreed to be in" the plaintiff, and that the company "be required to pay the same over to" the plaintiff, "free from costs," was not in the county of Fulton, wherein the assignor resided when the action was instituted, but was in the county of Chatham, as the charter of the Central of Georgia Railway Company, granted by the Legislature, fixes the principal office of business of such company in the city of Savannah, Chatham county. It does not appear from the petition that the contract of employment by the company of the assignor was either executed or to be performed in Fulton county (if that would give jurisdiction there as to the company), or that the assignor had ever denied the validity of such assignment, or made any contention that the plaintiff was not entitled to the sum assigned. The fact that the assignee served written notice of the assignment upon an agent of the company stationed in Fulton county, and demanded payment of such agent of the amount stated in the assignment, did not give the court of that county jurisdiction of the company. Under the allegations of the petition, the assignor was neither a necessary nor a proper party to such action, and the joining of him as a codefendant therein with the railway company did not give jurisdiction of the company to a court of his residence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. § 41; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

3. DEMURRER TO PLEADING—JURISDICTION OF COURT.

The trial judge erred in refusing to sustain an appropriate demurrer made by the railway company in such action, challenging the jurisdiction of the superior court of Fulton county as to the company.

BAIRD v. ENGRAM & ROBINSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 16, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. TRIAL (§ 60)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—EVIDENCE DEPENDENT ON PRELIMINARY PROOF.

Engram & Robinson sued Martin and Mrs. Baird on an open account. On the trial the court permitted one of the plaintiffs to testify as follows: "Martin stated that he wanted some stuff for feeding cows in the dairy business. I told Martin that I would sell them, if Mrs. Baird would agree to pay it, and they would give us a note for the amount as soon as they had bought as much as $100 worth of stuff. Martin said that she authorized him to get the stuff, and wanted to carry away a load at that time; but I told him that he would have to see Mrs. Baird, and get an agreement to give a note also. Later Martin came, and stated that he and Mrs. Baird wanted the stuff, and that they would give the note as requested." Counsel for Mrs. Baird, who alone defended the suit, objected to this testimony, because she was not present when the conversation referred to took place, and because there was no evidence that Martin was her agent, or that any partnership existed between him and her. The judge stated that he would admit the evidence to show the transaction, but not to bind Mrs. Baird, unless the testimony should connect her with and show her a party thereto. There was a sharp conflict in the testimony of the two plaintiffs on the one side, and that of Mrs. Baird and Martin on the other, as to whether Mrs. Baird was interested in the dairy business, or bought or received the benefits of any of the articles stated in the account sued on. Martin testified that he never made the statement attributed to him in the testimony of the plaintiff, as above set out; and he and Mrs. Baird both testified that she never authorized him to purchase any of the goods, and that the dairy business belonged to him alone, and that she never got any benefit of the articles sued for. There was evidence in behalf of the plaintiffs tending to show that Mrs. Baird and Martin were partners in such business. As the jury was authorized to find, under the evidence, that a partnership in the dairy business, for which the goods were purchased, existed between Mrs. Baird and Martin, and as she purchased some of the articles in person, and they were charged to herself and Martin, we do not think that the admission of the testimony objected to, when taken in connection with the statement of the judge when allowing it to go in evidence, is cause for a new trial.

2. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and it was not error to refuse a new trial.

VENABLE v. YOUNG.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 728*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—SUFFICIENCY.

An assignment of error that the court erred in admitting in evidence a written instrument over objection on the ground "that said note had been changed since the execution of the same" is an insufficient assignment of error, in that it fails to show the character or materiality of the change.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3010-3012; Dec. Dig. § 728.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—REVIEW—ABANDONMENT OF ERROR.

The exception to the court's charge set forth in the second ground of the amended motion for a new trial is not argued or insisted upon in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, and is treated as abandoned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4258-4261; Dec. Dig. § 1078.*]

3. SALES (§ 479*)—CONDITIONAL SALES—RECOVERY OF PROPERTY BY SELLER—SURRENDER OF WRITTEN CONTRACT.

Where, as in the present case, the written obligation of the vendee to pay for the goods purchased, and the stipulation that the title to the property is to remain in the vendor until payment is made, are contained in the same instrument, it is not necessary that it should appear that the vendor offered to surrender up the writing which contained evidence of his title to the property before bringing suit in trover to recover the same. He should, however, be in possession of the writing at the time of the trial, or sufficiently account therefor. Moultrie Repair Co. v. Hill, 120 Ga. 732, 48 S. E. 143. And if the plaintiff elects to take judgment for the property and the hire thereof, the written instrument should be delivered up to the defendant, as the election to take the property amounts to a rescission of the contract, and after judgment in the case the plaintiff would have no further demand against the defendant under and by virtue of such writing. Glisson v. Heggie, 105 Ga. 30, 31 S. E. 113.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1418-1438; Dec. Dig. § 479.*]

4. SALES (§ 479*)—CONDITIONAL SALES—RECOVERY OF PROPERTY BY SELLER—INSTRUCTIONS.

The plaintiff in the case having elected to take a verdict for the property and its hire, the court did not err in charging the jury as follows: "If you find that the plaintiff is entitled to recover he would be entitled to recover a reasonable hire for the mules from the time this suit was brought."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 479.*]

HUCKABY v. ARCHER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 309*)—EVICTION OF TENANT—INSTRUCTIONS—DOUBLE RENT.

On the trial of the issue made by a counter affidavit filed in resistance to an affidavit for warrant sued out to evict one as a tenant at sufferance, holding over after demand for possession of the property had been made and refused, it is the proper practice for the court, in the course of his charge to the jury relative to the amount of rent, if they should find in favor of the plaintiff, to instruct them that in case any rental value of the premises had been proved the plaintiff would be entitled to recover double such rental value, and allow the jury to fix and return the amount of the double rent in their verdict. But it is not ground for a new trial for the court, instead of thus instructing the jury, to charge them as follows: "Now, if you find for the plaintiff in this case, the form of your verdict will be: 'We, the jury, find for the plaintiff against the defendant the premises in dispute.' And if you find rent, you may find rent if any rental value has been proven, and if you find that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, under the evidence and law given you in charge, you would fix the amount of rent and say: 'And we further find the value of the premises for rent to be so many dollars per month.' This question of double rent is a matter, I think, for the judgment of the court. It is for the jury to find the facts in the case."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1317, 1318; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

2. INSTRUCTIONS.

Except as pointed out above, the portions of the charge complained of in the motion for a new trial were not open to the criticisms made.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 302*)—REVIEW—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—OBJECTIONS.

A ground of a motion for a new trial based upon the admission of certain testimony does not raise any question for decision here, where it fails to show what objection, if any, was urged on the trial at the time such testimony was admitted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1744-1752; Dec. Dig. § 302.*]

4. NEW TRIAL (§ 128*)—GROUNDS—INDEFINITENESS.

The motion for a new trial contained the following ground: "The court erred in admitting the evidence of the witness W. J. Harper that the condition of the bond for titles had not been complied with, over the objection of plaintiff's counsel, on the ground that it was introduced for the purpose only to show an adverse claim, and the witness was introduced for the sole purpose of proving the execution of the bond. His evidence could not have illustrated the question of possession as ruled by the court." This ground is so indefinite, confusing, and incomplete as to raise no question for determination. Lay v. N. C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 131 Ga. 345, 62 S. E. 189; Sparks Improvement Co. v. Jones, 4 Ga. App. 61, 60 S. E. 810.

PURTELL v. FARRIS.

FARRIS v. PURTELL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—REVIEW—ABANDONMENT OF ERROR.

Assignments of error not referred to in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error will be treated as abandoned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4256-4261; Dec. Dig. § 1078.*]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 308*)—PROCEEDINGS TO EVICT TENANT—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In a proceeding to evict a tenant holding over under Civ. Code 1910, § 5385 et seq., it was not error to exclude from evidence the record of a proceeding in court between the same parties to evict the tenant for failure to pay rent, instituted before the end of the term, where it appeared that the tenant resisted the warrant for eviction and remained in possession until after the term.

(a) Nor was it error to exclude evidence as to the release of the tenant from the contract and the substitution of another under an arrangement between the alleged substituted tenant, and the real estate agents having the property in charge for rent, in the absence of evidence of authority from the tenant on the one hand, and of the landlord on the other, to make such change.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1314-1316; Dec. Dig. § 308.*]

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§§ 118, 119, 309*)—TERMINATION OF TENANCY—PROCEEDINGS TO RECOVER POSSESSION—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

A tenant under a lease for a specified time is under duty at the expiration of his term to surrender possession to his landlord. If he fails to do so on demand, where there has been no laches by the landlord in making the demand, he does not merely by reason of his occupancy become a tenant by sufferance, nor does he become a tenant at will, where the landlord has not in any way recognized his right to continue in possession as a tenant.

(a) In a proceeding by a landlord to evict a tenant as one holding over, where the defendant resists the eviction by making a counter affidavit, denying the relation of landlord and tenant, and the uncontradicted evidence shows that the tenant entered under a contract for a specified time, and at once after the expiration of the term continued in possession over the objection of the landlord, and there was no evidence tending to show that the tenancy was one by sufferance or one at will, there was no error in directing a verdict in favor of the plaintiff under the statute for an amount equal to double the stipulated rent for the time the defendant continued in possession beyond the term.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 410, 429; Dec. Dig. §§ 118, 119, 309.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1103*)—DISMISSAL OF CROSS-BILL—AFFIRMANCE ON MAIN BILL.

The judgment on the main bill of exceptions being affirmed, the cross-bill of exceptions is dismissed.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Proceedings by E. B. Farris, as agent of the J. L. Winter estate, to evict Mrs. S. J. Purtell from leased premises. From the judgment, both parties bring error. Affirmed on direct bill of exceptions, and the cross-bill of exceptions dismissed.

J. F. Golightly and J. B. Suttles, for plaintiff in error. Mayson & Johnson, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. On the 1st of September, 1908, E. B. Farris made affidavit that he was agent "of J. L. Winter estate," and that Mrs. Sarah Purtell as tenant of his principal was in possession of a described house and lot, holding the same over beyond the term for which it was rented, and that the owner, desiring possession, had demanded it and the demand had been refused by the tenant. The purpose of the affidavit was to obtain a warrant under the Civil Code, § 5385 et seq., for the removal of the tenant. A warrant was issued by the justice of the peace, and notice was served upon Mrs. Purtell personally to vacate within three days. On the 4th of September Mrs. Purtell made a counter affidavit, reciting the former affidavit, and declaring that "she does not hold the premises from said E. D. Farris, agent for said Winter, either by lease or rent, at will or sufferance, or otherwise from the person who made the affidavit on which the warrant issued, or from any one under whom he claims the premises, or from any one claiming the premises under him. She further swears that her daughter, Arian Purtell, is tenant of said premises, and the term for which her daughter Arian Purtell rented said premises has not expired." Contemporaneously with the execution of such affidavit, Mrs. Purtell, as principal, with a named security, executed a bond whereby they acknowledged themselves jointly and severally bound to J. L. Winter estate, subject to the following conditions: "Whereas said J. D. Farris, agent as aforesaid, has made affidavit * * * to evict said S. J. Purtell from certain real estate in said county, to wit, the house and lot known as 368 Peachtree street, city of Atlanta, and said S. J. Purtell has filed her counter affidavit in terms of the law: Now should the said S. J. Purtell pay the said J. L. Winter estate such sum with cost as may be recovered against her on the trial of the case, then this bond to be void, otherwise of force." The respective affidavits and bond above mentioned were returned to the superior court, and the issue thus made was tried. Evidence was introduced in behalf of both parties. Upon direction of the judge the jury returned a verdict finding "for plaintiff on within warrant against defendant Mrs. S. J. Purtell, and that Mrs. Purtell held over for the period of two months after expiration of the term of lease, and that plaintiff recover of Mrs. S. J. Purtell the sum of $340 and costs of suit." Mrs. Purtell by direct bill of exceptions assigned error upon this judgment and certain antecedent rulings of the judge made at the trial. The plaintiff filed a cross-bill of exceptions in which the assignments of error related solely to rulings of the court excluding evidence offered by the plaintiff.

[1] 1. One assignment of error complained of the refusal of the judge to dismiss the dispossessory warrant on the ground that the "Winter estate" was not any person authorized to sue out a dispossessory warrant, and that the warrant was void for uncertainty and for proper parties. In the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error there is no reference to this assignment of error, and under the repeated rulings of this court the assignment will be considered as abandoned.

[2] 2. The plaintiff introduced in evidence the contract under which Mrs. Purtell entered. It was executed in duplicate between "Saunders & Morris, Agents of Est. Mrs. L. S. Winter, of the first part, and Mrs. S. J. Purtell, of the other part," and was signed: "Saunders & Morris, Agents. [Seal.] Mrs. S. J. Purtell. [Seal.]" It described the premises, and set forth the terms of the lease as being "one year, four months, and twenty days, commencing on the tenth (10) day of April, 1907, and ended on the 31st day of August, 1908," and specified the rent to be $85 per month in advance. It was also provided that, on failure to pay rent promptly when due, Saunders & Morris, agents, should have the right at their option to declare the lease void, "cancel the same, and take possession of the premises." It was also stipulated that Mrs. Purtell should repair at her own expense any damage to water pipes caused by freezing or any neglect on her part, and to pay the water rent on said premises, and not to sublet the premises or any part thereof without the written consent of said "Saunders & Morris, Agents," and, further, that no "light housekeeping" should be done in the premises; also, that she should deliver the possession of the premises at the expiration of the lease in as good order and repair as when first received, natural wear and tear excepted. Saunders & Morris, agents, stipulated that, should the premises be destroyed or damaged by fire so as to be untenable, the lease should cease from the date of the fire, but reserved the privilege of "carding" the house for rent or sale at any time within 30 days from the expiration of the lease. Other evidence was introduced, to the effect that S. B. Turman & Co. became successors to Saunders & Morris as real estate agents for the Winter estate in renting this property, and on the 1st day of September, 1908, being the day following the date specified in the lease as the end of the term for which the property was rented, they caused Farris, one of their representatives, to demand of Mrs. Purtell possession of the property, which was refused, and he on the same date swore out the warrant to evict her as a tenant holding over. The owners of the property consisted of the six heirs of the deceased Mrs. Winter. They had authorized Saunders & Morris to execute the lease in question, but had never authorized them to change it or to lease the property to any one else. The owners themselves did not agree for Miss Purtell to be substituted as a tenant in lieu of her mother, nor authorize the real estate agents to do so for them. After possession had been demanded by Farris, as agent for the landlord, Mrs. Purtell and her daughter, who lived with her, continued to occupy the house until the end of October, making two months. After evidence to the above effect had been introduced, the defendant tendered in evidence the record of another dispossessory proceeding instituted March 20, 1908, by the heirs of Mrs. Winter against Mrs. Purtell, based on the ground that the tenant had failed to pay rent, the counter affidavit setting up certain expenses which Mrs. Purtell had incurred in order to keep the building in a tenable condition, and in which proceeding a verdict was rendered in favor of Mrs. Purtell.

On the date of the trial of the case at bar the defendant also offered the testimony of Miss Arian Purtell, her daughter, to the effect that, after the dispossessory warrant proceeding was instituted in March, the witness informed Saunders & Sparks (successors to Saunders & Morris) that her mother would not be humiliated in that way, and that they might take the house, but that, if she and her mother remained in the house, she should be the tenant, and not the mother; and that after having so stated to them that she and not her mother paid the rent to the agents, who received it and recognized her as "our new tenant." The court upon objection excluded all of the evidence so tendered by the defendant, and other evidence of similar import offered by the defendant, and error was assigned upon these rulings. The contract upon its face appears to be between Mrs. Purtell of the one part and Saunders & Morris of the other, rather than between Mrs. Purtell and the owners of the property; but such pleadings as were before the court seem to concede that it was a contract between Mrs. Purtell and owners of the property, and uncontradicted evidence was admitted, without objection, showing that it was made by authority of the owners of the property, and afterwards adopted by them. The fact that the owners of the property through their agents sought in March to evict Mrs. Purtell for nonpayment of rent would be no defense to the present suit to evict her as a tenant holding over after her term had expired, the tenant having remained in possession and resisted the eviction for nonpayment of rent by filing and sustaining her counter affidavit. It would be otherwise if the proceedings were one to evict because of nonpayment of the same rent. In that event, the judgment in the former proceeding would have been res adjudicata. But not so in this proceeding to evict as a tenant holding over and beyond the term for which the property was rented. Therefore the judge committed no error in excluding from evidence the record of the former proceeding; nor was it error to exclude the testimony of Miss Purtell as to the substitution of tenants in March and April next preceding October 31st, the time specified for the termination of the lease. It was not shown that she had authority from her mother to make the substitution; nor was it shown that the real estate agents had authority from the landlord to make the substitution. On the contrary, the evidence affirmatively showed that there was no such authority upon the part of the landlord.

[3] 3. Under the undisputed evidence, Mrs. Purtell and her daughter continued to occupy the house for two months after the term had expired and possession had been demanded. The stipulated rent was $85 per month. The defendant offered evidence tending to show that the value for rent was not more than $50 per month, contending that the tenancy, if it existed at all, was a tenancy at will or a tenancy by sufferance; and that, if double rent should be found against her under the statute, it should be based upon the value of the premises for rent, and not upon the amount stipulated in the contract. Civ. Code, § 5389. The judge excluded this evidence, and directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $340, being double the stipulated rent for two months. Error was assigned upon these rulings. As we have seen, the defendant entered possession lawfully under a contract for a specified time. By the terms of the contract the tenant stipulated to surrender possession at the end of the term. Had there been no such stipulation, it would have been the duty of the tenant to surrender possession when demanded at the end of the term. 2 Taylor's Landlord & Tenant (8th Ed.) § 524. Possession was demanded by the landlord as soon as could be under the terms of the contract. There was no demand for further rent or conduct upon the part of the landlord from which consent might be inferred that the tenant should continue longer in possession of the premises, and under no theory could it be said that the tenancy was a tenancy at will. There was no laches or negligence of any kind upon the part of the landlord in demanding possession, nor any circumstances from which an inference might be drawn that the landlord suffered the tenant to remain in possession. When a tenancy is one at will or one by sufferance, and how a tenancy by sufferance may be converted into a tenancy at will, is elaborately discussed in Harrell v. Willis, 118 Ga. 906, 45 S. E. 794. The tenancy in that case was held to be one by sufferance. The report of the case does not show the fact, but the original record discloses that the term of the tenant expired December 31, 1892, and nothing was done toward evicting him, but he was suffered to remain in possession unmolested until proceedings were instituted in 1902. Thus laches upon the part of the landlord entered into the case. Under the reasoning of that case, the tenancy now under consideration was not one by sufferance. Somewhat similar to this case is Moore v. Smith, 56 N. J. Law, 446, 29 Atl. 159, where there was a delay of three months in making demand after the term had expired. In Moore v. Morrow, 28 Cal. 551, it was said: "A tenant under a lease for a term does not become a tenant by sufferance upon the expiration of his lease, and is only made such by the laches of the landlord in not re-entering or in not giving him notice to quit." In Alpine Township School District v. Aloys Batche, 106 Mich. 330, 64 N. W. 196, 29 L. R. A. 576 (2), it was said: "A teacher lawfully in possession of the schoolhouse, who holds over without right, becomes a tenant at sufferance if the owner permits him to remain a sufficient length of time to imply an intentional acquiescence in the occupancy, although his previous holding was not that of a tenant; and a consent to the occupancy, either express or presumed from lapse of time, is not essential to create that relation." On the general subject, see 1 Underhill on Landlord & Tenant, §§ 162-164; Ives v. Williams, 50 Mich. 100, 15 N. W. 33; 1 Tiffany on Landlord & Tenant, §§ 15, 16; Jones on Landlord & Tenant, § 230. The character of tenancy being neither that of a tenant at will nor of a tenant by sufferance, there was no error in excluding evidence bearing upon the measure of damages applicable to cases of that character; and there being no issue as to the amount of stipulated rent, and the evidence being uncontradicted that the defendant remained in possession for two months immediately after the expiration of the term, and after demand for possession by the plaintiff, the judge did not err in directing the verdict.

[4] 4. None of the assignments of error are sufficient to cause the judgment to be reversed. As the judgment on the main bill of exceptions is affirmed, the cross-bill is dismissed.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

ALBANY & N. RY. CO. v. MERCHANTS' & FARMERS' BANK.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 180*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—BILL OF LADING—CONSTRUCTION.

A contract of carriage of certain cotton received by the A. & N. Ry. Co., at Warwick, Ga., a station on the defendant's line of railroad, "consigned to O/N [order notify] E. L. Harper, Savannah, Ga., via Cordele compress," was a through bill of lading, and bound the railroad to deliver the cotton at Savannah, Ga., the destination mentioned in the bill of lading, notwithstanding a stipulation in the bill of lading that "this company shall not be responsible as common carriers of said property beyond its line of road"; it not appearing that the shipper of the cotton had expressly assented to the stipulation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 180.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 94*) — CARRIAGE OF GOODS—ACTION FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT—VENUE.

The suit in this case was one ex contractu; and for a breach of the contract the plaintiff was entitled to sue for damages arising therefrom in the county where the contract was executed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 94.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 56*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—ACTION FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

As a general rule, no demand is necessary to the commencement of an action founded on a breach of contract. And where a so-called demand for cotton was made by the transferee of an "order notify" bill of lading of a railroad company (which thereby agreed to transport certain cotton from and to named points within the state), before it was indorsed by the one having the legal title thereto, such demand cannot be the basis for the ascertainment of the damages for a breach of the contract of carriage.

(a) And the direction of a verdict by the trial judge in favor of the plaintiff on the basis of a suit brought by the transferee to recover damages and interest from date of demand for failure to deliver cotton by virtue of the terms of the contract contained in the bill of lading before its indorsement is reversible error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 168; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

4. CUSTOMS AND USAGES (§ 17*)—APPLICATION AND OPERATION—EXPLANATION OF CONTRACT.

Parol testimony is not admissible on the trial of a case brought to recover damages growing out of an alleged breach of contract for failure to deliver cotton at the point of destination named in the bill of lading to prove a custom of stopping cotton short of the point of destination for purposes at variance with the plain, unambiguous terms of the contract of carriage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Customs and Usages, Cent. Dig. § 84; Dec. Dig. § 17.* Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1945-1952.]

5. CARRIERS (§ 94*) — CARRIAGE OF GOODS—BREACH OF CONTRACT—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Where a common carrier fails to deliver goods according to the terms of the contract, the measure of damages is the value of the goods at the time and place at which it is agreed to deliver them, less the transportation charges.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 94.*]

Error from Superior Court, Worth County; Frank Park, Judge.

Action by the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank against the Albany & Northern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The Merchants' & Farmers' Bank, a banking corporation organized under the laws of Georgia and doing business at Cordele, Ga., filed its petition in Worth superior court against the Albany & Northern Railway Company, a railroad corporation operating a line of railroad through the town of Warwick in the county of Worth, and being a common carrier, and alleged the following facts: That the contracts herein set forth were made in Worth county; that the Albany & Northern Railway Company (hereinafter called the defendant) damaged the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank (hereinafter called the plaintiff) in the sum of $5,000 by reason of breaches of contract as hereinafter set out; that on or about the 8th day of September, 1904, the defendant contracted with one John F. Wise, in the county of Worth, for the consideration of 41½ cents per 100 pounds, which the said Wise contracted to pay, that the defendant would carry or cause to be carried from the town of Warwick to the city of Savannah, in the state of Georgia, three bales of cotton, and would deliver the same or cause the same to be delivered in the city of Savannah to the said Wise, or to any person to whom the said Wise should transfer, indorse, assign, or deliver the bill of lading or receipt issued him by the defendant for said cotton only upon the production and surrender of said receipt or bill of lading. It was further alleged that the defendant for the same consideration per 100 pounds above expressed agreed to carry 40 other bales of cotton from Warwick to the city of Savannah and deliver said cotton to said Wise or to any person to whom said Wise should transfer, assign, indorse, or deliver the receipt or bill of lading as above set forth with reference to the three bales of cotton; that said Wise delivered the 43 bales of cotton to the defendant at the town of Warwick, a station upon defendant's line of railroad, and defendant received and accepted the cotton to be carried and delivered in accordance with its contracts; that defendant issued to said Wise receipts and bills of lading for the cotton; that afterwards the receipts and bills of lading were transferred and assigned to the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank, the plaintiff in this case, in pledge, as security, for the sum of $5,000, which the plaintiff advanced to one E. L. Harper, to whom the said Wise had agreed to sell the cotton for cash upon delivery of the cotton; that this sum was advanced by the plaintiff upon agreement between the plaintiff and Harper that the right and title to the cotton should be held by the plaintiff as security for said sum; that no part of the sum advanced, or the interest thereon, has been paid to the plaintiff; that the defendant had violated its contract by failing to carry and deliver the cotton as provided by the contract, although the plaintiff had tendered the bills of lading properly indorsed, and said cotton has been entirely lost to the plaintiff; that the value of the cotton at the time it was so lost was more than the amount of the sum advanced by the plaintiff, to wit, $5,000. The bills of lading were the same, except that one was for three and the other for forty bales of cotton. A copy of only one, therefore, follows: "Bill of Lading for Forty Bales. Albany & Northern Railway, Warwick, Georgia, Station 9/8, 1904. Received from John F. Wise the following property in apparent good order (or condition noted), contents and value unknown, to be transported over the road and delivered in like manner to consignees or the next company or carriers (if the same is going beyond its line of road) for them to deliver to the place of destination of said property, it being distinctly understood that this company shall not be responsible as common carriers of said property beyond its line of road or while at any of its stations awaiting delivery to such carriers—the company being liable as warehousemen only. Subject to all the conditions embraced in the company's bill of lading, for which receipt should be exchanged. Consigned to O/N E. L. Harper, Savannah, Ga. Via Car Cordele, Compress. Charges advanced, $——. Marks and numbers, D-91 to 100 inc. E-1 to 30 inc. Articles 40 B/C. Weights subject to correction 21454. J. R. Davis for the Company." This bill of lading was indorsed by E. L. Harper on September, 1904, and by John F. Wise on September 6, 1906. The defendant by its answer admitted that it received the cotton sued for and issued its bills of lading therefor upon the terms and conditions set out in the contract. It averred that it had fully kept and carried out every obligation assumed by it in connection with said cotton. All the other material allegations of the petition were denied. Under the evidence submitted to the jury, the presiding judge directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, upon which judgment was duly entered against the defendant. The Albany & Northern Railway Company filed its motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

F. A. Hooper, J. H. Tipton, and Pope & Bennet, for plaintiff in error. Jno. R. L. Smith, J. T. Hill, and T. R. Perry, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The decision of this case centers in the determination of the following questions made by the record: (1) Were the bills of lading in this case through bills of lading? (a) Is this a suit ex contractu; and, if so, has the court of the county where the contract was made jurisdiction to try the suit filed for the alleged breach of the contract? (b) Was the demand at Cordele such as that a failure to produce the cotton at that point at the time of the first demand constituted a breach of the contract and a basis for recovery of damages for the breach of the contract, with interest from that date? (c) Was Cordele or Savannah the proper place to make the demand, and delivery of the cotton? (d) Can the contract of carriage be varied by parol testimony to prove a custom to stop cotton at Cordele (which was billed to Savannah) for the purposes of compression, sale, etc.? (e) What is the measure of damages for breach of a contract consisting of failure to deliver cotton at point of destination?

The allegations in the plaintiff's petition were, and the evidence showed, that one John F. Wise tendered 43 bales of cotton at Warwick, in Worth county, to defendant's line of railroad to be transported to Savannah, Ga., consigned to "order notify" E. L. Harper, "via Cordele Compress," and that the cotton was received by the defendant and a receipt or bill of lading given therefor, which bill of lading is set out in the facts above recited. By the terms of the bill of lading or contract, the cotton was "to be transported over the road and delivered in like manner to consignees or the next company or carriers (if the same is going beyond its line of road) for them to deliver to the place of destination of said property, it being distinctly understood that this company shall not be responsible as common carriers of said property beyond its line of road or while at any of its stations awaiting delivery to such carriers—the company being liable as warehousemen only. Subject to all the conditions embraced in the company's bill of lading for which receipt should be exchanged. Consigned to O/N E. L. Harper, Savannah, Ga. Via Cordele Compress," etc. We hold that the above contract of carriage was a through bill of lading, by which the carrier was bound to deliver the cotton at Savannah, the point of destination named, notwithstanding the stipulation in the bill of lading itself that the carrier would not be responsible beyond its own line of railroad. Civ. Code 1910, § 2728. This court has held in the case of Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Henderson, 131 Ga. 75, 81, 61 S. E. 1111, and in numerous other cases, that a carrier might by contract limit its liability to its own line of road, but it could not do so by a mere stipulation in the bill of lading, unless the latter was expressly assented to by the shipper. See, also, Central R. Co. v. Hasselkus, 91 Ga. 382, 390, 17 S. E. 838, 44 Am. St. Rep. 37. As no such express contract appears in this case between the plaintiff and the defendant, but, instead, a mere stipulation in the bill of lading that the defendant will not be responsible beyond its own line, the defendant would be liable in damages if it be shown that it has failed to deliver the cotton at the point of destination in good order.

[2] 2. This is a suit ex contractu growing out of the above contract or through bill of lading and the alleged breach thereof. The contract was executed at Warwick, in Worth county, and the plaintiff brought suit in Worth superior court. It is insisted before this court that the superior court of Worth county did not have jurisdiction to try the case. The court of the county where such a contract as the above was executed has jurisdiction, and the plaintiff had the option of waiving the tort and suing ex contractu. Friedman v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 124 Ga. 472, 52 S. E. 763; Bates v. Bigby, 123 Ga. 728, 729, 51 S. E. 717; Central R. Co. v. Brunson, 63 Ga. 504; Civ. Code 1910, § 2798.

[3] 3. The demands for the cotton were made at Cordele; the first in October, 1904, the latter on September 18, 1907. At the time of the first demand the bill of lading for the 40 bales of cotton was not indorsed by Mr. Wise, the consignor. Plaintiff's first demand, therefore, was not good as to the 40 bales of cotton until the bill of lading had been properly indorsed so as to put the legal title in the plaintiff. In order to entitle the plaintiff to sue, it must have had the bill of lading properly indorsed, so as to give it the legal title thereto, and the consequent right to sue as the indorsee or assignee of the bill of lading for any breach of the contract. It follows, therefore, that the verdict directed for the plaintiff on the basis of the first demand for the cotton at Cordele in October, 1904, before the bill of lading was properly indorsed, was reversible error. The plaintiff had no right at that time to make demand, much less to sue in its own right, for the 40 bales of cotton. Haas v. Kansas City, etc., R. Co., 81 Ga. 792, 7 S. E. 629. The contract specified that the cotton should be delivered at Savannah, and we hold that it should have been delivered there. There are authorities to the effect that under certain circumstances, where a refusal by one party to a contract to comply with it on demand of the other party is based on a specified ground, after suit upon the contract, he will not be allowed to "amend his hold" and set up other grounds why he might have refused, thus taking advantage of the other contracting party, who might have removed such grounds at the time had they been made. But this is different from the case of a person who has no title to a chose in action at the time he makes a demand, but subsequently acquires it. If he was not authorized to sue for a breach of the contract at all at the time of the demand, but subsequently became the transferee of it, his right to sue, thus acquired, would not date back so as to authorize him to recover as of the date of the demand so made, with interest therefrom. It is to be noted that this is not a suit by the bank in trover, or in tort as pledgee, but is an action based on the contract; and that, whatever may have been its rights with respect to the cotton as security for the draft held by it, it was not the transferee of the bill of lading, and therefore was not entitled to sue for a breach of it until such transfer or indorsement of it was made.

It is also insisted that the failure of the defendant railroad company's agent at Cordele to deliver the cotton on demand was not based on the failure of the plaintiff to deliver the bill of lading properly indorsed or assigned, but solely on the ground that he did not have the cotton. Whatever the ground upon which the first refusal to deliver the cotton was based, the agent was certainly within his rights and those of the carrier in refusing to deliver the cotton to the plaintiff as the transferee until the bills of lading were properly indorsed. He may have given the wrong reason, but the right conclusion, so far as the 40 bales are concerned. This applies, of course, to the refusal of the first demand for the 40 bales of cotton, upon which the directed verdict was predicated.

In discussing the question of demand for the cotton in this case, it is not to be understood that we hold that a demand is necessary in cases of breach of contract and suit for damages therefor. The general rule is that no demand is necessary to the commencement of an action for a breach of contract, and the exception in such cases is where the law or the contract so prescribes. Civ. Code 1910, § 5512. We have been dealing here with the question of demand solely in connection with the direction of the verdict by the court on the basis of the first demand for the cotton at Cordele, when the bill of lading had not been properly indorsed, and with the measure of damages in connection therewith.

[4] 4. The custom of the trade insisted upon refers to the custom "at destination." Civ. Code 1910, § 2730; Ga. & Ala. Ry. Co. v. Pound, 111 Ga. 6, 36 S. E. 312. And this is so notwithstanding a custom to stop cotton billed to Savannah at Cordele for compression, etc. Parol evidence of usage and custom to vary the terms of a plain, unambiguous written contract is not admissible. If the bill of lading constituted a through contract of carriage, its efficiency could not be destroyed by parol testimony, or by a custom in conflict with the contract. Civ. Code 1910, § 5788; Park v. Piedmont, etc., Ins. Co., 48 Ga. 601; Merchants' Bank v. Demere, 92 Ga. 735, 740, 19 S. E. 38; W. & A. R. Co. v. Ohio, etc., Co., 107 Ga. 512, 33 S. E. 821.

[5] 5. What is the measure of damages in this case? In directing the verdict for the plaintiff, the court made the demand at Cordele and the delivery of the cotton there on that date (October, 1904) the basis of the verdict directed. We do not think that the value of the cotton at Cordele on the date of the first demand at that place was the correct measure of damages in this case. As the bill of lading specified that the cotton should be delivered at Savannah, we think the measure of damages which the plaintiff is entitled to recover, if at all, is the value of the cotton at the time and place of delivery, less the freight, if it has not been paid. The general rule as to the measure of damages is that, if a common carrier fails to deliver goods according to contract, it is liable for the value of the goods at the time and place at which it engaged to deliver them. Cooper v. Young, 22 Ga. 271, 68 Am. Dec. 502, and citations; Taylor v. Collier, 26 Ga. 122, 126; Rome R. Co. v. Sloan, 39 Ga. 641; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Howard Supply Co., 125 Ga. 478, 482, 54 S. E. 530. Cordele was neither the initial shipping point nor the terminus specified in the bill of lading at which the delivery of the cotton was to be made. In the case of Rome R. Co. v. Sloan, supra, there was proof of the value of the cotton at Rome, the initial point, and the trial judge in that case had charged the jury that "the measure of damages is the value of the cotton at the time and place of its destination, or at any place from the point of shipment to the place of delivery, plus interest." This court in reviewing the above as an assignment of error held that this charge was inaccurate, but harmless error under the facts in that case, and the finding of the jury was allowed to stand. Without entering into a discussion of the basis on which the above ruling was made, it is perhaps sufficient to say that in the present case the verdict was directed by the presiding judge on the basis of the value of the cotton at Cordele, which was an intermediate point of shipment. No error appears in any of the other grounds of the motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

THOMPSON v. HILL

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 9, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DEEDS (§ 111*)—VALIDITY—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY.

If the land intended to be granted appears clearly and satisfactorily from any part of the description in a deed, and other circumstances of description are mentioned which are not applicable to that land, the grant will not be defeated, but those circumstances will be rejected as false or mistaken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 309-335; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

2. COVENANTS (§ 47*)—PERFORMANCE OR BREACH—WARRANTY.

A deed to a parcel of land in a town described the land conveyed clearly by fixing its corner with reference to the distance from the intersection of the two streets, bounding the land on two sides by parallel streets, stating the distance between them and the number of feet which the land fronted on them. There was not in that immediate connection any mention of lot numbers. The deed then, in another paragraph, described other land conveyed, in connection with which and seemingly as a part of the description of which was added: "And being lots 66 and 75 of the J. B. Thompson property, as per plat No. 2, exhibited at auction sale thereof by Samuel W. Goode & Co., June 23, 1887." The land first described covered lots numbered 65, 66, 75, and 76. From the map contained in the record it did not appear what were the numbers of the second described parcel. The land was conveyed by one who inherited under the grantee to a purchaser, who took possession. A month after making the first deed, the original grantor made a warranty deed to another, describing the land so as to convey one-half of that covered by the first description in the other deed, "being lots Nos. 66 and 75" as per the Goode & Co. plat. There was no effort to reform the first deed. The second grantee brought suit against the holder under the first deed to recover the land described in the second deed, but failed to recover. He then sued the grantor on his warranty. Held, that he was entitled to recover.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§§ 433, 460*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITINGS—IDENTITY OF PROPERTY CONVEYED.

Parol evidence is admissible to adjust the description in a deed to the land conveyed; but if a deed conveys certain land, in the absence of any effort to have it reformed, its effect cannot be controlled by parol evidence that there was a mistake in the description, whereby more land was included than was intended.

4. BOUNDARIES (§ 5*)—"MONUMENT."

Monuments are permanent landmarks established for the purpose of indicating boundaries.

5. WORDS AND PHRASES—"PLAT."

A plat is a representation of land on paper, appealing to the eye by means of lines and memoranda rather than by words.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by R. A. Hill against J. B. Thompson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson, for plaintiff in error. Gober & Griffin and Bell & Ellis, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. R. A. Hill sued J. B. Thompson for breach of warranty. It appeared that the defendant had a tract of land surveyed into lots, and had a sale thereof. On June 23, 1887, he executed to Y. H. Thompson a deed, which was recorded on September 1, 1887. The recited consideration was $171. The description of the land conveyed was as follows: "All that tract or parcel of land situated, lying and being in the town of Austell, Georgia, and being part of land lot 140 in the eighteenth district of Cobb county, Georgia, commencing at a point on Hotel street two hundred and eight (208) feet from the southeast corner of Hotel and Central streets; thence east two hundred and twenty-three (223) feet to Pine street; thence south along Pine street one hundred and four (104) feet; thence west two hundred and twenty-three (223) feet to Hotel street; thence along said street one hundred and four (104) feet to the beginning. Also beginning at a point forty-nine (49) feet from the southwest corner of Thompson avenue and Central streets; thence west two hundred and twenty-nine and one-half (229½) feet to a twenty foot alley; thence south along said twenty foot alley ninety-eight (98) feet; thence east two hundred and twenty-eight (228) feet to Thompson avenue; being lots numbered 65, 76, 124 and 125 of the J. B. Thompson property, as per plat No. 2 exhibited at auction sale of same by Sam W. Goode & Company on June 23, 1887." On July 22d the same grantor executed to the present plaintiff a deed, which was recorded on October 9th. It recited a consideration of $70, and described the land conveyed as follows: "All that tract or parcel of land lying and being in the town of Austell, Georgia, and being part of land lot 140 in the eighteenth district of Cobb county, Georgia, and more particularly described as follows: to wit: Commencing at a point on Hotel street two hundred and sixty (260) feet from the southeast corner of Hotel and Central streets; thence east two hundred and twenty-three (223) feet to Pine street; thence south along Pine street fifty-two (52) feet; thence west two hundred and twenty-three (223) feet to Hotel street; thence north along said Hotel street fifty-two (52) feet to the point of beginning; and being lots Nos. 66 and 75 of the J. B. Thompson property, as per plat No. 2 exhibited at auction sale thereof by Samuel W. Goode & Co., June 23rd, 1887."

Y. H. Thompson died, and one who inherited the property conveyed the land described in the first deed set out above to one Tom Jones. The latter took possession. Hill, the grantee in the second deed, brought suit in 1903 to recover the land described in his deed. A verdict and judgment went against him in 1905. In 1908 he brought suit against his grantor, alleging a breach of warranty. On the trial the court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant excepted.

[1] 1. It was an ancient maxim that the first deed and the last will prevails. Shep. Touch. 88. This principle was applied to inconsistent clauses in the same instrument; so that the former of such clauses prevailed in case of a deed, the latter in case of a will. The trend of modern authorities is toward restricting the operation of this rule, so as to give effect to every part of a deed if possible; and, if this cannot be done, and there is an obvious intent derivable from the face of the instrument, the tendency is to reject only superadded parts which are repugnant thereto, if it can be done without violating some rule of law. In this state the rule as to repugnant clauses has been codified in section 4187 of the Code of 1910 thus: "If two clauses in a deed be utterly inconsistent, the former must prevail; but the intention of the parties, from the whole instrument, should, if possible, be ascertained and carried into effect." Out of this disposition to give effect to an instrument, where practicable, doubtless arose the maxim, "Falsa demonstratio non nocet cum de corpore constat" (mere false description does not vitiate, if there be sufficient certainty as to the object). Characteristic cases within the rule, as strictly applied, were those where the description, so far as it was false, applied to no subject, and, so far as it was true, applied only to one subject. But in pursuance of the current of modern authority above mentioned it has become settled law that if the thing intended to be granted ap-appears clearly and satisfactorily from any part of the description, and other circumstances of description are mentioned which are not applicable to that thing, the grant will not be defeated, but those circumstances will be rejected as false or mistaken, although it would be possible to apply them to a subject-matter so as to enlarge or diminish the grant. In seeking to determine whether a deed shows on its face what was the thing so intended to be granted, and whether there are other circumstances of description which may be rejected as false or mistaken, certain general rules have been evolved, under which ordinarily certain matters of description will outweigh or prevail over others. A few of these may be mentioned. What is most material and most certain in a description shall prevail over that which is less material and less certain. Thus courses and distances yield to natural, visible, and ascertained objects. Accordingly, when in the description of land in a deed known monuments are referred to as boundaries, they must usually govern, although neither courses nor distances nor the computed contents correspond therewith. Natural monuments have greater weight than artificial ones. Where all other means of ascertaining the true construction of a deed fail, and a doubt still remains, that construction is rather to be preferred which is most favorable to the grantee. Tyler on Boundaries, 119, 120; Harris v. Hull, 70 Ga. 831. In the law of processioning, the Civil Code 1910, § 3820, declares that: "In all cases of disputed lines, * * * natural landmarks, being less liable to change, and not capable of counterfeit shall be the most conclusive evidence; ancient or genuine landmarks, such as corner station or marked trees, shall control the course and distances called for by the survey." This accords with the method of construing deeds above mentioned. The rule in regard to monuments is not a mere arbitrary dictum, but is founded on reason and experience. As grants and conveyances are usually made with reference to an actual view of the premises, this is treated as presumptively the case. Monuments are considered stable and certain. They are visible things, existing on the ground, indicating the extent of the land and the direction of its boundaries. Those who examine the ground can see the monuments indicating the direction of its lines and the extent of its contents. Courses and distances laid down in the deed or plat, or in field notes, are merely descriptive of the land as it is. Hence, if the deed describes the land by monuments, this will control calls for courses and distances descriptive of the same property. As natural monuments are likely to be more permanent and notorious in character than artificial monuments erected by an owner, recourse is had to the former rather than to the latter in case of conflict.

[4] As an illustration of the application of these rules, where there was a grant of an island by name in the Potomac river, and there were superadded the courses and distances of the lines, which were found to exclude part of the island, the whole island passed. It was deemed the substantial purpose to grant the island, and that the description of it was superadded. Lodge's Lessee v. Lee, 6 Cranch, 237, 3 L. Ed. 210. Where there was a lease of a farm on which J. B. now resides, "to contain eighty acres in one piece," and the farm actually contained more than eighty acres, the lease was held to cover the whole. Jackson v. Barringer, 15 Johns. (N. Y.) 471. Where a tract of land was first described as "being the same premises conveyed" to the grantor by a certain deed, and then there was an effort to give the metes and bounds, but they omitted a part of the premises first declared to be conveyed by the deed, it was held that the whole tract passed. Foss v. Crisp, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 121. On the other hand, where land had been laid off by a government survey into land lots, and a deed conveyed several of the land lots by number except 50 acres in the southeast corner of one of them), and added "known as the Wooldridge plantation," those words were treated as matter of further description, and not as limiting the land granted, though the lots named covered more than the "Wooldridge plantation." Osteen v. Wynn, 131 Ga. 209, 62 S. E. 37, 127 Am. St. Rep. 212. Where a deed conveys a lot of land expressly with reference to a plat, the courses, distances, and monuments appearing on the plat are to be considered in ascertaining the description of the land and the intent of the parties as if they had been expressly enumerated in the deed. Schreck v. Blum, 131 Ga. 489, 62 S. E. 705; Aiken v. Wallace, 134 Ga. 873, 876, 68 S. E. 937. Where a lot is conveyed according to its number in a certain plan or plat, so that it is evident that the important thing under consideration in the grant is the particular lot, and there is superadded to this a description which does not include the entire lot, it has been held that the erroneous description will yield to the conveyance by number; and it has also been said that this would be true whether the number immediately preceded the description or vice versa, if it were evident from the deed that the lot known by number was the important or certain thing in the conveyance. In Rutherford v. Tracy, 48 Mo. 325, 8 Am. Rep. 104, the language conveying the premises was as follows: "Lot No. 3, in block 87, in the old town of Hudson, now Macon; beginning at the northeast corner, thence west to the alley, thence south eighteen feet, thence east the length of the lot, thence north eighteen feet to the beginning." This description embraced a less area than lot 3. It was held that the entire lot passed. The statement that the designation of the number of the lot had the same effect as that of a fixed monument evidently meant that the deed showed that the main purpose was to convey the whole lot, and that an erroneous description, including less than the whole, would yield to the designation of the lot as a whole. It was, moreover, added that this would not be the case, if the deed showed a contrary intent. Strictly speaking, monuments are permanent landmarks established for the purpose of indicating boundaries. Bouvier's Law Dict. "Monuments." A plat is not a mark on the land, but a representation of the land on paper; appealing to the eye by means of lines and memoranda, rather than by words alone. The same remark may be made of some other cases in which is used similar language to that employed in the case last cited, or where there is a bald statement that lot numbers will prevail over a description by metes and bounds, as if it were an arbitrary and inflexible rule.

In a note to Heaton v. Hodges, 30 Am. Dec. 781, 740, that excellent annotator, Mr. A. C. Freeman, says: "There is no magic in a monument which will give it invariable control in such cases. It controls only because it is regarded as more certain than a given course or distance. If it should in a given case be less certain, the rule would fall with the reason for it, and the monument would yield to the course and distance, and an artificial monument will yield more readily than a natural one." In White v. Luning, 93 U. S. 514, 23 L. Ed. 938, it was held that "the rule that monuments, natural or artificial, rather than courses and distances, control in the construction of a conveyance of real estate, will not be enforced, when the instrument would be thereby defeated, and when the rejection of a call for a monument would reconcile other parts of the description and leave enough to identify the land." In Higinbotham v. Stoddard, 72 N. Y. 98, a conveyance described a lot in a village as "on the southerly side of Madison street, * * * being ten feet on Madison street, thirty-two feet in rear on the northerly side of the millrace, and one hundred feet in depth from front to rear, containing twenty-one hundred square feet of ground." The distances included just 2,100 square feet. The northerly side of the millrace was more than 100 feet from Madison street. The land in question was the strip between the millrace and a line 100 feet from Madison street. It was held that it was not included in the deed. In the opinion it was said that the rule as to mentioning a visible object as a boundary and thus controlling the description by courses and distances is not inflexible, and has some exceptions; that the accuracy of the measurement, and the shortness of the lines, and the exact specification of contents by square feet in a lot in a village, indicated on the face of the deed that this was a more prominent object in the conveyance than the mention of the millrace. In Davis v. Rainsford, 17 Mass. 207, it was declared that "the general rule that known monuments referred to in the description of land in a conveyance are to govern in the construction, rather than the courses, distances, or computed contents mentioned in such description, is subject to exceptions, as where an adherence to the rule would be plainly absurd." In that case the conveyance under consideration described a small strip of land as "containing between 19 and 20 square feet or thereabout, lying between my estate in Marlborough street, the estate of Davis & Brown at the corner of Marlborough and Milk streets, and the estate of said Davis, Brown, & Williams, and bounded as follows, viz., northwestwardly on the line of the estate of Davis & Brown, beginning at the southeastwardly corner of their store, and running on the wall of the store northeastwardly one foot and three inches; thence running southeastwardly on the line of the estate of Davis, Brown & Williams, where they are now building a store, six feet, ten inches; thence running southwestwardly, on the line last mentioned, four feet, four inches; thence northwardly and westwardly seven feet, eight inches, to the corner of Davis & Brown's store, the place of beginning. It is understood that the wall of the store, which said Davis, Brown & Williams, are now building on their lot herein mentioned is to be placed exactly on the line last described," etc. There was also a sketch on the back of the deed representing the land. Testimony was offered to show that the line of Davis, Brown & Williams was a well-known line fixed by monuments; that it was three feet and six inches northeastwardly from the point of beginning, instead of one foot and three inches; and that, therefore, the deed conveyed this larger strip. In the opinion the general rule was recognized, but it was stated that the reason for it was that references to monuments are less liable to mistakes than courses and distances; but that it was not an inflexible rule, without exceptions, and that, under the particular facts of that case, including the nature of the strip conveyed, the exactness of measurement, and the provision that the store to be erected should be placed exactly on the line last described, the deed itself evinced a greater probability that the boundary mentioned was a mistaken one than that there was an intent to convey a strip so much larger than that described by measurements. This decision has sometimes been referred to as exceptional, and has not escaped some criticism. But it may be cited to show that certain calls for boundaries or even monuments have not always been treated as arbitrary and absolute, where the other terms of the deed showed that they should not prevail. Parks v. Loomis, 6 Gray (Mass.) 467 (where it was said that "a false demonstration, though a reference to a natural monument, may be rejected in construing a deed"); Bond v. Fay, 12 Allen (Mass.) 86; Lovejoy v. Lovett, 124 Mass. 270; Gano v. Aldridge, 27 Ind. 294; Ely's Adm'r v. U. S., 171 U. S. 220, 18 Sup. Ct. 840, 43 L. Ed. 142.

If the rule as to monuments is not arbitrary and without exception, but will yield in a given case, where it appears from the deed to be less certain than other descriptions, a reference to a number on a plat is not sacrosanct, regardless of everything else in the deed. While it is often, indeed generally, of controlling force, where it indicates the main intent as to the land to be granted, the rule that it will control is not inflexible. In Summerlin v. Hesterly, 20 Ga. 689, 65 Am. Dec. 639, an entry of levy by a sheriff on several lots of land described one of them as being "fractional lot, whereon John Smith now lives, No. 81, in the 4th District of originally Coweta, now Heard county." In an action of ejectment one of the parties claimed under the sheriff's sale. It was shown by parol that the fractional lot on which John Smith lived at the time of the sheriff's entry was the lot in suit; and that although the number of it was not that stated in the entry of levy, but was 189, there was no such lot as that stated in the levy which was a fractional lot; or that, if such lot was a fractional lot, it was not occupied by John Smith. The reference in the entry of levy and the sheriff's deed to the number of the lot was rejected as inaccurate, leaving the remaining description to stand. In Johnson v. McKay, 119 Ga. 196, 45 S. E. 992, 100 Am. St. Rep. 186, a mortgage described the land covered by it as in a named county, containing 15 acres, "known as the Zachariah Emerson place, part of lots number one hundred and twenty-five (125) in the eleventh (11) district, one part No. not known." It appeared that no part of the Emerson place was embraced in lot No. 125. It was held that the general description of the property as the Emerson place was sufficient, and the reference to lot No. 125 was treated as surplusage, under the maxim, "falsa demonstratio non nocet."

[2] 2. The difficulty of decision in this case arises not so much in declaring the principles of law as in applying them to the facts. An examination of the deed under consideration shows that it first contains a clear, definite and exact description of the land, beginning at a point on a named street 208 feet from the southeast corner of that and another named street. It has as its eastern and western boundaries two streets, and its frontage on each of them is specified as 104 feet, and its depth between the streets as 223 feet. No mention of lot numbers is made in connection with such description, either immediately preceding or immediately following it. Next follows a distinct paragraph, describing other land having frontage on another street of 98 feet and a depth of 228 feet. In closing this latter description, and apparently as a part of it, occur the words "being lots numbered 65, 76, 124 and 125 of the J. B. Thompson property, as per plat No. 2 exhibited at auction sale of same by Sam W. Goode & Company on June 23, 1887." While punctuation is not of great force in determining the meaning of a conveyance, it is worthy of note that in the description of the second piece of land conveyed the different calls are separated by semicolons, and after the description of the last line, and separated from it only by another semicolon, occur the words above quoted.

[5] The plat was introduced in evidence, and there is brought to this court what is stated to be so much of it as relates to the lots in controversy. It shows a block divided by a line running north and south through the center and by lines running east and west with surrounding streets on three sides and an alley on the fourth. Each lot so represented has entered on its front line the figures "52." A number also appears entered in the middle portion of the lot. Treating the figures "52" as representing the street frontage in feet, and counting from the corner of the block, the first description of the land in the deed above mentioned would include lots 65, 66, 75, and 76. The plat in the record does not show the location or numbering of the second tract described. This is not an effort to reform the deed, nor is it a controversy between the first grantor and the grantee. The second grantee brought suit against the first to recover the two lots mentioned in his deed, but a judgment was rendered against him. This was not conclusive upon the grantor, as he does not appear to have been vouched. The second grantee, having lost the lots conveyed to him, now sues the common grantor for breach of warranty. Upon the facts of the case we think he should recover. The description in the first deed of the land granted is clear, definite, and exact. It shows a reference to measurements on the land itself by reference to the street corner, the beginning point of the lot conveyed, the side streets, and the frontage on each. It is followed by a description of other land, as a part of which there is a reference to a plat. But we do not think that this is sufficient to cut in half the description of the first lot conveyed. In most of the cases where the reference to lots by number or by name prevailed, the effort was to decrease the amount included in the lot granted by reason of an added description by courses and distances. If resort is had to the rule of construction favorable to the grantee, or to that relative to utterly inconsistent clauses, it leads to the same conclusion.

[3] 3. The grantor testified, in effect, that the first deed was a mistake, if it included lots 66 and 75. But we do not think that in a proceeding like the present one such evidence can prevail over the deed itself. Parol evidence is competent to adjust the description in a deed to the land conveyed. If there are references to monuments or boundaries, it can be shown where they are located. If a place is described by name, it can be proved what land was known by that name. It can be shown that certain calls in a deed do not touch or apply to the lots sought to be conveyed. Sometimes occupation or the practical construction given to a deed by the subsequent acts of the parties thereto may be admissible. But it has been held that parol evidence is not admissible to control the legal effect of a deed, nor to show that a description which the law will disregard ought to prevail. Benedict v. Gaylord, 11 Conn. 332, 30 Am. Dec. 299; Roberti v. Atwater, 42 Conn. 269; Bond v. Fay, 12 Allen (Mass.) 86.

GEORGIA R. & BANKING CO. v. RIVES.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 303*)—INFIRM PASSENGERS—DUTY OF EMPLOYEES.

While generally it is no part of the duty of the employees of a railway company in charge of a passenger train to physically assist passengers to alight therefrom, the duty of rendering assistance may arise from special circumstances, such as blindness of an unattended passenger, which is known to the conductor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1232; Dec. Dig. § 303.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 314*)—INJURIES TO BLIND PASSENGER—NEGLIGENCE—PLEADING.

A petition alleged, among other things, as follows: A conductor of a passenger train, with knowledge of the blindness of a passenger, promised to assist him in alighting from the train, but failed and refused to do so. When another passenger undertook to assist him, the conductor refused to let them alight at the usual place and in the usual way, but directed them to go through another car, which was used for baggage and express matter, and the mode of egress from which was more dangerous than that from the ordinary passenger car. The exit had to be made through a door in such car by going upon a platform which was wet and slippery on account of rain, and which was about on a level with the car door, between which and the platform was an open space. By reason of his blindness, the plaintiff did not know of the peril, and was given no warning of it. He stepped from the door in the usual way, and without negligence on his part, and was caused to fall partly upon the platform and partly into the open space, whereby he was injured. Held, that such petition was not subject to general demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 314.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 320*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—PROXIMATE CAUSE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Under such facts, if the fellow passenger failed to warn the plaintiff of the danger, it could not be declared as matter of law, on demurrer, that this was such an intervening cause as prevented the negligence of the conductor from being the proximate cause of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 320.*]

Error from Superior Court, Warren County; D. W. Meadow, Judge.

Action by George F. Rives against the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

George F. Rives brought suit against the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company, alleging, in brief, as follows: On or about June 16, 1909, he took passage on one of the defendant's passenger trains, for the purpose of going from Sharon to Crawfordville. In order to do this, it was necessary to change cars at Barnett, an intermediate station on the defendant's line. The plaintiff was totally blind and in bad health and helpless. His condition was known to the conductor, who helped him get aboard the defendant's train at his starting point. He told the conductor that he would have to be helped to get off the train at Barnett, which assistance the conductor agreed to render. He was accepted as a passenger and paid full fare. The train consisted of two cars. The one in front was divided into two compartments; that next to the engine containing seats for passengers, and the other being used as a baggage and express car. The second car was the regular passenger car, in which the plaintiff was riding. On reaching Barnett, the train was pulled up to the depot or station sufficiently far for the baggage car next to the engine to be alongside the platform, but not far enough for the passenger car to be beside it. The platform was about on a level with the door of the baggage car, with an open space about 12 or 14 inches wide between the platform and the car. In this position the train stopped. Contrary to his promise, and in violation of the defendant's legal duty to the plaintiff, the conductor and the defendant neglected and refused to render the plaintiff any assistance whatever in alighting from the train. After the plaintiff had waited as long as he thought he could, in order to get off the train and cross over to the other train, he was approached by a passenger who assisted him from his seat to the door of the car. The other passenger and the plaintiff were about to alight from the passenger car in the usual and ordinary manner, by descending the steps of the car. The conductor, who was standing close by, in the exercise of the defendant's right to designate the doors and steps by which its passengers should leave its trains, directed the other passenger to take the plaintiff through the next car, refusing to allow the plaintiff to alight in the usual and ordinary manner, and neglecting and refusing to assist him in getting off the train, although requested so to do. The defendant and its conductor knew that the plaintiff was being directed to alight in an unusual manner, attendant upon which were dangers unknown to the plaintiff, but known to them, and they refused and neglected to give the plaintiff any notice or warning of such dangers. Unable to see, and not knowing anything about the next car, the plaintiff believed it to be a passenger car similar to the one in which he had been riding, and he, with the other passenger, acting under the direction of the conductor, entered such car. The compartment into which they entered was full of baggage and express packages. Employees were unloading baggage and packages, and a large number of the passengers were engaged in alighting from the train through the baggage door on the side of the car, which was the only door through which they could leave the car. It was raining and the hurry of the employees in unloading the baggage and passengers, and the hurry and confusion of the passengers in trying to alight from the train without getting wet, constituted an unusual and disorderly procedure, which defendant knew was going on, and which defendant was bound to render orderly. Plaintiff knew that the car through which he was passing was different from that which he left, and that something unusual was taking place; but, having received no notice or warning that he was to alight from the train in any way other than the usual and ordinary one for passengers in alighting from trains, and no notice or warning of the dangers to him of the unusual procedure, he was unable to know just where he was or what was taking place. While he and the passenger accompanying him were in the act of stepping out of the baggage car door onto the depot platform, and while he was exercising all possible caution and prudence which could be used by one in his condition, and just as he had placed one foot on the platform, his foot slipped on the wet surface thereof, and he fell into the space between the platform and the baggage car. The platform had been rendered very slippery and unsafe to alight upon by the hard rain; and this the defendant knew or could have known by the exercise of reasonable or ordinary care, and it could have rendered the platform safe to alight upon by sprinkling sand thereon. The defendant was negligent in neglecting and refusing to assist him in alighting from the train; in directing him to alight in an unusual and dangerous manner; in failing to warn him of the dangers attendant upon his alighting in the manner directed by it; in allowing the "unorderly" procedure in the baggage car; in failing to maintain a safe platform upon which to alight; in failing to warn plaintiff of the dangers incident to alighting upon the platform; and in failing to exercise that extraordinary diligence for his safety to which he was entitled. By reason of the fall, he has endured much pain and suffering, and has been permanently injured.

By amendment it was alleged as follows: When the plaintiff undertook to step from the baggage car, he did not know but that he was alighting from the train in the usual and ordinary manner by descending the steps leading from the car door down to the ground, nor did he know that his foot would step onto a wooden platform level with the door of the baggage car. He therefore undertook to step forward, intending to bring his foot down as he usually alighted from a passenger car. Under these circumstances his foot came suddenly in contact with the platform, while his heel went down into the space between the car and the platform, causing him to lose his balance and fall partly on the platform and partly into such space.

The defendant filed a general demurrer to the petition. It was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming and Jas. M. Hull, Jr., for plaintiff in error. Alvin G. Golucke and Jas. Davison, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1, 2. In Southern Ry. Co. v. Reeves, 116 Ga. 743, 42 S. E. 1015, it was held that ordinarily it is no part of the duty of the employees of a railway company in charge of a passenger train to physically assist passengers to alight therefrom; but that the duty of rendering such assistance may arise from special circumstances. A like ruling was made in Cent. Ry. Co. v. Madden, 135 Ga. 205, 69 S. E. 165, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 813, where a sick passenger complained of improper treatment. In Southern Ry. Co. v. Hobbs, 118 Ga. 227, 45 S. E. 23, 63 L. R. A. 68, Chief Justice Simmons, in delivering the opinion, said that there was much respectable authority for the proposition that where a passenger is manifestly aged, infirm, sick, or of defective eyesight, it becomes the duty of the railway carrier to render to him or her such assistance, provided that the servants of the carrier know, or by reasonable attention to their duties, ought to discover the fact of such infirmity. The authorities which he cited fully support the position announced, both by reasoning and by citation of adjudicated cases. In 3 Thomp. Neg. §§ 2845, 2846, 2847, the learned author strongly declares the position, and severely criticises the decisions of some courts. See, also, Ray on Passenger Carriers, § 67; 2 Shear. & Red. Neg. (5th Ed.) § 510; 1 Fetter on Carriers of Passengers, §§ 106, 108; 2 Hutch. Car. (3d Ed.) §§ 992, 993.

[1] The underlying principle is that a carrier of passengers is bound to use extraordinary care for their safety in connection with their carriage and discharge; that what such care requires to be done depends on the facts of the case; and that if a passenger is manifestly infirm, sick, or blind, and this is known to the servants of the carrier, or ought to be discovered by reasonable attention to their duties, extraordinary care must be used in the light of such facts.

In Daniels v. Western & Atlantic R. Co., 96 Ga. 786, 22 S. E. 956, the case was decided on headnotes. It was said that "If, under any circumstances, a railroad company is under a duty to render an infirm passenger physical personal assistance in alighting from a train," yet as the evidence failed to show such a state of facts as would require the rendering of such assistance to the plaintiff, the verdict was right on the substantial merits of the case, and if the charge complained of was erroneous, it did not require a new trial. The reporter's statement of facts shows that the testimony for the plaintiff was that she was infirm and weak in her hands, on account of rheumatism; that her son helped her on the train, and a colored porter helped her on the car where she rode; and that her son told this porter that she was sick and would need help in getting off the car, and the porter said he would help her. No notice of the plaintiff's condition was given to the conductor. For the defendant it appeared that neither the conductor, his flagman, nor the baggage master knew anything about the infirmity of the plaintiff. The decision is criticised in 2 Shear. & Red. on Negligence (5th Ed.) § 510, note 4. In Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Earwood, 104 Ga. 127, 29 S. E. 913 (a decision by five justices), the principle above stated was recognized; but it was held that a voluntary promise by a conductor to aid a passenger in getting off of a railroad car at a certain station did not impose upon the company any liability for a failure of the conductor, after reaching such station, to enter the car and assist the passenger from her seat to the place of exit from such car, where it did not appear that the conductor had notice of any condition of the passenger or circumstances which would render such assistance necessary. Here the passenger was alleged to have been received with full knowledge of his blind and unattended condition, and it was alleged that a promise of assistance was given.

[2] 3. It was argued that the conduct of the conductor, if negligent, was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. It was alleged that the train was stopped with the car used partly for baggage and express purposes and partly for passengers opposite a platform which was about on a level with the door through which baggage was delivered; that the conductor not only failed to render the plaintiff assistance, as he had promised to do, with full knowledge of the plaintiff's blindness, but when a passenger tried to assist the plaintiff to alight in the usual manner by going down the steps of the car in which he was riding, the conductor directed that the plaintiff be carried through the next car which was the express car, and from which the only mode of egress was by means of a way surrounded by baggage and packages, and through an unusual door, upon a slippery platform of unusual height for passengers to alight upon, and with a vacant space between the car and the platform.

[3] It cannot be said, as matter of law, that if the conductor neglected his duty to assist the plaintiff, and, upon seeing a fellow passenger undertake to help him, directed the plaintiff to be carried into a position of greater danger, with no warning or assistance to accomplish a safe alighting, this was not the proximate cause of the injury. Nor can it be declared, on demurrer, that, under such circumstances, the company could escape liability because the fellow passenger, who was aiding the plaintiff, failed to warn him of the peril. No positive act of the other passenger intervened between the negligence of the defendant's conductor and the injury, causing the latter and breaking its connection with the former.

Several of the decisions cited in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error were in cases of injured employes, and none of them are controlling of that now under consideration. The present case is one for submission to the jury, under proper instructions, and the judge correctly overruled the general demurrer.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

FULLER v. CORKER MOTOR CAR CO.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CORPORATIONS (§ 110*)—STOCK ISSUE—CANCELLATION—INJUNCTION.

The petition does not set forth a case entitling the plaintiff to the relief sought, and it should have been dismissed upon general demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by the Corker Motor Car Company against M. Z. L. Fuller. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

W. A. Fuller, for plaintiff in error. Evins & Spence and Jerome Moore, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. The Corker Motor Car Company filed an equitable petition against M. Z. L. Fuller, and alleged, in substance: That at the time the plaintiff company was being organized Fuller represented to the organizers that he had a contract with the Haynes Automobile Company of Indiana, which was reasonably worth $5,000, and proposed to transfer the same to the plaintiff corporation for $5,000 of stock in said company; that his offer was accepted, and the stock was issued to him; "that when the time came for M. Z. L. Fuller to transfer and assign his contract with the Haynes Automobile Company to the Corker Motor Car Company, as he had agreed to do, he produced a printed form of contract which he stated embodied all the terms and conditions of the original contract existing between him and the Haynes Automobile Company, covering the Southern territory, and which was binding and of full force and effect between them; [and] that said Haynes Automobile Company would make, at his instance and request, a like contract with your petitioner direct, in lieu of the contract which existed between him and that company." Petitioner further alleged that, "relying upon such representations, it agreed to take a contract direct, and did receive a contract made with the Haynes Automobile Company"; but it has since discovered that, at the time Fuller represented that he had a contract with the Haynes Company, he had no such contract, but was an agent in the employment of that company, sent to this territory for the purpose of placing such a contract. The petition also contains the following allegations: "(13) That on or about May 23, 1910, at a regular meeting of the board of directors, a motion was made and carried that, whereas the said Fuller was grossly incompetent of performing the duties of sales manager of the company [the petitioner], his position as sales manager should cease on May 31, 1910, and that his compensation for the same should cease on the same date. (14) That since that time, to wit, June 15, 1910, the said Fuller, although having been discharged by the board of directors and his salary discontinued, still continues to assert his authority as sales manager and has given and is giving the officers of said company all manner of trouble, in that he stays around the place of business of the company, gives orders to the clerks, stenographers, and help in general, and persists in answering the mail, and in general making himself obnoxious to every one concerned, to the great injury to the business of the Corker Motor Car Company." Petitioner prays for a decree canceling the stock issued to Fuller, and that he be enjoined from interfering with the business and affairs of petitioner in the manner alleged. The court overruled a general demurrer to the petition, and the defendant excepted.

The petition does not set forth a case entitling the plaintiff to relief in a court of equity, and the general demurrer to the same should have been sustained. While it is true, according to the allegations in the petition, that the statement of the defendant first made to the proposed incorporators of the Corker Motor Car Company, to the effect that "he was the owner of a contract from the Haynes Automobile Company," was not true, and he was not in a position, at the time this statement was made, to transfer said contract to the company as organized, or then to be organized, and that this fact would, upon its discovery, have justified the incorporators in then refusing to deliver the stock to Fuller, if it had not already been delivered, or in demanding its return and cancellation if it had been delivered, they did not take either of these steps; but, after the defendant had produced a printed form of contract which he stated embodied all the conditions of the original contract between him and the Haynes Automobile Company, upon his representation that the Haynes Company would make a like contract directly with petitioners, petitioners proceeded to negotiate with the Haynes Company, with which company it is a necessary inference from the petition that they were brought into relations through the defendant himself and his existing connection with the last-named company. The plaintiff company was organized for the purpose of selling automobiles. They desired a contract with a motor car company. They obtained the contract they desired with the Haynes Company, the very company with which the defendant in the first instance had proposed to secure them a contract. It is true he had proposed to secure it by transferring a contract which he untruthfully represented to be already in his possession; but, it subsequently appearing that he did not have it, he proposed to put the plaintiff company in the way of getting the contract. They acted upon his suggestion in regard to the matter; they availed themselves of the defendant's knowledge of the Haynes Automobile Company's desire to have an agency for the handling of automobiles in this territory. The only difference between what the plaintiffs received and that which they expected to receive from the defendant was a direct contract with the Haynes Company, instead of a transferred contract. There is no suggestion that the contract which was finally made with the Haynes Company was not as desirable and as valuable as the one which the defendant had proposed to transfer to them. It does not appear that the plaintiff company could have secured this contract with the Haynes Company but for the knowledge of the defendant as to the situation of the Haynes Company and his advice and representation. And we do not think that the plaintiff, having secured the contract with the Haynes Company under the circumstances shown in the petition, is entitled to have the stock issued to Fuller surrendered up and canceled, as it prays. In this connection, see the case of Forlaw v. Augusta Naval Stores Co., 124 Ga. 261, 52 S. E. 898. Moreover, it appears that this contract with the Haynes Company was a profitable one, and that after it was made the defendant in this case acted as a sales manager for the plaintiff company, and was finally dismissed from that position, not because of his misrepresentations in regard to the contract with the Haynes Company, but on the ground that he was incompetent to perform the duties pertaining to that position.

Nor do we think that the bill should have been retained for the purpose of granting injunctive relief against Fuller, on the ground that he was interfering with the affairs of the plaintiff company, their employes and agents. The petition failed to allege facts authorizing an injunction.

Among other deficiencies, it is not distinctly alleged that the defendant has been notified of the fact of his dismissal, nor that he has been requested to remain away from the office or to desist from the acts which are set forth as the basis of the complaint against him.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

RICHARDSON v. PERRIN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 36*)—PLEADING—PETITION.

An equitable petition alleged, in brief, as follows: The parties entered into a contract giving to the plaintiff an option to purchase certain land, the lines of which were agreed upon, except one; and as to it the beginning point was fixed, and its general direction agreed upon, so that it should intersect with a certain line, and thus its terminus could be readily ascertained. In reducing the contract to writing, by mutual mistake of law on the part of the parties and also of the scrivener, the description inserted did not carry out the intention of the parties, and was too vague to sufficiently describe the land. For reasons set out, the owner of the land would obtain an unconscionable advantage if the plaintiff were not permitted to reform the contract. Held, that the petition was not subject to general demurrer.

(a) The petition was not subject to the special demurrer filed, on the grounds therein contained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 141-146; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

2. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 36*)—PLEADING—NEGLIGENCE OF PLAINTIFF.

No such negligence on the part of the plaintiff appeared on the face of the petition as to render it demurrable on that ground.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 141-146; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

3. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 32*)—TIME TO SUE—PROVISION OF CONTRACT.

If an option to purchase the land was given, and within such time he elected to purchase it and offered the purchase money to the defendant, who refused to carry out the contract, the expiration of the time for the exercise of the option would not destroy the right of the plaintiff to file an equitable petition to reform the contract as to an insufficient description of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

4. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 36*)—PLEADING—PETITION.

An allegation that the plaintiff had bargained the land covered by the contract for a profit of $1,400, but could not carry out the sale if the defendant could take advantage of the mistake in reducing the contract to writing, tended to show that a gross injustice would be done to the plaintiff and that the defendant would obtain an unconscionable advantage, and was not demurrable as irrelevant and immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

Error from Superior Court, Elbert County; D. W. Meadow, Judge.

Action by L. L. Richardson against G. G. Perrin. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

G. G. Perrin and L. L. Richardson entered into a written contract, which contained the following: "Said second party has this day rented from first party, for the years 1905, 1906, 1907, 1908, and 1909, the following lands: All that part of lands on the public road leading to Elberton from Carpenter's Mill [beginning] at a certain piece of woods just south of C. W. Morris's home, thence running a westerly direction to the pasture fence on west side of pasture, and thence following the line a southerly direction and back to the public road, and then down said road to the beginning point." After certain other terms, not material here, the contract continued: "In addition to the foregoing, the following special agreement is entered into between the parties: It is further agreed that should said L. L. Richardson choose to purchase 200 acres on the upper end of the above lands at the end of three years from the first of this lease, he has the privilege of doing so at the price of fifteen dollars ($15.00) per acre, said Richardson to pay $1,000.00 cash, balance as agreed upon at the time." This contract was signed by both parties.

Richardson filed an equitable petition against Perrin, seeking to have the contract so reformed, so as to express the true agreement of the parties as to the land covered by the option. He alleged, among other things, as follows: Prior to the execution of the written contract, it was distinctly agreed between the parties to what were the exact boundaries of the land, except as to precisely where the line beginning at a certain piece of woods just south of C. W. Morris' house and running thence in a westerly direction to the pasture fence on the west side of the pasture should intersect the line between the land of Perrin and that of W. J. Eavenson, so as to cut off exactly 200 acres. In the absence of a survey this point of intersection could not be fixed; but the point from which this line was to begin and the direction it was to take were agreed upon, and no mistake could be made in thus ascertaining the exact tract covered by the option. Perrin owned a tract of land containing over 400 acres, and the line described as beginning at a piece of woods just south of Morris' house, and running in a westerly direction to the pasture fence on the west side of the pasture, was the line that would separate the land covered by the option and the other land of Perrin. The contract of option, as agreed upon between the parties, covered the following tract of land: Beginning at the piece of woods just south of C. W. Morris' house, and running in a westerly direction to the pasture fence on the west side of the pasture, intersecting the line between G. G. Perrin and W. J. Eavenson at the point where 200 acres would be cut off the southern end of the whole Perrin tract by following the lines from this point of intersection between said G. G. Perrin and the adjacent landowners, viz., W. J. Eavenson, ——— Adams, and the estate lands of J. W. Tibbets, to the public road leading from Elberton to Carpenter's mill, thence down said road to the beginning point, in 315th district G. M., county of Elbert, state of Georgia, containing 200 acres. The contract was written by T. W. Campbell, a bookkeeper, who was not acquainted with such work, "and, by accident and mistake of both parties thereto, did not sufficiently describe the premises so optioned, but that petitioner in good faith made this contract of lease and option to cover the premises described, * * * and it was agreed between him and the said G. G. Perrin, and that the insufficiency of description was not discovered by either party until said G. G. Perrin refused to accept the purchase price and make petitioner a deed, and when the matter was referred to their respective counsel. Petitioner alleges that there was an honest mistake of law as to the effect of said contract of lease and option on the part of both contracting parties, because of its inefficient description, and this mistake operates as a gross injustice to this petitioner and gives an unconscientious advantage to said G. G. Perrin"; because the plaintiff would not have leased the land for the term and at the yearly rental agreed upon, without the option to buy at the expiration of three years, which was a part of the consideration of the lease; because, further, he had made valuable improvements on the land, by building a storehouse at a cost of $100 and making other improvements not required of a lessee; and because of the fact that he bargained this 200 acres to a person named for the sum of $4,400, thereby making a clear profit of $1,400, to which he was justly entitled, and which he would have received but for the insufficiency of description in the written contract, and the taking advantage thereof by Perrin. "Petitioner alleges that T. W. Campbell, the draftsman of the contract of lease and option, made a mistake of law in making this insufficient description of the premises so as to carry out the real intention of the parties, and out of this mistake a gross injustice has been done petitioner and an unconscientious advantage has been given said G. G. Perrin." Within the time fixed by the contract he tendered to the defendant the amount of the purchase price and called on him to comply with the contract, which the defendant refused to do.

On demurrer the petition was dismissed. The plaintiff excepted.

Geo. C. Grogan, for plaintiff in error. Sam L. Olive, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The defendant, who was an owner of land, entered into a written contract with the plaintiff to lease to the latter certain land for five years, with an option on the part of the lessee to purchase 200 acres after the expiration of three years from the beginning of the lease. The plaintiff filed an equitable petition, seeking to compel the defendant to specifically perform the agreement to sell. It was held that the description of the land to be sold was too indefinite to authorize a decree of specific performance. Richardson v. Perrin, 133 Ga. 721, 68 S. E. 899. The plaintiff then filed the present petition, seeking to have the written contract so reformed as to express what he alleged was the actual agreement between the parties as to the description of the land to be sold. Construed as setting up a mistake of fact, the allegations of the petition were insufficient. It was not alleged distinctly that the parties intended to put any particular words of description into the contract and failed to do so by reason of accident or mistake, or that they did not know what was in the written contract, or what instructions were given by them to the scrivener as to putting some particular thing into the contract, which he omitted to do by accident or mistake. But construed as setting up a mistake of law, the petition was sufficient to withstand the grounds of the demurrer which were urged against it. An honest mistake of law as to the effect of an instrument on the part of both contracting parties, when such mistake operates as a gross injustice to one, and gives an unconscientious advantage to the other, may be relieved in equity. Civil Code 1910, § 4576; Rogers v. Atkinson, 1 Ga. 12; Dolvin v. American Harrow Co., 125 Ga. 699, 54 S. E. 706. In Collier v. Lanier, 1 Ga. 238, it was held: "Where an instrument is drawn and executed, which professes and is intended to carry into execution an agreement, whether in writing or by parol, previously entered into, but which, by mistake of the draftsman, either as to fact or law, does not fulfill, or which violates the manifest intention of the parties to the agreement, equity will correct the mistake, so as to produce a conformity of the instrument to the agreement." This principle as to a mistake of law in the draftsman has been codified in section 4577 of the Civil Code of 1910. See, also, Wyche v. Green, 11 Ga. 159. It is not meant that if a person knows that a material portion of an agreement is omitted from the written contract, but relies on the parol promise of another to carry that part of the agreement into effect, he can afterwards have the instrument corrected by inserting such provision. Ligon v. Rogers, 12 Ga. 281. There is a clear distinction between adding provisions to a written contract by parol, and making a contract speak what the parties intended it should express, and thought it did legally express, when they executed it.

In the present case it was alleged that all of the lines of the land covered by the option were agreed upon prior to the making of the written contract, save one, and it was to begin at a certain point and run in a westerly direction until it intersected with a line fence at a point which would include within the boundaries 200 acres; that this was sufficient to define the land; that the parties undertook to express in writing the contract, and both honestly believed that the description as written was sufficient to define such land; and that, by mutual mistake of law, by both of the parties and the scrivener, the written contract did not express the actual contract by sufficiently describing the land thus agreed to be included in the option. The allegations were sufficient to withstand a general demurrer. Whether in some respects the petition may have been subject to special demurrer, so as to require more fullness of allegation, need not be considered. A special demurrer was filed, attacking various paragraphs of the petition; but the petition and its paragraphs were not subject to be dismissed for any of the reasons set up therein.

[2] 2. No such negligence on the part of the plaintiff appears on the face of his petition as to authorize a dismissal on that ground. Civil Code 1910, § 4571. Some cases in this court have gone quite far in the direction of denying equitable relief to a party who claimed that he thought a certain provision or agreement was included in a written contract, but failed to read it without any sufficient cause therefor. But they do not control this case, in which a mistake of law on the part of the parties to the contract and the draftsman is alleged.

[3] 3. It was urged that, because the time for asserting the option had expired, there was no contract to reform, and the equitable petition seeking reformation was therefore demurrable. We cannot concur in this position. If the contract should be reformed, it would stand as if originally so written, as between the parties. It was alleged that within the time prescribed by the contract the plaintiff elected to purchase the land, and tendered payment therefor, and that the defendant refused to carry out the contract. It is the exercise of the option, not the reformation of the contract, which must take place within the time limited, if the contract fixes a limit.

[4] 4. There was no error in refusing to strike from the petition the allegation in regard to the contract made by the plaintiff to sell the land at a profit of $1,400, and his inability to carry out such contract because of the refusal of the defendant to convey the land to him. This tended to show that the land was of greater value than that contracted to be paid for it, and that a gross injustice would be done the plaintiff, and the defendant would obtain an unconscientious advantage, if he were permitted to refuse to carry out the contract as made, and if it were not reformed.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

NEW TRIAL (§ 159*)—EVIDENCE.

The action being for the negligent homicide of the plaintiff's husband, and there being no complaint that any error of law was committed upon the trial, and the jury being authorized to find from the evidence that the plaintiff's husband could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences to himself of the defendant's negligence, it cannot be said that a verdict in favor of the defendant was without evidence to support it, and therefore the judge did not err in refusing to grant a new trial.

In Hodgson v. Raphael, 105 Ga. 480, 30 S. WALTERS v. JOSEY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 16, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The admission of irrelevant evidence, which is not hurtful to the complaining party, affords no cause for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4154; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 39*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—OFFER OF PROOF.

Where a defendant executor, in an action of complaint for land, set up that the plaintiff's wife, under direction of the plaintiff, had written a letter authorizing the sale of the land, and that the testatrix of the defendant had purchased it thereunder and paid the purchase price in full, and where the wife of the plaintiff, while testifying as a witness, denied that the letter was written by her, other letters which she admitted having written were not admissible in evidence, for the purpose of comparison in proof of the genuineness of the first, over objection, where such letters had not been submitted to the adverse party before he announced ready for trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. 92-98; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 706*)—RECORD—QUESTIONS PRESENTED FOR REVIEW.

This court will not reverse the judgment of the court below, refusing a new trial, on the ground that certain conversations alleged to have been material in their bearing upon the issues of fact in the case were excluded from the evidence, when the conversations which the court refused to allow the movant to prove are not set forth literally or in substance in the motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2944-2947; Dec. Dig. § 706.*]

4. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

There was sufficient evidence to support the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Washington County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Action by W. M. Josey against R. B. G. Walters, executor. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Evans & Evans, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Armistead, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. Josey brought an action in ejectment against the executor of his mother to recover two tracts of land which the plaintiff inherited from his father, and which the defendant claimed had been sold by the plaintiff to his mother. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the premises in dispute. A new trial was denied, and the defendant excepted.

[1] 1. The defendant was the executor of the plaintiff's mother, and he resisted the suit of her son upon the ground that the land in controversy had been purchased by defendant's testate, the mother of plaintiff, and that the purchase price had been paid. The plaintiff denied that he had sold the land to his mother, or that she had paid for the same; and thus the controlling issue of fact in the case was made. One of the grounds contained in the motion for a new trial assigns error upon the ruling of the court in admitting, over the objection that the same was irrelevant, the following testimony of a named witness: "I know William Josey [the plaintiff], and I know his mental condition. It is weak; he is a weak-minded man." The plaintiff in this case was not seeking to set aside any conveyance, or any other document conveying title to the land in question, on the ground of mental incapacity to execute a valid conveyance; and it would therefore seem that the evidence was open to the criticism pointed out—its irrelevancy.

But we do not think that its admission was hurtful to defendant. If hurtful at all, the injury was to the party offering it, the plaintiff, in view of the fact that as a party to the case he had undertaken to state and explain certain matters involved in the controversy, and to uphold his contention by his own testimony relative to material facts in the case, and the value of his testimony was, to a certain extent, dependent upon the accuracy of his memory; that and his truthfulness would both necessarily be considered by the jury in passing upon the value of his testimony given before them, and evidence that he was of feeble intellect would necessarily diminish the weight of his testimony. To that extent he, and not the complaining party, was injured by the evidence under criticism.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r indexes

[2, 3] 2, 3. The rulings in headnotes 2 and 3 require no discussion or elaboration.

[4] 4. We have indicated above the controlling issue in the case. There was sufficient evidence to support the finding of the jury upon that issue, and this finding should not be set aside.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 938*)—REVIEW—SIGNATURE—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where a bill of exceptions appears to have been signed by the trial judge on a given date, and contains no affirmative statement that it was tendered at a different date, the legal presumption is that it was tendered on the date of the certificate. Allison & Davis v. Jowers, 94 Ga. 335, 21 S. E. 570.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 537*)—DISMISSAL—DELAY IN CERTIFYING BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

A bill of exceptions, having been tendered the trial judge for his certificate on a given date, was returned by him to counsel for plaintiff in error for correction, and was certified at a date 50 days later. In the absence of any statement as to the cause of the delay, it must be held that such delay was unreasonable, and that therefore the bill of exceptions must be dismissed. Atkins v. Winter, 121 Ga. 75, 48 S. E. 717; Dykes v. Brock, 123 Ga. 395, 57 S. E. 700; Meador v. Callicott, 129 Ga. 631, 60 S. E. 863.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 982*)—EXECUTION OF SENTENCE—SUSPENSION.

A judge of the superior court of this state has no authority to suspend the execution of a sentence imposed by him in a criminal case, except as incidental to a review of the judgment under which the sentence was imposed. Wall v. Jones, 135 Ga. 425, 69 S. E. 548, and cases cited.

(a) The statement of the judge in orally passing sentence on the accused, where the written sentence imposed a fine of $150 and also imprisonment in the chain gang for the term of 12 months, that so much of the written sentence which was subsequently entered upon the minutes of the court as related to the imprisonment of the accused in the chain gang was suspended, on condition that the accused would not again commit the same offense for which he had been convicted, was ineffectual to suspend that portion of the sentence.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 982*)—SUSPENSION OF SENTENCE.

RICHARDSON v. CLAYTON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 16, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 281*)—FORECLOSURE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

A contractor's lien was foreclosed against a certain lot, and a special judgment obtained against it, and a general judgment against the man who was alleged to be the owner of it. The lien described the property as "part of lot No. 54 in the Third district of White county, Georgia, containing two acres, more or less, and formerly owned by V. R. Hunter and purchased from him," giving the metes and bounds thereof. The execution issued was levied on the land, the entry containing the same description. The person who was the defendant interposed a claim to the land as administrator of his deceased wife. The entry of levy recited that the defendant was in possession, and the claimant thereupon admitted a prima facie case and assumed the burden of proof. Held: (1) Under the recitals in the lien, the execution, and the levy, it was not necessary for the claimant to show title in V. R. Hunter, the person recited to have been the former owner, and from whom it was stated to have been purchased. (2) In such a case, where the claimant introduced a deed from such person to his intestate, proved that he was her husband and administrator, that they lived together in the house with their family until her death, that she left two children as heirs, beside her husband, and that the estate owed unpaid debts, and there was no conflicting evidence, a verdict finding the property subject was without evidence to support it.

(a) The mere proof by the contractor that he built the house under a contract with the defendant in fi. fa., and completed it in accordance with the contract, that the defendant paid him a part of the contract price, but failed to pay him the balance, and that the contractor informed the defendant that he would file a lien on the building, and the latter gave him a description of the property, was not sufficient to rebut the evidence recited in the preceding headnote, or to authorize the finding that the property was subject.

COLLIER v. CLAY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 16, 1912.)

1. BOUNDARIES (§ 37*)—ASCERTAINMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence in this case authorized the finding and holding of the court below, to which was submitted all questions of law and fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 30*)—ASCERTAINMENT—PARTIES.

The plaintiff and defendant being purchasers of contiguous lots of land from a common grantor, who was the administrator of a named decedent and sold the land at an administrator's sale, and the issue being as to which of the two parties to the case had title to a strip of land along their common boundary line, the court did not err in refusing, upon motion of defendant's counsel, to make the administrator, who had previously been discharged from his office, a party to the case, although notice had previously been served upon the administrator as such, notifying him to come into court; and that "he is vouched in court to defend the suit."

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—REVIEW—ABANDONMENT OF ERROR.

Matters raised in a bill of exceptions which are not argued or referred to in the brief of counsel will be treated as abandoned.

Error from Superior Court, De Kalb County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by J. N. Clay and others against J. E. J. Collier. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Alonzo Field, for plaintiff in error. Mark Bolding and J. Howell Green, for defendants in error.

BECK, J. [1] 1. The plaintiff in error purchased, at an administrator's sale, certain land belonging to the estate of the intestate. The description of the lot purchased by him is as follows: "The lot or parcel of land lying and being in land lot one hundred and forty-four (144) in the Fifteenth district of originally Henry, now De Kalb, county, Georgia, said tract of land containing 63 acres, more or less, and commencing at the northeast corner of said land lot, and running thence north 88 degrees west 2,072 feet along the north line of said land lot to the branch; thence in a southeasterly direction along the sinuosities of said branch 1,551 feet; thence east 1,650 feet to the east line of said land lot; thence north 2 degrees east 1,489 feet to the beginning point." From the description of the tract or lot embraced in plaintiff in error's deed, it will be seen that the line on the east of the tract of land purchased by him coincides with the land lot line between land lots 144 and 143 throughout the extent of the eastern boundary of the land purchased by the plaintiff in error. In order to ascertain the eastern boundary, it was necessary merely to locate the land lot line between the two land lots mentioned above. Plaintiff in error was of the opinion that the eastern boundary of the land which he purchased was the line indicated by certain stakes a certain distance to the east of the line which the court, under the evidence, found to be the true land lot line; but his deed did not call for the line as fixed by stakes, and did not attempt to indicate the true eastern boundary of the land sold to him, otherwise than by identifying it with the land lot line; and the instrument with these descriptive words was accepted by the purchaser at the administrator's sale. That being true, he acquired title to no land east of the true land lot line. And under the evidence in the case the court was authorized to find that the true land lot line was to the west of the stakes, as contended by the defendants in error, plaintiffs in the court below, and to hold that the strip of land between the true line and the line marked by the stakes belonged to the plaintiffs in the court below, the defendants in error. Hall v. Davis, 122 Ga. 252, 50 S. E. 106.

[2] 2. The bill of exceptions recites that the defendant in the case gave "J. Howell Green, and the said J. Howell Green as administrator of the estate of Nancy Ford, deceased, notice to come into court and defend his (J. E. J. Collier's) title. * * * The said J. Howell Green appeared, and the court passed up an order in the premises, to wit: 'J. Howell Green having appeared before the court in the above-stated case in obedience to the foregoing notice, and resisted becoming a party defendant in said case, and stating that he is no longer administrator of the estate of Nancy Ford, deceased, having been discharged therefrom, the court declines to require him to become a party defendant in said case upon the showing made by the movant, J. E. J. Collier.' The notice referred to is attached as an exhibit to the bill of exceptions filed pendente lite, and is addressed to J. Howell Green, administrator of the estate of Mrs. Nancy Ford, deceased. It recites the fact of this suit having been brought against the defendant, and that J. Howell Green, as administrator of the estate of his intestate, had said land surveyed by a surveyor prior to the sale of the same on the 2d day of October, 1896; and that, as administrator, he had sold of the estate of his intestate the tract of land described in his deed; and that this notice was served "to vouch you in court to defend said suit." Plaintiff in error excepted generally to the order of the court set forth above. Inasmuch as there is no denial of the fact that J. Howell Green had been discharged as administrator of the estate of his intestate, of which estate the lands in question constituted a part, the court properly refused to make the discharged administrator a party to the case.

[3] 3. The bill of exceptions contains an exception to the exclusion of certain evidence; but this exception is not argued or referred to in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, and is therefore treated as abandoned.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

PERRY v. REYNOLDS.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 57*)—RECOVERY OF POSSESSION—ACTION BY GRANTOR'S ADMINISTRATOR.

Where one, to defraud his creditors, conveys and transfers his property to another, his administrator cannot maintain an equitable action against the transferee to get possession of the property for the purpose of paying the creditors of the decedent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 309; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 204*)—DEMURRER.

But where a petition brought by an administrator is based, not only on the claim of right to recover the property transferred, under the circumstances indicated in the preceding headnote and for the purposes there stated, but also on the right to recover the property for the estate of the decedent, on the ground that the latter was of such unsound mind at the time of executing the conveyance as incapacitated him to make a valid contract, the entire petition should not be dismissed upon general demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Dec. Dig. § 204.*]

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; Frank Park, Judge.

Action by E. J. Perry, administrator, against J. E. Reynolds, guardian ad litem of James Irwin Reynolds. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Jno. R. Wilson and Russell & Custer, for plaintiff in error. Will H. Krause, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. This petition was brought by E. J. Perry, as administrator of Mrs. M. J. Reynolds, against J. E. Reynolds, guardian ad litem of James Irwin Reynolds. It seeks to have a deed, executed by the said Mrs. Reynolds to the said James Irwin Reynolds, her grandson, canceled, and other equitable relief.

The petitioner bases his right to the relief sought upon two grounds: The first is that the deed was executed for a totally inadequate consideration, and was of the nature of a voluntary conveyance for love and affection; and that, as the administrator of his intestate, he is entitled to recover possession of the land, which is now in the possession of the defendant, in order that he may sell the same for the purpose of paying the valid demands of creditors against the estate of his intestate, the intestate being insolvent at the time of her death, unless the deed referred to be treated as invalid, and the property be decreed to be a part of her estate. The other ground is that the decedent was, at the time of the execution of the deed, "mentally incapable of executing said conveyance, by reason of her long-continued illness and the infirmities of age; and that at the time said deed is purported to have been made she was totally incapacitated and of such unsound mind that she was unable to make a legal and valid conveyance." The plaintiff prayed that, should the court find upon the trial that any consideration whatever was paid by the grantee in the deed, "then the equity over what was actually paid be sold for the benefit of the estate." Demurrers, both general and special, were filed. The court did not pass upon the special demurrers, but granted an order sustaining in terms the general demurrer.

[1] 1. So much of the petition as may have for its purpose the setting aside of the deed, because it was executed upon an inadequate consideration, or a consideration merely of love and affection, and that for this reason the administrator is entitled to recover the land for the purpose of bringing the same to sale, in order that the debts against the estate of the decedent may be paid with the proceeds, was clearly open to demurrer. An administrator cannot recover land which had been conveyed by his intestate, though the conveyance was a voluntary deed and without consideration, merely for the purpose of subjecting the property thus conveyed to the demands of creditors against the estate. In such an action, he stands in no better situation than his intestate would have stood had she, in her lifetime, brought an action to recover the property for the purpose of using it in paying debts which might have existed against her. This precise question was decided by this court in the case of Crosby v. De Graffenreid, 19 Ga. 290, where it was said: "A., to defraud his creditors, transfers his property to B., and dies. His administrator files a bill against B. to get possession of the property, that he may, with it, pay the creditors. Held, that there is no equity in the bill."

[2] 2. But if, as alleged in the petition, Mrs. M. J. Reynolds was, because of mental unsoundness, incapable of contracting at the time of the execution of the deed, after her death her personal representative had the right to bring this petition for the purpose of setting aside the conveyance. Orr v. Equitable Mortgage Co., 107 Ga. 499, 33 S. E. 708. And if the conveyance in the present case was not purely for love and affection, but some consideration, though inadequate, was paid, a decree may be molded, under the allegations of this petition and the prayers thereof, that would protect any rights which the grantee may have as to the consideration which he may have actually paid for the conveyance.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

YATES v. JONES et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 16, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SALES (§ 244*)—RIGHTS OF PARTIES—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence did not support the finding of the auditor in favor of the defendant in error, and it was error to overrule the exception based on the ground that it was contrary to law and without evidence to support it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 700-702; Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

2. SALES (§ 234*)—TRANSFER OF TITLE—SELECTION OF PROPERTY.

Where plaintiff advanced money in part payment of 40,000 feet of lumber of given character and dimensions, to be sawed for him and placed in a designated yard, and 47,000 feet of lumber were sawed and placed in the yard, plaintiff did not become a bona fide purchaser, where he never received, marked, and accepted the lumber.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 657-680; Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

Error from Superior Court, Monroe County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by T. S. Yates and others against one Madden. To a finding in favor of B. F. Jones, T. S. Yates brings error. Reversed.

Persons & Persons and C. J. Lester, for plaintiff in error. Willingham & Willingham, for defendants in error.

BECK, J. The report of the auditor before whom the case was tried contained the following finding: "I find likewise that all the lumber one inch thick on and coming from the third yard on which the mill was located, which I shall hereafter call the Jones lumber, was sawed for plaintiff Jones; and that he was a bona fide purchaser of such lumber, advanced $162 on the purchase price of same, and was equitably entitled to a specific performance of his contract, and is entitled to have the lumber delivered to him as a good-faith purchaser upon tendering to defendant any amount still due for same under his contract of purchase." Mrs. Yates, who claimed to be a bona fide purchaser of the same property, filed exceptions to this finding on the ground that the same was contrary to the evidence. The court below overruled her exceptions, to which ruling she sued out bill of exceptions to this court.

[1] While there were numerous parties to this case, and the pleadings made many issues, the exceptions to the findings and rulings of the auditor were comparatively few; and finally, under the ruling of the judge sustaining the auditor in all other respects and ruling against all other exceptions to his report, the issues were narrowed to the single one growing out of an exception to the finding of the auditor in favor of the defendant in error, Jones; and thus but a single question is presented for determination, and that is whether or not the auditor's holding was correct that Jones was the bona fide purchaser of certain lumber, on the purchase price of which he advanced the sum of $162, and was equitably entitled to a specific performance of his contract with one Madden, against whom the petition in the case had been filed by persons alleging themselves to be creditors and lienors. The testimony of Jones, which it is contended supports and authorizes the finding of the auditor, is set forth in the bill of exceptions, and in substance is as follows: "Mr. Madden's sawmill was located near Mr. Kimball's in 1909. I bought 40,000 feet of lumber from him in 1909. I agreed to pay him 75 cents per hundred. I paid him $162 on the lumber. The receiver sold this lumber. The announcement was made at the time of the sale by my attorney, Mr. Willingham, that I had bought the lumber and had paid part of the purchase price and was ready to pay balance. I am still ready to pay the balance and carry out my contract. The lumber Mr. Yates was interested in was at the first and second settings. My lumber was at the third setting. I went to Mr. Madden's mill and confirmed the trade for lumber that had been made by my agent. I let him have the money to run his mill with. I have never had any part of the lumber delivered to me. Mr. Madden skipped out when I wanted the lumber checked out to me. It was understood between Mr. Madden and myself that this was to be full value of the lumber. I did not receive any lumber from Madden. The money I advanced was for running the mill. I understood from what he told me that this was all the lumber. He cut 47,000 feet during the time. I was to buy 40,000 feet. I kept advancing him money with the understanding that I could get all the lumber cut at this setting. Forty seven thousand feet was all he cut and was all I could expect to get. It was about 7,000 feet more than I was originally to get. My lumber was to be cut at the third setting. Madden moved the mill to the third setting. The lumber at the first and second settings was to be 1½ inches thick. I had my lumber cut 1 inch thick. About 47,000 feet was sawed with my money. Madden was not present when I checked the lumber." The witness Towery, introduced on behalf of Jones, testified: "I am father-in-law of B. F. Jones. I act as his agent when he is away. I made the trade with Mr. Madden for Mr. Jones. Mr. Madden was then at the second setting, and he moved his mill to the third setting and sawed lumber for Mr. Jones. The lumber was to be cut 12 to 16 feet long, and 4, 6, 8, and 10 inches wide, and 1 inch thick, as per Mr. Jones' order. The lumber was to be cut for 75 cents per 100 feet. Mr. Jones and myself paid something on this lumber. Mr. Jones ratified the contract. He went over to the mill and ratified it, and paid out money to Madden on the contract. No certain amount of lumber was to be sawed. All of the lumber cut at the third setting was for Mr. Jones. I do not know whether Mr. Yates furnished any money for the third setting or not. No lumber was ever delivered to Mr. Jones, and no money was ever refunded to me or to Mr. Jones. I did not have any writing with Mr. Madden. I gave him no instructions in writing. Madden told me that he needed money to run his mill, and that he wanted this money to run the mill with. Said he could not run the mill without the money. I was to get the lumber after it was cut and dry. I do not know how much he cut at the second setting after I advanced the money. I do not know how much was cut at the third setting. I never checked up any lumber at either stand." Other evidence was introduced by Jones, contradicting Yates' testimony, to the effect that he had checked up the lumber which Jones claimed, and that it had been delivered to him (Yates).

[2] While the testimony of Jones in his own favor, that he advanced the sum of $162 to Madden, who was operating a sawmill, and that this $162 was in part payment of 40,000 feet of lumber of given character and dimensions which Madden, the owner and operator of the sawmill, was to cut for Jones, we do not think that under the evidence the contract of sale of the lumber at any time became complete and executed, but rather that it remained an executory contract of sale. It is to be borne in mind that, at the time Jones made the advancement of the money to Madden, the lumber for which this money was advanced was not in esse. It was still to be produced by cutting timber into the dimensions stipulated. And while it was piled, after having been cut, upon a designated yard, it was never received, marked, and accepted by Jones, but was piled in the yard referred to, with some 7,000 feet of other lumber. Before Jones could have become the bona fide purchaser of the lumber, as the auditor found him to be, acceptance and delivery, actual or constructive, should have appeared.

In the case of Clarke v. Wolfe, 115 Ga. 320, 41 S. E. 581, it appears that Clarke Bros. and one Clifton entered into a written contract for the sale of certain timber, in which contract it was stipulated that the latter, who was operating a sawmill, agreed to deliver to Clarke Bros. "all of the timber and lumber he [Clifton] may cut * * * (from the present date) from the lands purchased or to be purchased from the Southern Pine Company of Georgia, * * * in Montgomery county, Ga. The foregoing to be square edge, well manufactured, fresh, of good quality showing good heart on four sides, saw butted both ends, true, etc. Free from all defects." Clarke Bros. were to pay for the timber at certain rates varying with certain "averages." They made advances to Clifton from time to time, and the latter had delivered them timber cut from the land referred to in the contract. It was held by this court that the agreement contained in the writing was an executory contract for the sale of timber and lumber, and title to the same would not pass to Clarke Bros. until the timber had been sawed and delivered to them, and that the sale by Clifton of any portion of the timber or lumber before it was actually delivered to Clarke Bros. would have the effect to pass the title to the purchaser and defeat any claim which Clarke Bros. might have on the lumber or timber thus sold. The court said further: "In such a case they would be remitted to their action against Clifton for damages for the breach of his contract. Clarke Bros. had no title, under the contract, to any timber or lumber which had not been actually delivered to them." See, also, in this connection, Fordice v. Gibson, 129 Ind. 7, 28 N. E. 303, and Nat. Bank v. Crowley, 24 Mich. 492.

If Yates were a bona fide purchaser of the same lumber from Madden, though his contract of sale was subsequent in date to the contract between Madden and Jones, he would have acquired a good title to the lumber, and Jones would be remitted to his action for damages against Madden; for even if, as against Madden, in view of his insolvency, Jones had a right to a decree for specific performance, this could not be enforced as against a bona fide purchaser of the property in controversy.

In his report the auditor refers to a telegram introduced in evidence by Jones, purporting to be from Madden to Jones, which Jones claimed Madden authorized Yates to write for him; but the telegram is not set forth in the report in words or in substance, the auditor merely stating that the telegram had been lost or misplaced, and that he would endeavor to find and attach it. Of course, in this state of the record, we cannot undertake to construe the telegram, nor determine what effect it would have upon the relative rights of Yates and Jones, nor consider the argument of counsel that Jones "entered definitely into the contract and began furnishing money to Madden, assured by a telegram from Madden, which Yates subsequently admitted to Jones he had himself written for Madden, that everything was arranged all right."

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

HAYES v. HAYES et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 59*)—AMENDMENT—SUBJECT-MATTER.

Where it appears that, in a suit brought against several defendants, the plaintiff in the court below, against whom the verdict was rendered upon the trial, sued out a bill of exceptions to the judgment of the court overruling his motion for a new trial, and named the defendants in the case as J. H. (one of the defendants) et al., and did not otherwise designate the defendants, and the bill of exceptions was duly served upon the attorney of record for all of the defendants, the bill of exceptions may be amended by adding the names of all of the defendants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Cent. Dig. §§ 106-111; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 439*)—ACTIONS—INTERVENTION IN ACTION BY OTHERS.

Where complaint for land was brought by one who claimed title to the property sued for under a deed from his mother, it was alleged that the mother had died since the execution of the deed, leaving no property and no administrator, and that the defendants named in the petition, together with the plaintiff, were all of the heirs at law of the decedent, one showing that he was the duly appointed and qualified temporary administrator of the decedent, and that he was in possession of the property sued for, was, upon his intervention duly filed praying that he be made a party defendant, properly allowed to become a party defendant to such suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 439.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 713*)—PLEADING—RES ADJUDICATA.

The demurrer to the plea of res adjudicata in this case should have been sustained, inasmuch as the parties to the record in the suit relied upon as the basis of the plea of res adjudicata were not the same as those of the present suit, and the issue therein was entirely different.

Error from Superior Court, Crisp County; U. V. Whipple, Judge.

Action by W. H. Hayes against John Hayes and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

R. J. Bacon and Walter F. Hall, for plaintiff in error. J. T. Hill, for defendants in error.

BECK, J. W. H. Hayes brought complaint for land against E. W. Hayes, T. P. Hayes, John Hayes, Mrs. T. W. Bowen, and Rosa Bowen. The last named being a minor, a guardian ad litem was appointed for her. It was alleged in the petition that the plaintiff claimed title to the real estate sued for, under a deed from Mrs. Mary Hayes, deceased, and that Mrs. Mary Hayes died intestate on November 15, 1908, leaving no debts nor any estate, and that no administrator had been appointed on her estate. The defendants named filed their plea; and John Hayes, showing that he was the temporary administrator of Mrs. Mary Hayes, deceased, and that he had duly filed his bond and qualified as such administrator, and further showing that he had in his possession, custody, and control all the property, real and personal, of the decedent, including the property sued for in this case, asked to be allowed to intervene as temporary administrator for the purpose of protecting the interests of the estate, and he was accordingly allowed to intervene and be made a party defendant. Upon the trial a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendants. Whereupon the plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, and, this being overruled, he excepted.

In the bill of exceptions it is recited that the cause was one wherein "W. H. Hayes was plaintiff and John Hayes et al. were defendants." No specification as to who were the parties defendant in the case and to the bill of exceptions were made other than as stated above. Acknowledgment of service was made upon this bill of exceptions, and signed by "J. T. Hill, Attorneys for Defendant, as Appears of Record, John Hayes, Mrs. S. W. Bacon, J. O. Littlejohn, Guardian of Rosa Bowen, and T. P. Hayes." When the case was called for a hearing here, counsel for defendants in error made a motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions, on the following grounds: "(1) No one is named or otherwise disclosed by the bill of exceptions as plaintiff in error, or as defendant in error. (2) John Hayes et al. are named as defendants in a certain cause tried at the November term, 1910, of Crisp superior court, and by further reference to said bill of exceptions it will be seen that John Hayes intervened as temporary administrator of the estate of Mary Hayes, and not in an individual capacity, and no service has been made on the said John Hayes as administrator of said estate, and there has been no waiver of service. (3) The service made of the bill of exceptions is insufficient, for the reason that J. T. Hill acknowledged service for certain defendants, naming them, but does not acknowledge service for any one as defendant in error, and neither by reference to the bill of exceptions nor to the acknowledgment of service on the same can it be ascertained who are the defendants in error." Counsel for plaintiff in error asked leave to amend by adding, to the name of the defendant in error (John Hayes, the other parties who were the defendants in the court below.

[1] 1. Section 4, of an act entitled "An act to regulate and prescribe certain matters of review, procedure and practice in the courts of this state, and for other purposes," approved August 21, 1911 (Laws 1911, p. 149), provides that, "where a bill of exceptions which can be identified as excepting to a specific judgment is served upon counsel of record in the case, such service shall be held to bind all parties whom said counsel represented in the trial court." And section 5 provides as follows: "That where an acknowledgment of service has been procured as provided in section 4 of this act, the bill of exceptions may be amended in the reviewing court by making any person a party defendant in error to the case who is bound by such service, although such person may not have been named in the bill of exceptions." This statute is purely remedial, relating entirely to matters of practice; and therefore, while passed subsequently to the signing of this acknowledgment to the bill of exceptions, it is nevertheless applicable thereto. Pending cases were not excepted from the operation of the statute, which is general and universal in its terms relatively to matters dealt with. That being true, service upon J. T. Hill of the bill of exceptions was sufficient to bind all other parties defendant for whom he appeared as counsel according to the record. He appeared as counsel of record for all the parties defendant named in the original petition and as counsel for John Hayes in the petition to be allowed to intervene as temporary administrator and to be made a party defendant in the case.

[2] 2. Under the facts stated in the second headnote, the temporary administrator was properly allowed to intervene as a party defendant.

[3] 3. Upon the trial of the case, in addition to the defense set up, the defendants offered a plea of res adjudicata, which was demurred to generally by the plaintiff. The plea of res adjudicata contained the record in the case of Mrs. Mary Hayes (the decedent referred to above) against E. W. Hayes; the same being proceedings instituted in the superior court of Crisp county to evict the defendant E. W. Hayes, as a tenant holding over, from the property now in controversy. In the eviction proceedings E. W. Hayes, who was there proceeded against, filed a counter affidavit, deposing that he was then holding the land in controversy under W. H. Hayes, and that he had lawful possession of same, and that it belonged to W. H. Hayes. Upon the trial of the issue thus made W. H. Hayes was sworn as a witness in such cause, and was fully cognizant and aware of what the issue was in said case. The trial of said eviction proceedings resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff Mrs. Mary Hayes, against E. W. Hayes. What is stated above in this division of the opinion, together with the exhibits of the affidavit of warrant, entries thereon, and the counter affidavit in the eviction proceedings, constitutes the plea of res adjudicata. The demurrer thereto was overruled. This was error. Under the decision in the case of Patrick v. Cobb, 122 Ga. 80, 49 S. E. 806, title to the land was not involved in the eviction proceedings. In the case cited, the court said: "An issue made by the filing of a counter affidavit to a summary proceeding to eject a tenant, under Civil Code 1895, § 4813 et seq., is tenancy or no tenancy, and the question of the plaintiff's title is not involved." The ruling above made renders it unnecessary to discuss the assignments of error in the motion for a new trial; each of them being involved in the question of the sufficiency of the plea of res adjudicata.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

MALONE v. MALONE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

TRUSTS (§§ 17, 18*)—EXPRESS TRUSTS—VALIDITY OF ORAL TRUSTS.

Emma Malone, as next friend of her six minor children by her deceased husband, James Malone, brought her equitable petition against Mary Malone, the mother of the decedent, alleging that he left at his death a policy of insurance upon his life, payable to the defendant; that the defendant had informed the petitioner that the insurance had been made payable to the defendant, with the understanding (to which defendant agreed) that she was to hold the proceeds as trustee for the minor children in the event of the death of the insured; that the defendant, while claiming no interest in the proceeds of the policy, proposed to use the interest from the fund to support the children, on certain stated conditions which constituted no part of the contract between decedent and the defendant; that there was no writing as to the terms of the agreement between decedent and his mother. Petitioner prayed that the court establish a trust in favor of the children in the proceeds of the policy of insurance. Held, that the petition sought to have an express trust declared in the absence of any writing creating or declaring the same; and the court properly sustained the general demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by Emma Malone, as next friend, against Mary Malone. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Emma Malone, as next friend of her six minor children, filed an equitable petition against Mary Malone, alleging as follows: James A. Malone, the husband of petitioner and father of said children, was a locomotive engineer. He died, leaving a policy of insurance on his life for $3,000 in the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and the same was payable to the defendant, who is the mother of James A. Malone. The defendant informed petitioner of defendant's exact situation, to wit, that the insurance had been made payable to defendant, with the understanding that she was to hold the proceeds as trustee for the children of James A. Malone in the event of his death; that the defendant's said son made defendant the trustee, rather than his wife, because he believed his mother was a better business manager than petitioner; and that defendant accepted said trust. The insurance money has not been collected, but the defendant has "proposed to put the same in bank when collected and pay the interest to the support of the said children of petitioner, and then only on condition that petitioner shall allow said Mary Malone to have control of said children and place them in a Roman Catholic convent in Savannah." Such conditions constituted no part of the contract between James A. Malone and Mary Malone. The principal of the insurance money will have to be encroached upon, from time to time, to support said children. Petitioner is unable herself to do so. She is prepared to work and do her best to support and maintain her children, but considers the demand made upon her to surrender them to the care of others is unnatural, and so foreign to any arrangement made between Mary Malone and James A. Malone as justifies petitioner in bringing her petition for the removal of defendant as trustee under the insurance policy. Petitioner knows of no written contract between her husband and his mother, and understands that there was nothing in writing as to the terms of the agreement between them.

The prayers are: For judgment establishing defendant's relation to said fund, lest, after her death, it be claimed that said fund is a part of defendant's individual estate; that the court establish a trust in favor of the children in the proceeds of the policy; that the use of said fund by the defendant be restrained; that a new trustee be appointed and required to give bond; and that such trustee, or the legal guardian of the children, be authorized to encroach upon the corpus of the fund for the support and maintenance of the children; and for general relief. By amendment it was alleged that, since filing the original petition, the proceeds of the policy had been collected by the defendant; that she was holding the same, pursuant to the understanding had with her son in his lifetime; and that she was refusing to aid petitioner in any way. A general demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiff excepted. The court retained in force the order restraining the defendant from disposing of the $3,000 until the judgment of the Supreme Court.

B. B. McCowen and W. K. Miller, for plaintiff in error. D. G. Fogarty and Hamilton Phinzy, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above). The headnote states the facts alleged which are material to the decision of the question of law raised by the general demurrer to the petition. Other facts, as appears from the foregoing statement, were alleged which might have been material in considering whether or not, had a trust been declared and decreed, of which the minor children of the plaintiff were the beneficiaries, the defendant should be removed from her office as trustee and another substituted, and whether the encroachment upon the corpus of the estate should be allowed, in view of all the circumstances set forth; but these additional facts became immaterial after it was determined that no trust had been created.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

SOUTHERN TITLE GUARANTEE CO. et al.
v. LAWSHE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 16, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. VENUE (§ 5*)—NATURE OF ACTION—CANCELLATION OF DEED.

An equitable petition to cancel deeds as a cloud on the plaintiff's title must be brought

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes in the county of the residence of a defendant against whom substantial relief is sought.

(a) The suit, as originally filed, was of this character.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

2. VENUE (§ 13*)—NATURE OF ACTION—CANCELLATION.

Amendments attaching an abstract of the deeds under which the plaintiff claimed, and alleging that the substantial defendant, which held a deed to secure a debt, and was proceeding to exercise a power of sale contained in it, had "no valid title to the land or lien thereon," and praying that "judgment be rendered adjudicating the title to the above-described lands to be in the plaintiff," did not change the suit into an action of ejectment or complaint for land, or authorize it to be tried in the county where the land lay.

(a) The mere proceeding to exercise the power to sell, contained in a deed to secure a loan, did not of itself constitute any such ouster or adverse possession as authorized the bringing of an action of ejectment.

(b) If the amended suit should be treated as an action of ejectment, or in the nature of ejectment, involving the title to land, so as to be tried in the county where the land lay, it was fatally defective in allegations, and was subject to dismissal on general demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Gordon County; A. W. Flite, Judge.

Action by Mrs. W. J. Lawshe against the Southern Title Guarantee Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Mrs. Willie J. Lawshe brought her suit in the superior court of Gordon county against the Southern Title Guarantee Company, a corporation having its principal office and place of business in Floyd county, with an agent in Gordon county, and against E. H. and C. E. Davis of Floyd county. She alleged, in brief, as follows: She is the owner of lots of land 52, 126, and 128 in the twenty-fifth district and third section of Gordon county, by grant from the state of Georgia to W. B. W. Dent, and from said Dent by will to the mother of plaintiff; plaintiff being the only heir of her mother. The Southern Title Guarantee Company advertised the land for sale at public outcry on the first Tuesday in May, 1909, under a pretended deed to secure a debt, with power of sale from E. H. and C. E. Davis, dated January 7, 1909, to secure an alleged note of $1,000, dated said date and due March 6, 1909, which deed was recorded April 19, 1909. The company, through its agent, intends to sell the land at public outcry, or by private sale, and is negotiating a private sale, when it has no title to the land or lien thereon. Defendants claim under a pretended deed from W. B. W. Dent to William Solomon, and from William Solomon to W. W. Ashburn, and from Ashburn to E. H. and C. E. Davis, and from said Davises to the Southern Title Guarantee Company. The deed herein referred to is spurious and invalid, and is a cloud upon plaintiff's title. Upon information and belief, plaintiff alleges that the deed from W. B. W. Dent to William Solomon, dated January 5, 1851, recorded December 21, 1907, in Book T of Deeds, page 382, in the clerk's office of the superior court, is a forgery. Plaintiff alleges that she was remediless at law, and prayed that the defendants be enjoined from selling, conveying, or mortgaging the land in controversy, or from granting any easement thereon; and that the deeds from Dent to Solomon, from Solomon to Ashburn, from Ashburn to the Davises, and from the Davises to the Southern Title Guarantee Company be declared null and void; and that they be canceled as clouds upon plaintiff's title; and for process and general relief.

The plaintiff filed three amendments to her petition. By the first, she attached as an exhibit an abstract of title "to the lands sued for," and alleged "that defendants claim title to said lands, although defendants have no valid title thereto or lien thereon," and added a prayer for a judgment adjudicating the title to the lands described in the plaintiff. By the second amendment, she alleged that she held the lands under certain muniments of title. By the third, she struck certain paragraphs of the original petition, alleging that the defendants claimed under certain deeds, which were spurious and invalid, and one of which was alleged, on information and belief, to be a forgery, and, in lieu thereof, alleged as follows: "That defendants have no valid claim of title to said lots, but the defendants claim under certain alleged, pretended deeds, which are spurious and invalid, and are clouds upon plaintiff's title."

The Southern Title Guarantee Company filed a demurrer, among other grounds, because the petition set forth no cause of action, and because it shows, on its face, that the superior court of Gordon county has no jurisdiction of the case, as none of the defendants against whom substantial relief is prayed reside in Gordon county, but are residents of Floyd county. All of the defendants filed their plea to the jurisdiction, in which they set up that they were not residents of Gordon county, but were residents of Floyd county; that they had never resided in Gordon county, nor did they have any agents who could accept service, or against whom substantial relief could be granted. The Davises alleged that they had no title to the property described in the petition, but that they had parted with the title, prior to the filing of the petition, by quitclaim deed. The defendants also filed an answer, in which they stated that it was done without waiving service, their plea to the jurisdiction, or their general or special demur-

ers. The court overruled the demurrer, the plea to the jurisdiction, and a motion made to continue the case on account of surprise; all of which rulings the defendants assigned as error. The court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, upon which judgment was entered, and the defendants excepted.

Geo. A. Coffee, for plaintiffs in error. Paul F. Akin and J. M. Lang, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. [1] From the report of facts, it will be seen at a glance that the original petition was equitable in its nature. The sole purpose was to cancel certain deeds as a cloud on the title of the plaintiff, to enjoin a sale under a power contained in a deed made to secure a debt, and for general relief. If it set out any cause of action at all, it was purely equitable in character. The mere allegation that the defendants "had no valid title to said land or lien thereon," and the prayer for process, did not make the case an action of ejectment. It appeared on the face of the petition that the substantial defendants resided in another county; and that there was no jurisdiction to try the case in the county where it was brought. Civil Code 1910, § 6540. The point was raised by demurrer and by plea to the jurisdiction. The defendants also filed an answer, in which it was stated that it was filed without waiving service, or their demurrer or plea to the jurisdiction. Both the plea and answer were verified on May 12, 1909. The entry of filing on the latter was dated June 15, 1910, "by order of the court." The entry on the former was dated June 21st. It was urged that this waived objection to the jurisdiction. If so as to the plea, the point was also made by the demurrer, which appears to have been urged before the answer was filed.

[2] Three amendments to the petition were filed, in the effort to confer jurisdiction on the court. By the first, the plaintiff alleged that she claimed under a certain chain of deeds. By the second, the plaintiff attached an abstract of title "to the land sued for," and alleged that "the defendants claim title to said lands, although defendants have no valid title thereto or lien thereon." It was also prayed that "judgment be rendered adjudicating the title to the above-described land to be in the plaintiff." By the third amendment, the plaintiff struck from the petition the allegations as to the chain of deeds terminating in that held by the defendant corporation, and alleged that the defendants had no valid chain of title to the lots, but claimed "under certain alleged pretended deeds, which are spurious and invalid, and are clouds upon the plaintiff's title."

It is contended that the action was one of ejectment, or its statutory equivalent; and, if not so originally, that it became so after the amendments were made. Primarily an action of ejectment was to recover land from one who held it wrongfully. We need not discuss what character or extent of ouster or adverse possession will authorize the bringing of an action of ejectment. Nor is it necessary to decide whether a purely equitable action can be brought in a county where there is no jurisdiction, and be amended into an action of complaint for land which could be properly brought here. We know of no law authorizing a plaintiff, who alleges that "she holds certain lands" under certain deeds, to bring a suit in a county where the land lies against a person who lives in another county, and who has no possession of the land, and has in no way ousted the plaintiff, and confer jurisdiction on the court of the former county by alleging that the defendant holds a deed to secure a debt; that his claim is not valid, and the plaintiff has a title which he would like to have declared good. This is not the meaning of the constitutional provision fixing the venue of actions, respecting titles to land, in the county where the land lies.

It is said that the defendant corporation is proceeding to exercise the power of sale contained in the security deed, and is in "constructive possession" of the land. A mere proceeding to exercise a power of sale contained in a deed to secure a debt is not alone such an ouster or adverse possession of the land as furnishes a basis for an action of ejectment. If the petition, as amended should be treated as in the nature of an action of ejectment, it was fatally defective.

The rule that in ejectment, lease, entry, and ouster must be admitted, which is invoked in behalf of the defendant in error, applies where there is an allegation of lease, entry, and ouster, or what is considered equivalent thereto, in a statutory form of action to recover land. It can hardly be contended that an action of ejectment would lie with no allegation of ouster, or that the consent rule would supply such a failure of allegation. And the rule that where there is a right there is a remedy, and the court having jurisdiction of the case will, if necessary, frame a remedy, which is also urged, cannot help the defendant in error, because here the court has no jurisdiction of the case. It should have been dismissed accordingly.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

Under Civil Code 1910, § 2563, a nonresident insurance company may be sued in the county where the company had an agent and place of doing business when the contract of insurance was made and the cause of action arose, although the company has abandoned its agency in that county and has no agent there at the time of the suit.

Evans, P. J. dissenting.

Certified Question from Court of Appeals.

Action by Beulah Peters, administratrix, against the Queen Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error to the Court of Appeals, which certifies certain questions to the Supreme Court. Questions answered.

The Court of Appeals certifies to the Supreme Court the following question of law:

"On October 30, 1909, a petition was filed in the city court of Moultrie against a non-resident insurance company, because of a loss which had been occasioned to the plaintiff, who was insured under one of its policies. The petition alleged that at the time the contract of insurance was made (October 29, 1908), and at the time the cause of action sued on arose (December 8, 1908), the defendant had an agent and an agency in Moultrie, in Colquitt county. Process was issued in usual form, directed to the sheriff of the city court of Moultrie. The sheriff made the following return of service: 'I have this day served the within papers by leaving a copy of the same at the place where was located the agency or place of doing business of said defendant company continuously from January 1, 1906, to December 14, 1908; said defendant company now having no agent or place of doing business in said county, the agency or place of doing business of said company at said time (January 1, 1906, to December 14, 1908) being located in the second story of the building known as the Moultrie Banking Company Building, corner of North Broad and West Broad streets, Moultrie, Ga., that being the place where said copy was by me so left as above stated. W. W. Boyd, Sheriff, City Court of Moultrie.' At the return term of the court the defendant specially appeared and moved to dismiss the action, for lack of jurisdiction as to either the case or the defendant, because it is not disclosed by the petition that at the time of the filing of the suit the defendant company had any agent or agency in the city of Moultrie or in the county of Colquitt; also because it appears from the return of the sheriff that the defendant company had no agent or agency or place of doing business in said city or in said county at the date the alleged service was made, or at any other date subsequent to December 14, 1908. Was the action subject to dismissal because of the facts set forth in the grounds of the motion?"

J. A. Wilkes and Shipp & Kline, for plaintiff in error. King, Spalding & Underwood, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. The act of 1861 providing for the situs of suits against insurance companies and the service of process in suits brought thereunder is codified in the Code of 1873 as follows: "Sec. 3408. Whenever any person may have any claim or demand upon any insurance company having agencies, or more than one place of doing business, it shall be lawful for such person or persons to institute suit against said insurance company within the county where the principal office of such company is located, or in any county where said insurance company may have an agency, or place of doing business, was located at the time the cause of action accrued, or the contract was made, out of which said cause of action arose." Section 3409 declared: "In all such suits, service shall be effected upon such insurance company by leaving a copy of the bill or writ with the agent of the company, if any; if no agent should be in the county, then at the agency or place of doing business, or where the same was located at the time such cause of action accrued, or the contract was made, out of which the same arose." These sections were construed in Empire State Ins. Co. v. Collins, 54 Ga. 376, wherein it was held that, "under sections 3408, 3409, of the Code, an action against an insurance company must be instituted in the county where its principal office is located or where it has an agency or place of doing business when suit is brought, and which agency or place of business was located in the county at the time the cause of action accrued, or the contract was made out of which the cause of action arose."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r indexes

This case was decided at the January term, 1875.

Subsequently section 3408 was amended by inserting between the word "business" and the word "was" the following "or in any county where such agency or place of doing business" (Acts 1878-79, p. 54), so that the section as amended would read as follows: "Whenever any person may have any claim or demand upon any insurance company having agencies, or more than one place of doing business, it shall be lawful for such person or persons to institute suit against said insurance company within the county where the principal office of such company is located, or in any county where said insurance company may have an agency or place of doing business, or in any county where such agency or place of doing business was located at the time the cause of action accrued, or the contract was made, out of which said cause of action arose." This amendment wrought a change in the original act. In the Collins Case the latter part of the section was construed in conjunction with the former, so that in order to locate the venue of the suit there must be an agency or place of doing business at the time the suit was brought, and this agency or place of doing business must have been located in such county at the time of the accrual of the cause of action or the making of the contract.

[1, 2] By the amendment suits against an insurance company having an agency or more than one place of doing business may be located (1) in counties where the principal office of such company is located; or (2) in any county where the company may have an agency or place of doing business; or (3) in any county where such agency or place of doing business was located at the time the cause of action accrued; or (4) in any county where such company had an agency or place of doing business at the time when the contract was made out of which the cause of action arose. Though this act was in existence at the time the case of Atlanta Home Ins. Co. v. Tullis, 99 Ga. 225, 25 S. E. 401, was decided, no reference was made to it in the decision, and the court followed the ruling pronounced in the Collins Case. Inasmuch as no reference was made to the amending act of 1879, this decision is not to be accepted as a construction of that act. Except as amended by the acts of 1902 (Acts 1902, p. 53), substituting the word "agent" for "agency," sections 3408, 3409 of the Code of 1873, as amended by the act of 1879, are codified in the present Civil Code, §§ 2563, 2564, with some immaterial verbal changes.

[3] No constitutional infirmity is raised in the record as to that part of the act which allows a suit to be located in a county where the contract was written, or cause of action accrued, without respect to the company's having an agent or place of doing business there at the time the suit is instituted; nor is any constitutional objection urged against the provision that, if no agent should be in the county, the process in the suit brought under this section may be served where the agent or place of doing business was located at the time the cause of action accrued, or the contract was made, out of which the same arose. This court is committed by numerous precedents to the proposition that a constitutional question must be made in the court below, before this court will undertake to pass upon it. Whatever may have been done sometimes in particular cases, or whatever may be the practice in courts of error in some other jurisdictions, this is the rule laid down by the decisions of this court. Sanders Mfg. Co. v. Dollar Savgs. Bank, 110 Ga. 559 (3), 35 S. E. 777; Roberts v. Keeler, 111 Ga. 185, 36 S. E. 617; Laffitte v. Burke, 113 Ga. 1001, 39 S. E. 433; Sayer v. Brown, 119 Ga. 539 (3), 46 S. E. 649; Newkirk v. Sou. Ry. Co., 120 Ga. 1048, 48 S. E. 426; Carswell v. Wright, 133 Ga. 714 (4), 66 S. E. 905; Cooper v. Natl. Gert. Co., 132 Ga. 529, 64 S. E. 650, and many others. Indeed, Civil Code 1910, § 6203, declares that "the Supreme Court shall not decide any question unless it is made by a special assignment of error in the bill of exceptions," etc. Unless we hold this section of the Code unconstitutional, it is conclusive of the question. At any rate, it indicates a concurrence between the legislative and judicial views on this question. Thus by repeated decisions of this court the rule is firmly fixed as to cases coming before us upon writs of error.

Is the case different as to questions certified to the Supreme Court by the Court of Appeals? In the amendment to the Constitution, establishing the Court of Appeals and declaring its jurisdiction and practice, a rule is prescribed as to this matter. Civil Code 1910, § 6506 (codifying a portion of this amendment), contains the following provisions on the subject of the certification of questions by the Court of Appeals to this court: "Where, in a case pending in the Court of Appeals, a question is raised as to the construction of a provision of the Constitution of this state or of the United States, or as to the constitutionality of an act of the General Assembly of this state, and a decision of the question is necessary to the determination of the case, the Court of Appeals shall so certify to the Supreme Court; and thereupon a transcript of the record shall be transmitted to the Supreme Court, which, after having afforded to the parties an opportunity to be heard thereon, shall instruct the Court of Appeals on the question so certified, and the Court of Appeals shall be bound by the instruction so given. * * * The Court of Appeals may at any time certify to the Supreme Court any other question of law concerning which it desires the instruction of the Supreme Court for proper decision; and thereupon the Supreme Court shall give its instruction on the question certified to it, which shall be binding on the Court of Appeals in such case." It will be seen that by this amendment to the Constitutional provision was made for the Court of Appeals to certify to this court two classes of questions: (1) Constitutional questions; (2) any other questions on which they may desire instruction. As to constitutional questions, it specifies a question raised in a case in the Court of Appeals, and which is necessary for the decision of the case there, and provides that that court shall so certify to this court. The "other" questions mentioned evidently referred to questions other than such constitutional questions, for which special provision had been made. To hold that, on a general question of the Court of Appeals making no reference to any constitutional question, this court would search the Constitution to determine whether any conflict between it and the act of the Legislature under consideration could be found, would, we think, conflict with the whole spirit of our decisions, as well as with the manifest intention of the Constitution itself.

As the record does not disclose any constitutional attack made upon these Code sections, and as the Court of Appeals has asked no instruction on that subject, we cannot interpret them to mean anything other than what is clearly expressed. We therefore answer the question propounded by the Court of Appeals in the negative. All the Justices concur, except EVANS, P. J., dissenting, and HILL, J., not presiding.

EVANS, P. J. (dissenting). I agree with my Associates as to the construction to be given to the statute fixing the venue of suits against insurance companies and providing for the service of process of suits brought under the statute. But I cannot concur with them that, in answer to a question of law from the Court of Appeals, the law as it is written in a statute, however it may palpably collide with the Constitution of the state, must control the case, in the absence of a direct attack on the statute made in the bill of exceptions to the Court of Appeals. It was written in the first Constitution of Georgia, and repeated in all subsequent ones, that it is the duty of the courts to declare void all legislative enactments which contravene the Constitution. Obediently to this mandate, the Supreme Court in its early history adjudicated the constitutionality of statutes without so much as a reference of antagonism between the act and the Constitution being contained in bills of exceptions. Later on the practice grew up to allege in the assignments of error that the act was unconstitutional, without stating the particular clause of the Constitution which the act was alleged to offend. Finally the practice culminated into a rule of procedure that the Supreme Court would not decide a constitutional point, unless the point was passed on by the trial court, and in raising the point the particular constitutional provision alleged to have been violated by the act was specifically indicated. The rationale of this rule is, as I apprehend it, that the Supreme Court was established to review errors of law committed in the trial court; and unless the conflict of a statute and the Constitution is urged in the trial court, and the ruling duly excepted to, this court will not undertake to pass upon a question not made in the trial court.

Whether I am right or wrong in my analysis of the basal support of the rule, I am fully persuaded that neither the formula of its pronouncement nor the spirit of its essence requires its application to certified questions of law from the Court of Appeals. The Constitution was amended about seven years ago by the establishment of the Court of Appeals, which court was given exclusive jurisdiction within a limited sphere. In order to avoid conflict of decisions, it was provided that the Court of Appeals was bound by the precedents of the Supreme Court. It was further provided that the Court of Appeals should not pass on the constitutionality of any statute, but if a statute was attacked as unconstitutional, and exception was taken to the ruling of the trial court thereon, that the Court of Appeals should certify such constitutional question to the Supreme Court for decision. It was further provided that the Court of Appeals might certify any question of law to the Supreme Court, and must follow the law as enunciated by the Supreme Court in answer to the question. In determining the question of law certified by the Court of Appeals, this court is not reviewing the judgment either of the Court of Appeals or of the trial court. It is simply deciding the law question submitted to it by the Court of Appeals. If the law question is submitted in a concrete form, and its solution involves the consideration of two statutes apparently conflicting, it is our duty to decide on the operation of each. The question cannot be answered without doing this. If subsequently to the passage of the statute under consideration the General Assembly had passed an act declaring that all insurance companies having agents in this state must be sued in a county where an agency is located, would it not be our duty to pass upon the repugnancy of such a statute to the one sub judice, and decide which one is to control? If a statute be in opposition to the Constitution, and if both the statute and the Constitution apply to the particular case, so that the court must either decide the case according to the Constitution or according to the statute, which is to control? If the courts are to regard the Constitution as superior to the statute, where both apply, then the Constitution must control the case. So I conclude that when the Court of Appeals inquires of this court the legal effect of certain facts, and a statute in opposition to the Constitution and the Constitution both apply to the facts, and either the statute or the Constitution must control the decision, then it is the duty of this court to reject the statute and give full force and effect to the Constitution.

The Constitution requires that a defendant must be sued in the county of his residence. An insurance company may not necessarily be a corporation; but, whether such company is a partnership or a corporation, it can be sued only in the county of its residence, if a judgment in personam is sought. It is competent for the General Assembly to enact that an insurance corporation of its own creation may be located for purposes of suit as a resident of each county where it has an agent or agency. But it would not be competent for the Legislature to override the Constitution and enact that a domestic insurance company is suable in a county where it had neither agent nor place of doing business at the time of the suit. All citizens of the United States, including corporations, are guaranteed the equal protection of the laws, and where foreign and domestic corporations are doing business in this state by means of agents, the law providing for the situs of suits where in personam judgments are sought must apply to both alike. Furthermore, that provision of the Code section which provides for service of process on a former place of business in a suit instituted in a county where the defendant has neither agent nor place of business clashes with the due process clause of our Constitution. I will not undertake to elaborate upon the unconstitutional feature of the statute, because that point is not reached in the difference between my Brethren and myself. I am firmly of the opinion that the answer to the question of the Court of Appeals should be that the case in the city court of Moultrie should be dismissed.

UNITED STATES CASUALTY CO. v.
NEWMAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

INSURANCE (§ 627*)—ACTION ON POLICY—
SERVICE OF PROCESS.

Under the circumstances contained in the recital of facts made by the Court of Appeals in propounding the question as to which it desires instructions by this court, the city court of La Grange had not acquired such jurisdiction of the defendant as would authorize it to proceed to try this action and to render a judgment against the defendant therein.

Certified Question from Court of Appeals.

Action by J. D. Newman against the United States Casualty Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals to the Court of Appeals, which certifies a certain question to the Supreme Court. Question answered.

The Court of Appeals certifies to this court for its instruction thereon the following question of law, the determination of which is deemed necessary to a proper decision of the above-stated case:

"On July 28, 1909, the plaintiff in error, which is a nonresident insurance company, had an agency at La Grange, in Troup county, and W. C. Ford, of said county, was the agent in charge of said agency, and continued as such throughout the year 1909. On said date, and at said place, and through said agent, said company issued its policy insuring one H. W. Newman against death from certain accidental causes; the defendant in error being named as the beneficiary. On December 17, 1909, while said policy was in effect, said H. W. Newman was accidentally killed in a way by which it is alleged that the company became liable on said policy. (For the purpose of this question, the liability of the insurance company on the policy is to be taken as existing.) On February 21, 1910, Mrs. Newman (the defendant in error) filed an action on said policy in the city court of La Grange. The clerk of that court on that day issued process in usual form, returnable to the March term of the court. On February 24, 1910, the sheriff of that court made return that he had served the defendant by serving 'W. C. Ford, their agent, personally' with a copy of the writ. The clerk also issued a second original and process addressed to the sheriff of Fulton county and his deputies (no order of court directing the issuance of this second original is shown); and on February 24, 1910, a deputy sheriff of Fulton county made return that he had served the defendant by personally serving 'John H. Mullin, the agent and attorney designated by said defendant upon whom service can be made.' At the appearance term the defendant traversed the return of service which had been made by the sheriff of Troup county, and set up that on the day when the service was made Ford was not its agent, and occupied no relationship to it which would make service on him effectual as against the defendant, and that it had no agent in Troup county on that date. The defendant also specially appeared and moved to dismiss the action on the ground that service had not been legally perfected, because the service on Ford was ineffectual, as he was not its agent; and service in Fulton county on its agent Mullin was nugatory, as there was no authority of law for the making of that service, nor for the issuance of the second original and process directed to the sheriff of Fulton county and his deputies. Said Mullin was, at the time the suit was filed and the service made, a resident of Fulton county, in charge of an agency of the defendant company in Atlanta, in that county, and had been designated by the company as its agent to acknowledge service on suits and as agent upon whom service might be perfected, as is required by law. The traverse as to the service on Ford was sustained; and as a matter of fact it is stated, as a part of this question, that W. C. Ford was agent for the defendant company up to December 31, 1909, when his agency terminated, and that since that date the defendant company has not had an agent or agency in Troup county. Under the facts recited, did the city court of La Grange have such jurisdiction of the defendant as to authorize it to proceed to try said action and to render judgment against the defendant therein?"

BECK, J. In case of suit against a non-resident insurance company under the facts and circumstances set forth in the foregoing statement of the facts preliminary to the question in regard to which the Court of Appeals has asked the instructions of this court, under the decision in the case of Peters v. Queen Insurance Company, 73 S. E. 664, this day decided, the method of perfecting service by process is pointed out by the statute. Under the provisions of section 2563 of the Civil Code the city court of La Grange had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the defendant, inasmuch as the defendant had an agency at La Grange, in said county, at the time of the execution of the contract sued on. The person who was the agent of the company at the time of the execution of the contract had ceased to represent the defendant company as its agent prior to the bringing of this suit. Consequently service upon him of the process was entirely nugatory. The method of service in the case as it stood at the time of bringing the suit is clearly pointed out in Civil Code, § 2564, and could be effected by leaving a copy of the original suit and process at the agency or place of doing business of the company at the time of making the contract out of which said suit arose. Inasmuch as the statute provides, under the decision which we have referred to above, a plain method of perfecting service in the county where the suit was brought, there was no necessity or authority for the issuance of the second original for service upon a person resident in another county, who had been designated by the defendant company as its agent and attorney upon whom service could be made. The necessity which the court recognized in the case of Devereux v. Atlanta Ry. & Power Co., 111 Ga. 855, 36 S. E. 939, as a ground for the court's exercising a power to take proper steps to have service made, because of a lack of a provision in the statute for the same, did not exist here. It was not necessary for the court or its officers to travel out of the statute in order to assert its jurisdiction by causing its process to be served on an officer or agent of the defendant in person.

Inasmuch as there was no service in the one way provided for in the section of the Code last cited, and the only way in which, under the circumstances set forth in the recital of facts preliminary to the submission of the question by the Court of Appeals, service could be effected, the court had not acquired such jurisdiction of the person of the defendant as would authorize it to proceed with the trial of the suit, and the question of the Court of Appeals must therefore be answered in the negative. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

EVANS, P. J. I specially concur in the judgment. My views on the subject appear in my dissent in the case of Peters v. Queen Insurance Co., referred to in the opinion.

J. B. CARR & CO. v. WITT et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 11, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PLEADING (§ 224*)—DEMURRER—DECISION—CONSTRUCTION.

The plaintiffs filed their petition against the Metropolitan Amusement Company and Carl Witt, alleging that they had entered into a contract with the Amusement Company for the improvement of a certain building located on a lot belonging to Carl Witt; that petitioners, who were general contractors, had, "in addition to the original contract, furnished material and labor for the improvement of the building," amounting to a stated sum; that the Amusement Company paid a part of their obligation growing out of the contract, but a balance is still due petitioners; that "while said contract for the improvement of said premises was entered into between petitioners and Metropolitan Amusement Company, said contract was ratified and assented to by Carl Witt, who was at the time of the execution of said contract, and now is, the owner of the above-described property." Plaintiffs in due time filed and had recorded their claim of lien for the improvement of the property, embracing in their claim the lot of land and the original building thereon, alleged to be the property of Carl Witt. Witt filed general and special demurrers to the petition. The court sustained the general demurrer, and passed the following order: "The general grounds of the demurrer are sustained, and the petition is dismissed, on the ground that the facts stated in the petition do not make a case against Carl Witt, or establish a lien against his property, or his property as described in the petition. Special demurrers are not passed upon." Held, that the general order passed by the court had the effect of dismissing the case as to Carl Witt and his property, and did not affect the right of petitioners to prosecute the suit to judgment against the other defendant, if, under the facts stated in the petition, they could proceed with the suit against that defendant.

2. MECHANICS' LIENS (§§ 73, 271, 275*) — RIGHT TO LIEN—ENFORCEMENT—PLEADING.

The general demurrer of Carl Witt to the petition was properly sustained.

(a) A contractor, furnishing material and making improvements under a contract with a tenant upon the land occupied by the tenant, does not thereby acquire a lien as against the owner of the land, although the owner, with knowledge of the contract between the tenant and the contractor, consented that the improvements be made.

(b) The allegation that Carl Witt "ratified and assented to the contract" means nothing more than that Carl Witt gave his consent that the improvements should be made under the contract between the tenant and the contractor, and does not mean that he adopted the contract as one made for him by the tenant acting as his agent, so as to bring him into contractual relations with the contractor making the improvements and furnishing the material. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. Peters Land Co., 123 Ga. 723, 51 S. E. 725; Cent. of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Shiver, 125 Ga. 218, 53 S. E. 610.

GEORGE W. MUELLER MFG. CO. v. BENTON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 84*)—SALES OF GOODS—NATURE OF CONTRACT.

Independently of the correspondence by mail between the parties, the contract for the purchase of the goods involved in this case fell within the provisions of the statute of frauds, relative to the purchase of goods and wares amounting to $50 or more.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Dec. Dig. § 84.*]

2. SALES (§ 22*)—VALIDITY—CORRESPONDENCE—OFFER AND ACCEPTANCE.

The correspondence between the parties through the mails failed to show an offer of the seller, accepted by the purchaser unequivocally, unconditionally, and without variance, and that assent to the same thing, in the same sense, which is essential to a complete and binding contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 39-43; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 271*)—DECLARATIONS—SELF-SERVING DECLARATIONS.

The letters written by the plaintiff to the defendant, which were excluded from the evidence, contained nothing which could strengthen the incomplete contract between the parties, being in the nature of self-serving declarations made by the plaintiff to the defendant after the close of the correspondence, so far as defendant was concerned, relative to the purchase of the personal property in question; and they were properly repelled, when offered in evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1068-1079, 1081-1104; Dec. Dig. § 271.*]

4. NONSUIT.

The case was properly nonsuited.

Error from Superior Court, Jasper County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by the George W. Mueller Manufacturing Company against L. O. Benton. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

A. S. Thurman, for plaintiff in error. Greene F. Johnson, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. George W. Mueller Manufacturing Company sued L. O. Benton for $175, the price of certain secondhand bank fixtures which the plaintiff claimed were sold to the defendant for the Planters' & Merchants' Bank, of Warrenton, Ga. At the conclusion of the evidence introduced by the plaintiff, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was granted by the court, on the ground that there was never a complete contract; that the minds of the parties did not meet as to the exact terms of the sale. To this ruling, the plaintiff sued out a bill of exceptions.

[1] 1. Up to the interchange of the letters embraced in the correspondence between Benton and the plaintiff company, the contract for the sale of the goods in question was clearly within the statute of frauds. The subject-matter of the contract was the sale of certain goods to the amount of more than $50, and no part of the goods was delivered and received, and nothing had been given in part payment or in earnest to bind the bargain. The contract up to the time referred to rested entirely in parol, and was not binding on either of the parties, even though both understood clearly what goods were embraced in the contract and the terms relative to payment. Civil Code, §3222, subd. 7.

[2] 2. But we have to consider whether or not the correspondence that ensued between the alleged vendor and purchaser made a complete contract for the sale of the goods. On February 28, 1907, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant that, having reference to the set of bank fixtures as to the purchase of which negotiations had been had, the former understood the latter to say that he was willing to pay $175 for them as they were, adding: "If this is the case, please advise us at once and send your check for same, as we will crate the fixtures and hold them for you until you are ready to have them shipped." Prompt attention to the matter was requested. On the same date, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff, the two letters crossing in the mail, as follows: "Referring to my conversation with you, relative to the secondhand fixtures, beg to advise that I accept your proposition for $175, and will send you shipping instructions in the near future." Seven days later the plaintiff wrote to the defendant, as follows: "We acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 28th ult., which crossed our letter of same date to you, regarding secondhand fixtures. Please send us your check for the amount of $175, and we will crate the fixtures and store them for you until you are ready to have them shipped. Or, give us authority to draw on you for that amount."

There appears in the correspondence an unsigned letter in the following terms: "Dear Sir: I will remit you when I return home for the other fixtures bought of you. The board of directors will want to buy a directors' table for this bank; and you may send them prices and cuts of same, if you have any cuts on hand." Under date of March 28, 1907, there appears the following from defendant to plaintiff: "Please ship out at once to Warrenton, Ga., the $175.00 set of bank fixtures which I bought for that bank, and oblige." Two days later plaintiff replied to this as follows: "We have your letter of the 28th, saying for us to ship at once the Warrenton Bank the fixtures which you bought for $175.00. If you remember correctly, you promised to send Mr. Krueger, our secretary, a check for this amount. Do so, and on receipt of same we will be pleased to crate and ship these fixtures at once."

On April 1, 1907, defendant sent this inquiry to plaintiff: "In reply to your letter attached, I wish to inquire if you refuse to ship the fixtures purchased unless we pay for same in advance of shipment? This demand has never been made on me or on any of our banks before by any one; and if made by you in this case, you should explain yourself." Plaintiff answered the letter of inquiry thus: "Dear Sir: We herewith acknowledge receipt of your favor of the 1st from Adrian, Ga., and in reply we wish to say that you will remember in former letter from you, you advised us that you were going to send your check some time ago, for the $175.00. But we have not received same, and we ask that you let same come forward. You know exactly what you bought and the condition of the fixtures, and we would like to deal with you direct in this matter. We will crate the fixtures and ship to the Warrenton Bank as directed; but we do not know but that these people, after receiving their fixtures, will have all kinds of complaints regarding these fixtures and may not want to pay purchase-price, giving all kinds of excuses. For that reason, we shall ask you to send us your check direct and have the Warrenton Bank to make settlement with you for the fixtures." Then follows a letter from J. C. Evans, cashier of the bank at Warrenton, to the plaintiff, under date of April 9th, and the answer of the plaintiff company to Evans, in the following words:

"Warrenton, Ga., 4/9/1907.

"Messrs. Geo. W. Mueller Co., Atlanta, Ga.—Dear Sirs: Mr. Benton advises me that he has bought the fixtures for Planters' & Merchants' Bank, Warrenton, Ga., from you. We are now ready for same. Can you give us any promise as to when we may expect them? Yours truly, J. C. Evans, Cashier."

"April 11, 1907.

"Mr. J. C. Evans, Cashier, Planters' & Merchants' Bank, Warrenton, Ga.—Dear Sir: Replying to yours of the 9th in reference to the secondhand fixtures bought by Mr. L. O. Benton, we wish to say we will make shipment of same not later than day after tomorrow. Trusting this will be satisfactory, we are, yours very truly, G. W. Mueller Mfg. Co."

On the day following the last letter, the plaintiff wrote the defendant as follows: "Enclosed we hand you B/Lading of shipment of fixtures bought for the Planters' & Merchants' Bank, Warrenton, Ga. Please send us N. Y. exchange of purchase price $175." And under date of April 15th plaintiff wrote the defendant that, having had a letter from the bank instructing them to ship the fixtures at once, they had been shipped as per instructions and invoice and bill of lading sent to defendant, for which they requested a check from the defendant. Thereupon, under date of April 19th, the defendant wrote, saying: "I am somewhat surprised at your favor of the 12th inst., enclosing B/L for fixtures shipped to Planters' & Merchants' Bank at Warrenton, Ga. I have your letter in which you absolutely refused to ship them until you first had in hand my check to cover them; and upon receipt of this letter, we began to figure on other fixtures. Mr. Evans of Warrenton left early this week for Talladega, Ala., to see the set down there, and will return by Columbus, Ga. I have not heard from him yet as to what he did. He will in all probability buy either the Talladega set or at Columbus. In the meantime, however, I will endeavor to place the set shipped Warrenton elsewhere."

Plaintiff then tendered in evidence certain letters written by plaintiff to the defendant after the shipment of the goods to the bank at Warrenton, requesting payment for the goods, calling attention to their former correspondence, requesting remittance in payment of the purchase price, asking for explanation as to why the defendant did not honor certain drafts, and stating that "legal steps" would be taken, unless payment be made; also a letter from the plaintiff to the agent of the Georgia Railroad, acknowledging receipt of a notice of a return shipment of 16 pieces of old bank fixtures from Warrenton, Ga., by the Merchants' & Planters' Bank, and giving notice that the plaintiff company refused to accept this shipment.

[3] The court refused to admit in evidence the letters by the plaintiff company to the defendant subsequently to the date on which the shipment of the bank fixtures was made to Warrenton, except the letters of April 12th and 15th, as hereinabove set forth; and this ruling is assigned as error. We think, however, that these letters were properly excluded. As between the plaintiff and the defendant, the rights of the parties (that is, of the plaintiff to demand payment and the liability of the defendant to make payment) were to be considered and determined in the light of the facts and circumstances as they existed at the time of the shipment of the bank fixtures to Warrenton, Ga., upon receipt by the plaintiff of the letter from Evans, cashier, hereinabove set out. Mere statements in letters of the plaintiff's understanding of the contract and demands by him on the defendant, and threats of legal procedure, though made to the defendant himself, could not create any liability on the part of the defendant, in the absence of anything to show that the defendant made any further statements or agreement upon his part. We must look to the correspondence, and decide from the contents, of the various letters whether there was a contract for the sale and purchase of the goods between the parties to this case.

A careful reading of these letters will show that there was not such a meeting of minds as to the terms of the sale and payment for the goods as would constitute a complete contract. It will be observed that the plaintiff insisted in the various letters to Benton that he should send his check in payment for the goods; and that the plaintiff would then crate and set aside the goods subject to his order. If these demands for a check as the condition precedent to the setting aside of the goods, subject to Benton's order, mean anything, they indicate that the plaintiff continued to insist that payment in advance was a condition precedent to the completion of the sale. While a contract can be made by correspondence through mail, as well as when the parties are together, the same rules applying in either case, in order to make a binding contract, the offer of the seller must be accepted by the purchaser unequivocally, unconditionally, and without variance of any sort. There must be a mutual assent of the parties thereto, and they must assent to the same thing in the same sense. An absolute acceptance of a proposal, coupled with a condition, will not be a complete contract. Robinson v. Weller, 81 Ga. 704, 8 S. E. 447; 9 Cyc. 267. In the case just cited, it was held that, when a party living in Chattanooga, Tenn., proposed to sell a certain lot of land which he owned in Rome, Ga., and the owner of the land wrote to the party in Rome that she would accept a certain amount for the property in question, one-third cash and the balance on time, "her offer meant that she would accept the cash and make deed to the purchaser in Chattanooga; and when such other party wrote, accepting her offer, and saying that the money was ready at Rome, and directing her to send the deeds to Rome, it was not a full acceptance of the offer she had made, and therefore was not a complete contract."

[4] We have no hesitancy in holding in the present case that, certainly up to the date of the shipment of the goods on the order of Evans, cashier, to Warrenton, there was no complete contract for their sale and purchase between the plaintiff and defendant. And we are equally clear that the act of shipping to the bank at Warrenton, upon the order of another agent of the bank than Benton, would not give binding effect to the inchoate contract between Benton and the plaintiff, so as to render Benton liable. When the correspondence between Benton, whom the plaintiff is seeking to make liable as an individual, terminated, the plaintiff company was, as we have seen above, still insisting on a check being sent them in advance of a delivery of the goods, and Benton was refusing to send the check in advance, and asking that they explain such a demand. Benton stopped there in his negotiations for the purchase of the property. Pay in advance he would not; and his last advice from the plaintiff, until he was informed that upon the order of another the goods had been shipped, was that the plaintiff would go no further. Under these circumstances, we do not think that he became at any time individually liable for the purchase price of the goods in question, and the court below did not err in so deciding.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

COOK v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 22, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. STATUTES (§ 124)—SUBJECTS AND TITLES—COURTS.

The act approved August 15, 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 201), entitled "An act to abolish the city court of Newton, to provide for the disposition of business pending in said court, and for other purposes," is not violative of paragraph 8, § 7, art. 3, of the Constitution of this state, on the ground that it contains matter different from that which is expressed in the title thereof, because it provides that such act shall not become operative until an election shall be held and a majority of the qualified voters of the county of Baker (in which Newton is located) shall vote in favor of the abolition of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 133, 184-186; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

2. STATUTES (§ 154*)—REPEAL—REFERENCE TO ACT REPEALED.

The act mentioned in the preceding head-note is not violative of article 3, § 7, par. 17, of the state Constitution, which provides, "No law, or section of the Code, shall be amended or repealed by mere reference to its title, or to the number of the section of the Code, but the amending or repealing act shall distinctly describe the law to be amended or repealed, as well as the alteration to be made," on the ground that it abolishes the city court of Newton without distinctly describing the act which created that court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 221; Dec. Dig. § 154.*]

3. STATUTES (§ 47*)—VALIDITY—INDEFINITENESS—ABOLITION OF COURT.

The act above mentioned is nugatory and ineffectual to abolish the city court of Newton, on the ground that it fails to provide "how the election therein mentioned shall be held, who shall hold it, and to whom the returns of the election shall be made, and whose duty it shall be to declare the result of the election."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 47; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

Lumpkin and Hill, JJ., dissenting in part.

Certified Questions from Court of Appeals.

Leroy Cook was convicted of crime, and brings error. Heard on questions certified by the Court of Appeals. Questions answered.

The Court of Appeals certified to the Supreme Court the following questions:

(1) "Is the act approved August 15, 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 201), entitled 'An act to abolish the city court of Newton, to provide for the disposition of business pending in said court, and for other purposes,' violative of paragraph 8, § 7, art. 3, of the Constitution of Georgia, in that it refers to matter different from that which is expressed in the title thereof, for the alleged reason that the following matter is contained in the body of the act: 'Provided, the provisions of this act shall become of full force and effect only when ratified by a majority of the votes cast by the qualified voters of Baker county at an election to be held for the purpose of submitting the provisions of this act to the qualified voters of Baker county for their approval, which said election shall be held on the same date as the general election of state officers of Georgia is held; and those who wish to cast ballots for the provisions of this bill shall do so by casting ballots having written or printed upon them the words 'Against the city court of Newton,' and those who wish to cast ballots in favor of the city court of Newton and against the provisions of this bill shall do so by casting ballots having written or printed on them the words 'For the city court of Newton'? It is contended by the plaintiff in error that this matter is different from what is expressed in the title."

(2) "Is said act violative of article 3, par. 17, of the Constitution of this state, which provides, 'No law, or section of the Code, shall be amended or repealed by mere reference to its title, or to the number of the section of the Code, but the amending or repealing act shall distinctly describe the law to be amended or repealed, as well as the alteration to be made,' because it undertakes to repeal the act creating the city court of Newton without distinctly describing that act?"

3. "The instruction of the Supreme Court is also desired as to the following question of law involved in the decision of said case: Is said act nugatory and ineffectual to abolish the city court of Newton, because it fails to provide how the election therein mentioned 'shall be held, who shall hold it, and to whom the returns of the election shall be made, and whose duty it shall be to declare the result of said election,' or because no returns of said election were made to the ordinary of Baker county, or because the ordinary of Baker county has not declared the result of said election?"

W. I. Geer, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Wooten, Sol. Gen., and F. A. Hooper, for the State.

FISH, C. J. [1] 1. The extent to which the title must go in describing or outlining the act, and the fact that mere incidents or details forming a part of the general purpose of the act are not required to be mentioned in the title, has been the subject of frequent discussions by this court. Nolan v. Cent. Ga. Power Co., 134 Ga. 201, 205, 87 S. E. 656; Dollar v. Wind, 135 Ga. 760, 765, 70 S. E. 335; Stanley v. State, 135 Ga. 859, 864, 70 S. E. 591, and citations in those cases. It only remains to apply the principle of those decisions to the case now in hand. This is practically controlled by the ruling in McGruder v. State, 83 Ga. 616, 10 S. E. 281. We therefore answer the first question propounded by the Court of Appeals in the negative.

[2] 2. While in one or two opinions rendered shortly after the adoption of the Constitution of 1877 some doubt was expressed as to whether, under the terms of that instrument, there could be a repeal of a law or a part of a law by implication arising from the passage of another law inconsistent with it (Cent. Railroad v. Hamilton, 71 Ga. 461; Montgomery v. Board of Education of Richmond County, 74 Ga. 41), it has since been determined that article 3, par. 17, of the Constitution, does not prohibit such repeals by implication, although it has been declared that, to work that result, the inconsistency must be plain. Swift v. Van Dyke, 98 Ga. 725, 26 S. E. 59; Collins v. Russell, 107 Ga. 428, 33 S. E. 444; Verdery v. Walton, 137 Ga. —, 73 S. E. 390. The second question, therefore, is also answered in the negative.

[3] 3. The act in question declares, in the first section thereof, "that on and after, the first day of January, 1911, the city court of Newton, in the county of Baker, be and the same is hereby abolished." In the beginning of the second section of the act it is declared that all records, papers, books, etc., of such court, and all cases both civil and criminal that may be pending therein at the time the act goes into effect, shall be transferred to the superior court of Baker county. Then follows this language: "Provided, the provisions of this act shall become of full force and effect only when ratified by a majority of the votes cast by the qualified voters of Baker county at an election to be held for the purpose of submitting the provisions of this act to the qualified voters of Baker county for their approval, which said election shall be held on the same date as the general election of state officers of Georgia is held; and those who wish to cast ballots for the provisions of this bill shall do so by casting ballots having written or printed upon them the words 'Against the city court of Newton,' and those who wish to cast ballots in favor of the city court of Newton and against the provisions of this bill shall do so by casting ballots having written or printed on them the words 'For the city court of Newton.'" Is this act, in the language of the third question propounded to this court by the Court of Appeals, "nugatory and ineffectual to abolish the city court of Newton, because it fails to provide how an election therein mentioned 'shall be held, who shall hold it, and to whom the returns of the election shall be made, and whose duty it shall be to declare the result of said election?'" As will be seen, the act fixes the date for the election and the qualification of the voters thereat, as well as the forms of the ballots to be cast, and declares that the act shall become a law if ratified by a majority of the votes cast at the election. There are, however, no provisions whatever in the act as to how the election shall be held, or who shall hold it, or to whom the returns shall be made, or who shall declare the result. Was it the intention of the General Assembly, in passing the act, that the election should be held in connection with, and as a part of, the general election for state officers, and by the managers of such election, and that the returns should be canvassed and the result of the election be declared in accordance with the law relating to general elections? Or was the intention that the election referred to in the act, though to be held on the same date as the general election for state officers, should be held by other persons than the managers of such general election, and at different polling places, and that the canvass of the returns should be made and the result declared in a way different from the provisions relating to such matters in the general election for state officers? There is absolutely nothing in the act which enables us to satisfactorily answer either of these questions.

We cannot believe that the first inquiry we have just stated should be answered in the affirmative, as the holding of the two elections by the same managers, at the same time, would necessarily bring about serious confusion and complication, and the fate of the court might be materially affected by the candidacy of one or more of those running for office, or, on the other hand, the fate of a candidate might depend on his stand for or against the court. If, on the other hand, the purpose of the act was that a separate election should be held as to the abolishment of the court, we are at a loss to say who should appoint the managers, how the returns should be canvassed, and by whom the result should be declared. There is nothing in the act to indicate that the returns should be made to the ordinary of the county, or that he should declare the result; nor is there anything tending to show that the returns should be made to the board of commissioners of the county, and that they should declare the result. Nor are we aware of any general law authorizing the returns of such special election to be made either to the ordinary or to the board of commissioners, and giving either the power of declaring the result of such election. It is true that the act establishing the board of commissioners for Baker county (Acts 1908, p. 270) gives the power to the board to establish and change election precincts and militia districts, to supply by appointment all vacancies in county offices, and to order elections to fill them, and to supervise county matters. None of these powers, however, is broad enough to authorize the board to appoint managers for the special election referred to in the act under discussion, nor to declare the result of such election, nor to prescribe rules as to whom the returns shall be made, and who shall declare the result.

In Jacoby v. Dallis, 115 Ga. 272, 41 S. E. 611, the question was raised as to the validity of an act to establish a dispensary in the city of La Grange. The act provided that: "Within twenty days after the passage of this act the mayor of the city of La Grange shall order an election, at which shall be submitted the question of 'Dispensary' or 'No Dispensary.' Those voting for dispensary shall have written or printed upon their ballots 'For Dispensary,' and those voting against dispensary shall have printed or written upon their ballots, 'No Dispensary.' Should the result be in favor of having a dispensary, then said dispensary shall be established in accordance with the provisions of this act." Acts 1901, p. 509, § 14. The act was attacked because it failed to specifically prescribe the "way for holding" the election, and because it "makes no provision for the necessary rules and regulations" with respect thereto. In passing upon these points this court said: "It is true that the act does not undertake to declare how notice of the election therein provided for shall be given, or to prescribe the precise manner in which it shall be held; but we do not think it was indispensably necessary that the General Assembly should have specifically dealt with these matters of mere detail. On the contrary, the act can, in our opinion, be upheld and given effect by construing its provisions, as to the holding of an election, to mean that the mayor of the city, who was expressly authorized to fix the time for the holding thereof, should also have power to make his order effectual by making the necessary provisions for the holding of the election in the usual and proper way in which such elections as that contemplated by the General Assembly are conducted in this state." The act there under construction, as will be seen, expressly authorized the mayor to fix a time for the holding of the election; and it was held that he therefore had authority to make his order effective by making the necessary provisions for the holding of an election in the usual and proper way in which such elections as that contemplated by the General Assembly are conducted in this state. If the act providing for the election as to whether the city court of Newton should be abolished had conferred upon the ordinary, or the board of county commissioners, the power of ordering the election and fixing the time within which it should be held, it would then have come more nearly under the ruling made in the case cited. But this act conferred no power whatever, as to the election therein referred to, upon the ordinary, or upon the board of commissioners.

The ruling in Brooks v. Town of Loganville, 134 Ga. 358, 67 S. E. 940, is somewhat in point. It was there held that: "A general power contained in the charter of a town to establish and maintain a public school system by taxation, without any provision for the submission of the question to a vote of the qualified voters of the town before it should become effective, is not a compliance with the Constitution (article 8, § 4, par. 1, as amended by the proposal of 1903 [Acts 1903, p. 23]), and does not authorize the levy and collection of a special tax, although an election may have been held, and two-thirds of the persons voting therein voted for the special tax." Such election was held prior to the passage of the general statute on the subject. While mindful of the rule that courts will not, if it can be avoided, hold that the Legislature has done a vain thing, yet we are constrained, in view of what we have said, to hold that in our opinion the act under consideration is "nugatory and ineffectual to abolish the city court of Newton, because it fails to provide how the election therein mentioned 'shall be held, who shall hold it, and to whom the returns of the election shall be made, and whose duty it shall be to declare the result of said election.'" The facts that an election may have been held on the date fixed by the statute under consideration, and that a majority of the votes cast may have been in favor of the abolishment of the city court of Newton, and the result so declared, can throw no light on the question as to the validity of the statute.

It is unnecessary to deal with that portion of the third question in reference to the fact that the ordinary had not declared the result of the election. All the Justices concur.

LUMPKIN, J. (dissenting as to the last point decided by the majority of the court). There can be no doubt that the act under consideration is vague, meager, and unsatisfactory. The rule is, however, that courts will not declare that the Legislature has done a vain, foolish, or meaningless thing, unless in case of necessity. Park v. Candler, 113 Ga. 647, 688, 39 S. E. 89; Southern Ry. Co. v. Atlanta Sand & Supply Co., 135 Ga. 35 (5), 68 S. E. 807; A. C. L. R. Co. v. State, 135 Ga. 545, 561, 69 S. E. 725, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 20.

It seems, both from the record and the question propounded, that an election was held, and there is no intimation that it was not held at the time fixed by the act, or that the majority of the votes cast thereat were not in favor of abolishing the city court. The record transmitted to this court shows that the plaintiff in error was placed on trial in the superior court under an indictment which was sent to that court from the city court. On his trial he set up that the superior court was without jurisdiction, because the act abolishing the city court, and providing for the transfer of its records to the superior court, was ineffectual on account of vagueness and lack of specification. In view of what is said above, and of the terms of the act, and of the general powers conferred upon the county commissioners of Baker county by the act creating the board (Acts 1908, p. 270), I am not prepared to hold that the act of the Legislature under consideration was nugatory, and that nothing was accomplished by it, or by an election held under it. Nor can I concur in an answer to the question propounded by the Court of Appeals which amounts to a ruling that, though the city court of Newton has been officially buried for more than a year, like the ruler's daughter, it "is not dead, but sleepeth." Jacoby v. Dallis, 115 Ga. 272, 41 S. E. 611; People v. Dutcher, 56 Ill. 144; Wells v. Taylor, 5 Mont. 202, 3 Pac. 255; McCrary on Elections, § 196.

I am authorized to state that Mr. Justice HILL concurs with me in this dissent.

TALIAFERRO et al. v. CALHOUN et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INFANTS (§ 112*)—ACTIONS—JUDGMENT—SERVICE OF PROCESS.

An equitable petition was brought against a minor and his guardian to quiet title and to enjoin the minor and those acting for him from setting up any claim to the land involved. An entry of service on the guardian appeared. An order was taken which recited that the minor and his guardian had each been duly and legally served, and which appointed a guardian ad litem for the minor. There was no entry of service by the sheriff on the minor. He and his guardian ad litem acknowledged service, and agreed for the case to be tried at a stated time. On the trial the jury found for the plaintiffs, and a decree was entered enjoining the minor and all persons acting for him from setting up any claim to the land. The final decree recited that the minor by counsel, the guardian, the guardian ad litem, and the father of the minor were present defending the case. After becoming of age, the defendant employed counsel and brought suit to recover the land involved in the former decree. In response to a rule to show cause why he and his attorneys should not be attached for contempt for violating the injunction, they set up that the decree was void, because it appeared on the face of the record that the minor was not served as required by the statute. Held, that it did not appear from the face of the record that the decree was void, so as to authorize it to be regarded as a nullity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Dec. Dig. § 112.*]

2. INFANTS (§ 89*)—ACTIONS—JUDGMENT—SERVICE OF PROCESS.

Under the facts recited in the preceding headnote, the injunction against the minor was not void, because his general guardian was made a party with him, and was served and appeared, but the process omitted to describe him as guardian.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Dec. Dig. § 89.*]

Error from Superior Court, Early County; W. C. Worrill, Judge.

Proceedings by H. M. Calhoun and others to attach Ben Taliaferro, Jr., and others for contempt for violating an injunction. To a judgment holding the defendants to be in contempt and fining them, they except. Affirmed.

In 1904 H. C. Sheffield et al. brought an equitable petition against Ben Taliaferro, Jr., et al., for the purpose of quieting title to certain land. Process was prayed against Ben Taliaferro, Jr., and his guardian, G. W. Harrison. The process, which was issued and attached to the petition, required Ben Taliaferro, Jr., and G. W. Harrison (not describing him as guardian) to be and appear at court. There was an entry of service by the sheriff on G. W. Harrison, guardian. At the return term of the superior court an order was passed reciting, "It appearing to the court that Ben Taliaferro, Jr., and his guardian, G. W. Harrison, have each been served with copy and process duly and legally," it was ordered that J. T. Freeman, Esq., be appointed guardian ad litem to represent the interest of the minor in the litigation, and to employ counsel to represent him in matters connected therewith. The person so appointed accepted the trust. On the record there was the following entry: "Due and legal service acknowledged. Copy, process, and further notice waived. I request the court to try this case at April term, 1904, of Early superior court, so far as H. C. Sheffield is concerned." This was signed by Ben Taliaferro, Jr., and J. T. Freeman, guardian ad litem. An answer was filed in the name of the minor defendant. The jury found in favor of the plaintiffs. The decree recited, "This case having come on to be tried at the present term of the court, and there being present in court plaintiffs personally and by counsel, and the defendant by counsel, and his guardian ad litem, J. T. Freeman, being present, and his guardian, G. W. Harrison, being present, and his father, Ben Taliaferro, being present, and all of them defending this suit," and decreed that Ben Taliaferro, Jr., had no interest or title whatever in the described land as against any of the plaintiffs or persons holding under them, and that he, his guardian, and all persons acting for him should be enjoined from claiming any of such land, or disparaging the plaintiffs' title by any claim of title thereto.

It appeared that Taliaferro was a minor over 14 years of age, and approaching the age of 21 years. After he reached his majority, he took counsel with certain attorneys, and, being advised that the injunction against him was a nullity, he proceeded to bring suit for an undivided interest in the described land involved in the former suit. Proceedings were taken to attach Taliaferro and his attorneys for contempt for violating the injunction. In response they set up that the decree was void, because the minor had not been served as required by the statute, and because the process did not describe his guardian as such, but mentioned him as an individual. Upon the hearing the foregoing facts appeared, and certain affidavits were introduced on behalf of the respondents. In these occurred the expression that, the minor "having never been served with a copy of the petition in said case or with process attached to such copy by the sheriff, as required by law, the said Talliaferro was not before the court"; but in the bill of exceptions it is stated that "it was admitted by the respondents, upon the trial of said case," that the affidavits mentioned "were not offered to prove any fact dehors the record" in the former case. The presiding judge held the defendants to be in contempt, and fined each of them $25, from which they might be relieved upon the dismissal of the suits brought by them in violation of the injunction, referred to in the petition. The respondents excepted.

Askew & Holcomb, Chas. D. Russell, and Cobb & Erwin, for plaintiffs in error. Calhoun & Rambo, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). In an equitable action a final decree was rendered, declaring certain land to belong to the complainants and enjoining the defendant, his guardian, and all persons acting for him, from claiming any of it, or disparaging the plaintiffs' title by any claim of title to the land. The defendant thus enjoined was a minor over 14 years of age, and approaching his majority. His guardian was made a party with him, and a guardian ad litem appointed. After becoming 21 years of age, he brought suit to recover an undivided interest in the land involved in the former suit. Proceedings were instituted to attach him and his attorneys for contempt in violating the injunction. The only response was that the former decree was a nullity for want of proper service, and that the process against his general guardian did not describe him as such.

[1] 1. A void judgment may be attacked collaterally. "In all other cases judgments cannot be impeached collaterally, but must be set aside by the court rendering them." Civil Code 1910, § 5968. If the final decree enjoining the defendant and those acting for him, rendered in the former suit, was a mere nullity, a violation of it would not be ground for attaching the respondents. If it was not void, they could be punished for disobeying it. When one sits in judgment on a decree of a superior court, and intentionally violates an injunction as being a nullity, instead of seeking to set it aside, he takes the risk of the correctness of his own judgment on the subject. Does it appear that the former decision was a nullity? An entry of service is the usual evidence that service has been perfected. An adult may acknowledge service or waive it. A minor defendant cannot bind himself by an acknowledgment of service. In the absence of any statutory provision as to service on a minor, there is no little conflict of authority as to what is void and what is voidable. Many authorities hold that a judgment or decree against a minor is voidable, but not void. Porter v. Robinson, 3 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 253, 13 Am. Dec. 153, 159, note; 10 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 600, 641, et seq.

Where a statute requires personal service on a minor, it must be followed. In this state, prior to 1876, it was the practice in equity cases to appoint a guardian ad litem for a minor defendant without service on such minor personally, and service on such guardian ad litem was treated as sufficient. Adams v. Franklin, 82 Ga. 168, 176, 8 S. E. 44. In that year an act was passed in which provision was made as to the mode of service of writs, petitions, citations, and other legal proceedings on minors. After prescribing the method of service upon minors under 14 years of age, it declared as follows: "If the minor is over fourteen years of age, service may be made by delivering to him personally such copy. When the returns of such service are made to the proper court, and order taken to appoint said minor a guardian ad litem, and such guardian ad litem agrees to serve, all of which must be shown in the proceedings of the court, then said minor shall be considered a party to said proceedings." Civil Code 1910, § 5565. Some of the members of this court are of the opinion that, under the language of this law, it is necessary for the return of service, the appointment of a guardian ad litem, and his agreement to serve to be shown in the proceedings of the court, in order for the minor to be considered a party defendant and for the case to be ready to proceed to final decree. They think that, under such express provisions, where the proceedings do not show the service, the judgment is at least prima facie void, and that an absence of evidence of service thus expressly required by the statute cannot be cured by the general presumption in favor of judgments of courts of competent jurisdiction in cases not governed by such a statute. See concurring opinion of Evans, Lumpkin, and Atkinson, JJ., in Peavy v. Dure, 131 Ga. 104, 115, 62 S. E. 47. But it has been held by a decision of the entire bench that the general presumption does apply to such a case, and that a decree of a court of equity affecting minors will not be treated as void because the record of the proceedings upon which it was based does not affirmatively show that service upon all parties at interest was duly made. Wagnon v. Pease, 104 Ga. 417, 30 S. E. 895. This decision cannot be modified or reversed save by the concurrence of all of the Justices, and some of them adhere to the ruling. Peavy v. Dure, supra. It was not held, however, that such presumption was conclusive. In this connection, see Moore v. Starks, 1 Ohio St. 369, 372, 373. If the record shows affirmatively that no service has been made as required by the statute, a judgment dependent upon such service having been made is void on its face. Jones v. Bibb Brick Co., 120 Ga. 821, 48 S. E. 25. In Maryland Casualty Co. v. Lanham, 124 Ga. 859, 53 S. E. 395, where a suit was brought against a minor for a tort, and personal service was made upon him, but no guardian ad litem was appointed in accordance with the act of 1878, a judgment rendered against the minor by default was held to have been properly set aside on motion therefor. Douglas v. Johnson, 130 Ga. 472, 60 S. E. 863; Miller v. Lucky, 132 Ga. 581, 64 S. E. 658. There is no doubt that the entry of service on a minor defendant ought to be made to appear properly of record, and that a judge ought not to allow a case to proceed to judgment against a minor without this having been done. But it is not every error or failure to correct practice which will render a judgment void on its face. Jones v. Bibb Brick Co., supra.

Tested by these principles, how stands the case under consideration? Process was prayed both against the minor and his guardian. There was an entry of service by the sheriff on the guardian. No entry by the officer appeared in the record as to service on the minor. If the record were entirely silent on this subject, under the decisions above cited, after the rendition of the decree a presumption of service on the minor would arise, though it would not be conclusive. But the record is not wholly silent on the subject of service upon the minor. It was recited in an order that it appeared to the court that the minor and his guardian had each been served with copy and process "duly and legally," and thereupon a guardian ad litem was appointed to represent the minor and accepted the trust. It is true that, after such appointment, both the minor and the guardian ad litem signed an acknowledgment of service and waiver of process and further notice, and a request that the court try the case at a certain term of the superior court; but this does not necessarily prove that the prior recital of service on the minor was untrue. The final decree recited that the minor defendant by counsel, his guardian ad litem, his general guardian, and his father were all present defending the suit, and that, after the submission of evidence, the argument of counsel and the charge of the court, the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs. It cannot be declared that the verdict and decree thereon were mere nullities on their face.

On the hearing of the attachment proceedings the respondents introduced certain affidavits, in which the affiants declared the former proceedings to be void for want of proper service on the minor, and used the expression that, the minor "having never been served with a copy of the petition in said case, or with process attached to such copy, by the sheriff, as required by law, the said Talliaferro was not before the court at the time the said decree is said by petitioners, and appears, to have issued." But in connection with these affidavits the bill of exceptions states that "it was admitted by respondents, upon the trial of said case, that [such affidavits] were not offered to prove any fact dehors the record" in the former case. They apparently amounted to no more than a contention of the respondents that the record of the former case showed on its face that the decree was void. From what has been said above, it will be seen that the former decree does not appear to be a nullity; and the presiding judge did not err in holding that the respondents failed to show that they were justified in disregarding it.

It must be borne in mind that what is said as to serving a minor and bringing him before the court before rendering judgment against him has reference to judgment following service. It does not affect the power of a judge to issue a temporary restraining order, or authorize a minor to knowingly disobey it on the ground that formal service has not been made, any more than it would authorize an adult to do the same thing. Minority may be used to protect the minor, but it furnishes no license to him to commit irreparable injury upon another.

[2] 2. The contention that the judgment was void as against the minor, because of inaccuracy in failing to describe his general guardian as such in the process annexed to the declaration, is without merit. The minor was over 14 years of age. In order to serve him, under the statute above quoted, service on his general guardian was not essential. If for any reason the guardian was a necessary or proper additional party, irregularity in describing him in the process would not make the entire proceeding void as against the minor. Moreover, the entry of the sheriff shows that the guardian was served, and a recital in the final decree shows that he was present and took part in the defense of the case, and there is nothing to show that any objection was made to the form of the process.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except EVANS, P. J., disqualified, and HILL, J., not presiding.

BOWERS v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(No. 3,572.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 204*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under the act of Congress prescribing the liability of carriers by railroad for injuries to their employes, the servant may assume the risk as in other employments, except as to such things as are violative of statutes enacted for the securing of the servant's safety.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 544-546; Dec. Dig. § 204.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 129, 139*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Where a passenger train running at somewhat more than the schedule rate of speed is wrecked by reason of the fact that a trespasser turned the switch between the main line and a siding, whereby the train was caused to leave the main line and run into a siding, and was there derailed at a safety switch situated in the side track at a point some 100 feet from the main line, and injury to the fireman was caused by the wreck, neither the alleged excessive speed at which the train was running nor the situation of the safety switch is to be regarded as the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, especially where it appears, from the allegations of the petition and the proof on the trial, that the same result probably would have ensued if the train had been running at a normal rate of speed. The proximate cause of the injury is the act of the trespasser.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. §§ 129, 139.*]

3. NEGLIGENCE (§ 62*)—PROXIMATE CAUSE—INTERVENING EFFICIENT CAUSE.

In a suit for damages, if it appears that there intervened between the alleged negligence of the defendant and the damage sustained by the plaintiff the independent criminal act of a third person, which was the direct and proximate cause of the damage, the plaintiff cannot recover.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 76-79; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 96*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

As to one to whom the railroad company does not owe a higher degree of care than the standard of ordinary care and diligence imposes, and owes no affirmative duty of protection such as it owes passengers, the negligence of the railroad company in leaving a switch unlocked is not to be regarded as the proximate cause of an injury which ensues because a willful and conscious trespasser by a criminal act turns the switch, whereby the train is wrecked and a person is injured. The intervening independent act of the trespasser renders remote the negligence of the railroad company in leaving the switch unlocked.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

Since the defendant's liability in the present case turns solely upon the question as to whether the switch, through the turning of which the train had been wrecked, was turned by the criminal act of a trespasser, alleged evidence relating to other and independent matters will not be considered, since, even if error were found, it should be treated as harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 204*)—PRESENTATION OF QUESTIONS IN TRIAL COURT—EVIDENCE.

Where evidence is objected to, and the court in response to the objection states that he does not admit it generally, but admits it for a special purpose, and counsel for the objecting party, upon ascertaining the purpose for which it is to be admitted, make no further objection to it, no valid assignment of error can be based on the court's act in admitting it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 204.*]

7. WITNESSES (§ 48*)—COMPETENCY—WHAT LAW GOVERNS—CONVICTION OF FELONY.

A witness in this state is not rendered incompetent by conviction of a felony, or other crime, irrespective of whether the conviction be had in this state or in another state, and irrespective of whether the conviction in the state in which it was had carries with it incompetency to testify or not. The competency of witnesses is regulated by the law of the forum.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Hattie Bowers, administratrix, against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The plaintiff's husband (on whose estate she was administratrix) was killed on an interstate train. He was a fireman of defendant, engaged in interstate commerce. The plaintiff originally brought suit in two counts under the South Carolina statute and two counts under the federal statute; but the court excluded the two counts under the South Carolina statute, upon the ground that the federal statute applied. The death of the intestate while working as a fireman on an interstate train, administration, earning capacity, number of children, contribution, and other formal parts of the case were proved. It was shown that, at what is known as "Gross' Siding," where the decedent met his death, there is a switch and side track running to a factory about a mile and a half away. The track approaches this point on a steep downgrade, through a deep cut, and on a curve. The train on which the decedent was engaged at the time of his death approached this point running at the rate of about 35 miles per hour (which was slightly above its ordinary speed under the schedule, but not greater than the speed allowed by the rules of the company), and at the switch left the main line, dashed into the side track, and at what is known as the safety or derailing switch (i. e., a device placed in a side track whereby, if cars left on the side track are put in motion, they will not run out upon the main line, but will be thrown from the track before the main line is reached) the engine was derailed and turned over, producing the fatality for which the suit is brought.

The plaintiff made the following specifications of negligence: (1) Defendant was negligent, in that its track was so constructed that the approach to the switch was around a curve and through a deep cut, preventing the engineer and fireman from seeing the lights on the switch stand and detecting its condition in time to slow up and avoid running into the same. (2) Defendant was negligent, in that it had in the siding, right close to the main line switch, what is called a "safety switch." The effect of a safety switch at this place is that when the switch is thrown, unless the safety is also thrown, the train entering the switch will, instead of going down the side track, run off, as was done in the present case. (3) Defendant was negligent, in that the switch was left unlocked by its employes, leaving it where any passer-by could throw the same to the side track. (4) Defendant was negligent, in that its employes working upon its road threw said switch to the side track, instead of the main line. (5) Defendant was negligent, in that the engineer was running at an excessive rate of speed. (6) Ordinary care required the defendant to have and maintain a switch target and switch lights, constructed as follows: A post placed around the curve from the switch, so that the same could be seen at a long distance from the switch; the signals on this post to be connected by wires, so that when the switch was thrown the wires would throw the lights by night and the boards by day, indicating to an approaching train whether the switch was thrown to the side track or the main line, and giving such indication in time for the train to stop. Defendant failed to have any such target or signals. Such failure on the part of the defendant was negligence. (7) Defendant was negligent, in that the rails of the side track, where the wreck occurred, were small and light, and not sufficiently strong to hold the engine which was wrecked, the same being a very large engine, and the cross-ties were rotten and defective. (8) Defendant was negligent, in that the light on the switch target was not lighted.

The defendant pleaded that as to the acts of negligence alleged the plaintiff's intestate had assumed the risk, and in this connection showed that he had been running for over two years over this same track at this place in the condition it was at the time of the injury (except, of course, in so far as the switch was on this occasion turned to the side track). Defendant further pleaded that the proximate cause of the injury was an act for which it was in no wise responsible, namely, the act of a trespasser in breaking the lock on the switch and turning it so as to throw the train to the side track. On this phase of the case the defendant showed by the evidence of one Clarence Agnew himself that he had thrown the switch from the main line to the siding shortly before the wreck occurred; that he had pulled the chain and the lock came open; that he broke the lock up and threw it away; that he afterwards found the broken pieces of the lock and the piece of iron with which he broke it; that he confessed to his crime; that he was tried for the murder of the engineer, was convicted, and is now in the penitentiary. The defendant then proved by a woman that she saw Agnew at the switch shortly before the wreck, knocking at it. The sheriff of Spartanburg county, S. C., testified that Agnew confessed that he broke the lock on the switch, and went with him and found the broken pieces of the lock, and the implements with which he said he broke it. The broken lock, showing indentation marks, and the bar with which the lock was broken, were introduced. The defendant showed by the crew of the train which last used the siding that the switch was properly set to the main line and was locked after it was used, and by the crew of the last train which passed the siding shortly before 6:30 in the afternoon that the switch was set right to the main line.

The court in his charge to the jury limited the plaintiff's right of recovery to two grounds: (1) Negligence on the part of the defendant's employes in leaving the switch unlocked where any passer-by could throw it to the side track; and (2) negligence on the part of the defendant's employes in themselves throwing the switch to the side track, instead of to the main line. The important question in the case is whether the court erred in thus limiting the plaintiff's case.

Burton Smith, for plaintiff in error. McDaniel & Black, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the fact as above). [1] The case, as has been said already, arises under the act of Congress fixing the liability of interstate railroads for injuries to their employes, and is determinable by its provisions. Under that act the doctrine of respondeat superior applies in favor of an injured servant, and what is known as the "fellow-servant doctrine" is practically abolished. Contributory negligence on the part of the injured servant diminishes, but does not defeat, a recovery. The defense of assumption of risk was not abolished, however, except in cases where the servant was injured through the violations by the master of some "statute enacted for the safety of employes." The questions of negligence and of proximate cause are still to be determined according to the general existing rules on that subject. Taking up, now, the allegations of negligence which the court eliminated from the consideration of the jury, for the purpose of seeing whether the court properly eliminated them: The first is that the defendant was negligent, in that it had so constructed its track that the approach to the switch was around a curve and through a deep cut, which prevented the engineer and fireman from seeing the lights on the switch stand, in order to detect that the switch was turned, and slow up and keep from running into the side track. The decedent had been running over this same track for more than two years. It seems plain to us that as to this he had assumed the risk.

[2] The second allegation of negligence is that the derailing switch, or safety switch, as it is called, on the side track, was located so close to the main line that when the train left the main line track it was thrown off, whereas otherwise it would have continued down the side track. If it cannot be said that this was also an assumed risk, still we think that under all the facts disclosed there was no negligence on the carrier's part. The location of this derailing switch was a condition and not a cause of the injury. It was certainly proper for the company to have this derailing switch in the side track in order to protect its main line from cars left on the side track. It was not located so close to the main line as to interfere in any wise with the operation of trains thereon, unless some act of wrong on the railroad company's part or on an outsider's part had changed the switch. But for some such thing, the train on which the plaintiff's husband was working would never have entered this side track at all, so as to be in range of this derailing switch, and therefore, when we come to consider its part in bringing about the death of the decedent, we are first confronted with the question as to what was the cause of the decedent's being in range of this switch at the time he was killed; and, on looking to the cause, we find that it was the wrongful act of some one in turning that switch. As we attempted to point out in A. C. L. v. Daniels, 8 Ga. App. 775, 70 S. E. 203, the law regards as the proximate cause that thing or combination of things in which, or through which, the normal course of prudently conducted affairs is violated. In a remote sense, the location of this derailing switch, even if its location could have been in any sense regarded as wrongful, may be regarded as a cause of the injury; but the proximate cause was the wrongful turning of the switch between the main line and the side track. The court submitted to the jury the question as to whether the defendant was guilty of any wrong or neglect as to this switch between the main line and the side track being turned, and the jury, having found that it was guilty of no wrong or negligence in this respect, could not have found that it was guilty of actionable wrong merely because this derailing switch was situated at the particular point at which it was rather than at some other point in the side track. There may be concurrent proximate causes, of course; but the distinction must always be kept in mind between concurrent causes and mere conditions upon which the proximate cause operates.

The speed at which the train was running was likewise either a condition or a remote cause. There was nothing inherently wrongful in this rate of speed. It was ineffectual to produce any injury. The real cause of the train's speed becoming dangerous was the turning of the switch (as the jury has found) by the trespasser. According to every rule of human experience, the wreck would have resulted just as it did if the train had been running at the schedule speed of 30 miles an hour, instead of 35 or 40, as it was running. It is impossible to see how it can be seriously contended that the injury was brought about in any wise through any excess of speed over the normal, even if we regard the absolute schedule of the train as the normal and regard 35 or 40 miles an hour as an abnormal rate. We are not to be understood as holding that any excessive rate of speed was shown in this case, but are merely attempting to show that, if an excessive rate of speed was shown, the wreck and the injury did not result from that cause.

As to the allegation of negligence to the effect that the defendant did not equip its switches at this point with what are known as "distance signals" (a description of the operation of which is set forth in the excerpt quoted above from the plaintiff's petition), it was shown that nowhere on the defendant's lines were any such switches, and that the plaintiff's husband had been working on that road as a fireman and going over the very track in question for more than two years. The court properly held that, even if this were a negligent deficiency, the decedent had assumed the risk.

[3,4] The allegation of negligence as to the condition of the rails and ties on the side track was probably sufficiently rebutted by the proof as not to make it a jury question; but, irrespective of that, these things stand on the same footing juridically as does the situation of the derailing switch, which has already been discussed in detail. We conclude that the court did not err in submitting to the jury only the two questions—the first as to whether some employé of the company left this switch open, or whether it was opened by a trespasser; and, secondly, whether the company's employées were negligent in leaving it unlocked so that a trespasser might open it. As to the submitting of the second question to the jury (that is, as to the company's negligence in leaving the switch unlocked), it may be remarked that the court probably gave the plaintiff a benefit to which he was not entitled. As to persons to whom the railroad company owes the duty of extraordinary care and diligence, or the duty of affirmative protection (such as passengers), it may be and probably is true that a railroad company could be held liable for leaving a switch unlocked, whereby a trespasser was enabled to throw a switch and wreck a train; but, as to other persons, we doubt if in such a case liability can be upheld. "The defendant's negligence may put temptation in the way of another person to commit a wrongful act, by which the plaintiff is injured; and yet the defendant's negligence may be in no sense a cause of the injury." 1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (5th Ed.) § 25, quoted approvingly in Andrews v. Kinsel, 114 Ga. 390, 40 S. E. 300, 88 Am. St. Rep. 25.

[5] The general doctrine is laid down in the course of the opinion in this case (Andrews v. Kinsel, supra) that, where there has intervened between the alleged negligence of the defendant and the damages sustained by the plaintiff an independent illegal act of a third person producing the injury, and without which it would not have happened, and which is the direct proximate cause of the damages, no liability exists. We have adverted to this doctrine more especially as the basis for saying that in this case the one fact upon which the whole question of liability turns is whether this train was wrecked through the criminal act of a willful, conscious trespasser, who turned the switch, or from some other cause. This question was squarely submitted to the jury without any error in the charge as to it; and the only exception as to testimony bearing on this point of the case is, as we shall presently show, not well taken. If this point was correctly presented to the jury and decided by them, the judgment refusing a new trial should not be reversed, irrespective of whether the numerous exceptions to rulings on evidence relating to other phases of the case are well taken or not. For, if error as to any of these matters be established, it would at once fall into the category of harmless error.

[8] Two rulings on evidence as to the issue of fact as to whether the alleged trespasser, Clarence Agnew, threw this switch or not, are complained of. The first is that the court, on the direct examination of John M. Nichols, the sheriff of the county where the wreck occurred, was allowed to answer that, when he arrested the defendant, he carried him up to the scene of the wreck and "went up to the switch where he claimed to have broken the lock loose." Upon objecting generally to this testimony, the court made the following statement: "I think anything he stated which caused the sheriff to make the search is admissible. I will leave it in for the present—anything that was said to him about finding those things. I understand you are objecting to all of it. This evidence don't go in as evidence of the truth of the statement he made that he did this thing. It goes in connection with the conduct of these people in finding those things." Thereupon Mr. Smith, of counsel for the plaintiff, replied, "Your honor does not admit it to show he broke the lock on the switch?" The court answered, "No," whereupon no further objection to the testimony was interposed. This, of course, presents no ground for assignment of error in this court, even if the ruling of the court were incorrect; but the court's ruling was not incorrect.

[7] The other assignment of error is that the court erred in admitting the testimony of Clarence Agnew; it appearing to the court that Agnew was at the time a convict for life, and that under the laws of South Carolina, where he was convicted, he was incompetent to testify as a witness. Able counsel for the plaintiff in error frankly concedes in his brief that personally he does not regard this exception as being well taken, but adds, "But as counsel frequently make mistakes, if we are mistaken, we wish the benefit of it." The opinion of counsel as to this matter is eminently correct. His objection was not well taken. Under the law of this state a person convicted of a felony is a competent witness. The fact of his conviction only goes to his credit. Civil Code 1910, § 5858. Of course, the competency is determined by the law of the forum.

Judgment affirmed.

RICKERSON v. STATE. (No. 3,899.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 255*)—MANSLAUGHTER—EVIDENCE.

The evidence, taken in connection with the prisoner's statement, fully authorized a conviction of voluntary manslaughter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 255.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 250*)—MURDER—EVIDENCE.

When the state proves that the accused killed the person named in the indictment, in the county and in the manner therein described, a prima facie case of murder is made out. The evidence in the present case warranted an instruction to this effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 250.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 564*)—EVIDENCE—VENUE.

The evidence authorized a finding that the homicide was committed in Jasper county.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 564.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 340*)—INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

The charge was full and fair. Any inaccuracies in reference to the law of murder were harmless. The requests to charge, so far as legal and pertinent, were covered by the general charge, which was free from prejudicial error. The evidence warranted the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 715-720; Dec. Dig. § 340.*]

Ed Rickerson was convicted of manslaughter, and brings error. Affirmed.

W. S. Florence, for plaintiff in error.
Jos. E. Pottle, Sol. Gen., for the State.

POTTLE, J. Rickerson was indicted for the murder of Moseley, and convicted of voluntary manslaughter. His motion for a new trial was overruled, and he sued out a writ of error to this court. He contends that neither under the evidence nor the statement of the accused can a verdict of manslaughter be justified; that he is guilty of murder, or not guilty of any offense.

[1] It would serve no good purpose to enter into a long discussion of the evidence. Suffice it to say that the jury could have found that both men were drunk and ready to fight; that Moseley indicated a willingness to fight, and threatened to kill the accused unless he took another drink; that Rickerson left Moseley, went to a nearby buggy, got a pistol, returned to Moseley, who was sitting in his buggy, and then both began shooting at about the same time. This theory brings the case squarely within the ruling made in Gann v. State, 30 Ga. 67, and cases of kindred nature. The judge fairly presented this theory of the case, and there was no prejudicial error in his instructions on the subject.

[2] 2. The court charged in effect that, when the state shows the killing, the burden is shifted to the accused to mitigate or justify it. This is unquestionably the law, and the charge was warranted by the evidence. The state relied partly upon proof of incriminating admissions by the accused. While some of the witnesses testified that exculpatory statements were coupled with the admissions, one witness testified to a bald confession, without any attempt at justification. It makes no difference how a killing be shown. When once proved, a prima facie case of murder is made for the state, unless, of course, it is made to appear at the same time that the killing is justifiable, or a lower grade of homicide has been committed. Whenever such a prima facie case is made, the burden is on the accused to set up his defense. This is what the trial judge charged, and his language was so guarded as not to prejudice the accused.

[3] 3. Complaint is made in the motion for a new trial that the venue of the offense was not proved. Kelly and Farrar are two railroad stations, about two miles apart, in the northern part of Jasper county; Kelly being south of Farrar. There is also a public road between these two villages. The accused lived on this public road, and a witness named Spearman also lived on it, about 400 yards from the accused. Spearman testified: "My house and the house where Rickerson lived is on the same road, but on different sides of the road. It is level from Rickerson's house for about 50 or 100 yards, then you go down grade, a hill, and then up a pretty good hill, and down a long hill, to my house." Newborn is a town about on the line between Newton and Jasper counties. Cranford, who was jointly indicted with Rickerson, lived northeast of Farrar. On the day of the homicide the deceased went in his buggy to the home of the accused, and persuaded the accused to go with him to arrest a negro. Before going to make the arrest, they drove northward to Newborn, where the accused had some business to transact. Remaining there awhile, they got in the buggy and started back southward to go to the negro's house. They remained at this house about three hours, and effected a settlement with the negro. After leaving the negro's house they made several stops along the way, and finally, in the language of the accused, "we trotted on and got next to Guy Spearman's. We struck another trot to the other slant, and just as we got on top of the rise, there near the cotton patch, he said: 'Let's take another drink.'" It was at this point the shooting took place. Cranford came up just before the shooting, and left shortly afterwards. Guy Spearman testified that, in going from Rickerson's house to where Cranford lives, you would travel north and northwest and go through Farrar. "This is the way you would travel if you went from the scene of the homicide to Cranford's." He further testified that he and his wife were at their home on the night of the homicide, and heard four or five pistol shots; that after a little while he saw a buggy come over the hill, and in about a minute or two a man came running over the hill and got into the buggy, nearly in front of his house, and drove on towards Farrar. The circumstances indicate that this man was Cranford. The witness said that he heard "hollering" in the direction of Kelly, seemingly in the same direction as the firing of the pistol. The man who got in the buggy came from towards Kelly and Rickerson's home. "This I have just told the jury was in this county and state." Also: "I will state that the point that I heard the pistol shots fired was in Jasper county, Ga." Mrs. Spearman testified that "it was in the direction towards Kelly that I heard hollering, and the pistol shots were in the same direction." Another witness for the state testified that he heard the pistol shots, and shortly afterwards saw Cranford coming from towards Kelly, "from the direction in which I heard the pistol shots." We are clear that, taking all this evidence together, in connection with the statement of the accused, the jury were authorized to find that the homicide occurred in Jasper county.

[4] 4. There are numerous assignments of error upon the court's charge. Many of them complain of instructions in reference to the law of murder. None of the assignments are meritorious. The instructions seem to be free from error; but, even if they contain inaccurate statements, the accused was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and was not prejudiced in any way by the charges upon the law of murder. The requests, in so far as they were legal and pertinent, were fully covered by the general charge, which was free from substantial error. The accused had a fair and impartial trial, and we find nothing in the record which would authorize interference by this court.

Judgment affirmed.

COTTON v. CITY OF ATLANTA.
(No. 3,823.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 592*)—POLICE REGULATIONS—VALIDITY.

Though there are circumstances under which the same physical act may render the actor guilty of two offenses, one of which may be a municipal offense and the other a state offense, still the municipality cannot punish for state offenses. Where a municipal penal ordinance and a public criminal statute operate upon the same set of physical acts, the municipal ordinance is invalid, unless the offense created by it contains some characterizing ingredient not contained in the offense under the state law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1311-1314; Dec. Dig. § 592.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 592*)—POLICE REGULATIONS—VALIDITY.

Section 1837 of the City Code of Atlanta, in so far as it makes it punishable for any person to allow a house or a portion of a house to be occupied as a house of ill fame, creates no different offense from that created by Pen. Code 1910, § 382, and is therefore invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1311-1314; Dec. Dig. § 592.*]

3. DISORDERLY HOUSE (§ 2*)—"HOUSE OF ILL FAME"—"LEWD HOUSE."

There is no difference in meaning between the two expressions "house of ill fame" and

"lewd house or place for the practice of fornication or adultery."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Disorderly House, Cent. Dig. §§ 1, 2, 9; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

L. E. Cotton was convicted of a violation of city ordinance, and brings error. Reversed.

John A. Boykin, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Mayson and W. D. Ellis, Jr., for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Cotton was convicted in the police court of Atlanta for violating section 1837 of the code of that city, which reads as follows: "Any person or persons, who shall occupy, or allow to be occupied, any house, or portion of a house, to be used as a house of ill fame in the city of Atlanta, shall, upon conviction thereof, pay a fine of not exceeding five hundred dollars, or be imprisoned not exceeding thirty days, or both, in the discretion of the recorder's court." The specific charge against him was that he, being the proprietor of a hotel, allowed a man and a woman to resort to a room in it for the purpose of fornication. He sought certiorari from the conviction, and to the overruling of the certiorari brings error.

[1] The point is that, so far as the ordinance in question applies to the case at bar, it is invalid, because it penalizes an act made criminal by a public statute of the state, namely, section 382 of the Penal Code of 1910, which provides: "If any person shall maintain and keep a lewd house, or place for the practice of fornication or adultery, either by himself or others, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." No two propositions are better settled in this state than these: (1) That a municipal corporation cannot punish for an offense against the criminal laws of the state; (2) that the same physical act, by reason of the circumstances surrounding its commission, or by reason of the intent with which it is done or by reason of something else specially characterizing it, may draw to the person committing it such twofold guilt as to make him responsible for two separate offenses, one of which may be a municipal offense, and the other a crime under the public laws of the state. See Calloway v. Mims, 5 Ga. App. 9, 62 S. E. 654, and Athens v. Atlanta, 6 Ga. App. 244, 64 S. E. 711, in which both questions are lengthily discussed, with an extensive citation of authorities.

These cases just cited will illustrate the two doctrines and show how they work together consistently. The physical act in each of these two cases was that the accused kept intoxicating liquor at his place of business for the purpose of unlawful sale. The state law made it penal for a person to keep liquors on hand at his place of business, irrespective of the intent or purpose with which they were kept; the municipal ordinance made it unlawful for a person to keep liquors on hand for the purpose of illegal sale, irrespective of the place of the keeping. The accused, who kept the liquors at his place of business and thereby violated the state law, also violated the municipal law because of the intent and purpose which characterized his keeping. But, narrow as the line of demarcation between single and twofold guilt may be, there is a line; and it must be observed. If the thing punished by the municipal ordinance and the thing punished by the state law are one and the same, whether viewed as a physical transaction, or whether looked upon with an eye to the ascertainment of the respective legislative objects—if, when viewed in both aspects, nothing to differentiate the municipal violation from the state offense appears—the municipality must give way to the state, and the latter has the exclusive jurisdiction to punish.

[2] For a person to allow any house or portion of a house over which he has control or possession to be used as a house of ill fame is a violation of Penal Code 1910, § 382. Kinard v. State, 10 Ga. App. —, 72 S. E. 715. Specifically, it has been held in the recent case of Fitzgerald v. State, 72 S. E. 541, that for an innkeeper to rent a room in his hotel that it may be used for the practice of fornication is a violation of this law. So far as the ordinance in question makes it punishable for a person to allow a house or a portion of a house to be occupied as a house of ill fame, it ordains no more or no less, as to the particular offense, than the state law prescribes on the same subject.

[3] It is true that the ordinance speaks of "a house of ill fame," while the Criminal Code speaks of "a lewd house or place for the practice of fornication or adultery"; but this is a distinction without a difference. "A house of ill fame," as used in contexts such as the present, means a lewd house, a bawdry, a place maintained for the practice of fornication and adultery, or for "the convenience and shelter of persons desiring unlawful sexual intercourse." Posnett v. Marble, 62 Vt. 481, 20 Atl. 813, 11 L. R. A. 162, 22 Am. St. Rep. 126; State v. Nichols, 83 Ind. 228, 43 Am. Rep. 66; Henson v. State, 62 Md. 232, 50 Am. Rep. 204. "Both at common law and in common parlance the words 'house of ill fame' mean a house resorted to for the purposes of prostitution." State v. Plant, 67 Vt. 454, 32 Atl. 237, 48 Am. St. Rep. 821.

It is unnecessary for us to say whether the rest of the ordinance—that part of it which makes it an offense for a person to occupy a house of ill fame or a portion of such a house—is valid or not. It is sufficient to the decision of the present case for us to say that, so far as the ordinance relates to the present transaction, it is invalid, and that the recorder's court's only jurisdiction in the matter was to bind the alleged offender over to the state court for trial. We recognize that expediency might be subserved by allowing the police courts to deal summarily with matters of this nature; but the law is otherwise, and law must be the law, even among its friends.

An ordinance which makes it unlawful to "occupy" or allow to be occupied any portion of a house to be used as a house of ill fame or disorderly house in the city of Atlanta means that occupancy which contributes in some manner to the unlawful character of the house, and does not preclude an innocent and lawful occupancy of a room or a portion of a house which may in other parts thereof be used for disorderly and immoral purposes.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Mrs. C. L. Dannie was convicted of violating an ordinance of the City of Atlanta, and brings error. Reversed.

Walter A. Sims, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Mayson and W. D. Ellis, Jr., for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. [1, 3] An ordinance of the city of Atlanta, enacted under charter authority, makes it punishable for any person to occupy or allow a house or a portion of the house to be occupied as a house of ill fame. Section 1837, City Code of Atlanta. In Cotton v. City of Atlanta, 73 S. E. 683, decided by this court January 15, 1912, it is held that this ordinance created no offense different from that covered by section 382 of the Penal Code of 1910, and that it was therefore invalid under the rule that a municipal corporation cannot punish for an offense against the criminal laws of the state.

[2] It is insisted on the part of the city that the ordinance creates a different offense from that created by the penal statute of the state, in that it makes it unlawful for any person to occupy any portion of the house used as a house of ill fame in the city of Atlanta. We do not agree with this view. The purpose of the ordinance is to suppress disorderly houses and to maintain the peace, health, order, and good government of the city, and the occupancy of any portion of a house of this character contemplated that the occupancy was of such character as to maintain or contribute to the maintenance of a house of the kind prohibited. We do not think that it was intended to make it unlawful for a person to occupy a room in a house of ill fame or disorderly house, unless such person, while occupying a room therein, was in some way contributing to the unlawful character of the house. If the occupant of the room had no notice that the other portion of the house was being conducted as a house of ill fame, or possibly if he did know that fact and in no way contributed to its unlawful character he would not violate this ordinance, and we think the meaning of the words "occupy any portion of a disorderly house" necessarily carries with it the meaning that the occupancy must be for unlawful purposes. In other words, we think that one could innocently occupy a portion of a disorderly house without having anything whatever to do with the maintaining and keeping of such house, and it is only the element of maintaining and keeping a house of this character that both the ordinance and the statute are intended to punish. We therefore think that the ordinance is fully covered by the state statute, and for that reason is invalid.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 338*)—EVIDENCE—RELEVANCY.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to murder, it was not error to exclude testimony that no case had been made against the accused in the mayor's court for disorderly conduct growing out of his behavior immediately prior to the shooting.

W. M. Harrell, R. R. Terrell, and M. L. Ledford, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Wooten, Sol. Gen., and F. A. Hooper, for the State.

POTTLE, J. [1] The accused was indicted for assault with intent to murder one Knight, and was convicted of the statutory offense of shooting at another. The charge was full and fair—in fact, rather more favorable to the accused than he had any right to demand—and did not contain any expression or intimation of opinion as to what had been proved. In the motion for a new trial complaint is made of several instructions upon the theory of the right of the accused to resist an unlawful arrest. The testimony of the prosecutor made a clear case of assault with intent to murder. The statement of the accused set up self-defense. It is doubtful if, under the evidence, the accused was entitled to an instruction upon the theory of his right to resist an illegal arrest, and it is certain that there was no error in the charge of which he can justly complain, nor in the failure of the judge to elaborate more fully this theory of defense.

[2] It was not error to repel testimony that no case had been made against the accused in the mayor's court for disorderly conduct, growing out of his behavior immediately prior to the shooting. Such evidence would have been irrelevant to any issue in the case. The mere fact that officers charged with that duty failed to prosecute for the offense does not prove that the offense was not committed. Especially is this true where, in a case like the present, the offense for which there was a failure to prosecute was for disorderly conduct which culminated in an attempt to take human life, and the person guilty of the disorderly conduct was awaiting trial for the more serious offense. As well might it be said that failure to indict a murderer for carrying a pistol without a license would be evidence that he was not guilty of the latter offense.

The accused was fortunate in escaping punishment for the more serious crime of assault with intent to murder. In their humanity the jury gave him the benefit of the doubt, and convicted him of the lower grade of crime. There were some facts and circumstances to warrant such a finding, and this court will not interfere.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 634*)—TRIAL—ABSENCE OF JUDGE.

Where the judge presiding in a criminal trial leaves the county of the trial while the jury is still deliberating upon its verdict, and goes to an adjoining county, the pending trial is vitiated, and a verdict thereafter returned by the jury is a nullity.

G. G. Bower, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Wooten, Sol. Gen., and F. A. Hooper, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. It appears, from the evidence, that in the trial of the plaintiff in error "the jury retired about 7 o'clock in the evening to consider their verdict, and that the presiding judge thereupon left the jurisdiction of Decatur county and went to Grady county to grant a charter in a county other than that which the defendant was being tried in." In the motion for new trial the facts are stated as we have quoted them, and the complaint is made that the verdict is contrary to law by reason thereof. The question presented by the record, therefore, is whether the fact that the judge left the county where the trial was being conducted and the jury were deliberating upon their verdict, and went to a different county to perform another official duty, so vitiates the trial as to avoid the finding of the jury.

[2] It must be admitted that any absence of the presiding judge while the trial is going on is an irregularity, and if the question were an open one we should hold that any absence of the judge, no matter how brief, necessarily suspends a pending judicial proceeding. But under rulings of the Supreme Court there are occasions when a temporary absence of the judge, even though the trial is in active progress and the jury has not retired, cannot be said to be harmful to either party. O'Shields v. State, 81 Ga. 301, 6 S. E. 426; Pritchett v. State, 92 Ga. 65, 18 S. E. 536. The Supreme Court in Horne v. Rogers, 110 Ga. 362, 370, 35 S. E. 715, 49 L. R. A. 176, held that a mere temporary absence of the judge, where he was within the call of the jury, was not such an irregularity as would necessitate a new trial. It has also held that a temporary absence out of sight, though within hearing, of what was going on in the courtroom, did not affect the trial, when this temporary withdrawal of the judge occurred during the argument of counsel. It is to be noted, however, that in deciding the Horne Case, supra, the rulings in the O'Shields and Pritchett Cases were criticised and disapproved, and these earlier rulings were followed only in the absence of an application to review them. In the present instance, however, the judge went beyond the jurisdiction of the court in which the trial was pending. The jurors could not be said to have been even constructively in his presence, and the presence of the judge was indispensable to the legality of the court. If there is no judge, there is no court.

It is not apparent that the defendant in the present case was hurt by the absence of the judge. The testimony adduced on the trial fully authorized the conviction of the defendant, and there is no evidence that the verdict was affected by any improper influence or contract on the part of bystanders or others, or that they knew that the judge was absent from the county, or that their finding was in any way affected by that fact. It is naturally suggested that the trial had progressed so far that the presence of the judge was no longer necessary until the jury might return into court, and that, as it was not necessary that the judge should remain at the courthouse until he was notified that the jury desired to return a verdict, it could not matter if, in the judge's desire to perform other duties of importance in an adjoining county, he should go there, instead of remaining at his hotel or some other house, within reach of the jury. It was no doubt upon the latter theory that the learned trial judge acted, and the recital of the assignment of error evidences his diligence in the discharge of his judicial duties.

[1] However, as a criminal trial is not completed until the verdict has been rendered, the question which really arises is whether it is not necessary, in order to preserve unimpaired the right of trial by jury, that injury be presumed from the violation of any of those orderly rules which safeguard the right. It seems to us that injury is to be presumed, in so important a matter as trial by jury, even in the absence of proof to that effect, where injury is likely to result from an infraction of a general rule, and especially such an important one as that which looks to the present personal supervision and control of the presiding judge as an essential sine qua non of a legal trial. There can be no trial without a judge. The case must be tried in Decatur county. Naturally we conclude that when the judge left Decatur county, and went to Grady county to open a special court to grant a charter in that county, the court ceased, for the time being at least, to exist in Decatur county, and that all that was done during the absence of the judge was nugatory and void. A temporary absence of the judge, such as has been referred to in the cases cited above, involved his presence at a point where he was easily accessible to the parties, counsel, officers of court, and the jury. Where the judge is within call of the jury and physically absent, but at a place so near by that he can easily return, if needed, he may be presumed to be constructively present at the courthouse; but this presumption cannot be indulged when the judge goes to a place beyond the jurisdiction of the court in which the trial is being had. Where the judge is not only physically out of the presence of the jury, but also absent in a legal sense, and at such a point as to be beyond the reach of the other essential component, but subordinate, parts of the court, which should be subjected to his supervision, the court is necessarily dissolved pro tempore, at least so far as the trial first pending is concerned.

HABEAS CORPUS (§ 96*)—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 643*)—POLICE REGULATIONS—PROSECUTIONS—SENTENCE—HEARING OF APPLICATION FOR DISCHARGE.

Where a municipal ordinance authorized the mayor to impose sentence in the alternative of a fine or work on the public streets of the city, and the mayor sentenced a person in the following language: "Fine $50, or 60 days at hard labor on,"—the sentence was not void for uncertainty because it was not dated and the place where the alternative part of the sentence was to be executed was not stated. Under the ordinance the only place where that part of the sentence imposing hard labor could have been executed was "upon the public streets" of the municipality. It was not erroneous for the judge, hearing an application for discharge on habeas corpus on account of the alleged uncertainty of the sentence, to permit the mayor who heard the case and imposed the sentence to insert therein the date, and to add thereto the words "the public streets of Blakely," although the amendment was not necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Dec. Dig. § 96;* Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 643.*]

Error from City Court of Blakely; L. M. Rambo, Judge.

Application by H. D. Clarke for habeas corpus to W. H. Trippe. To the allowance of an amendment to the relator's sentence and a refusal of the application for habeas corpus, the applicant excepts. Affirmed.

The plaintiff in error was convicted in the municipal court in the city of Blakely for a violation of an ordinance by keeping intoxicating liquors in his possession for unlawful sale, and the following sentence was imposed: "Fine $50, or 60 days at hard labor on." He sought, by habeas corpus, to obtain release from custody under this sentence, which he alleged was void because not dated, and because it did not indicate where the labor was to be performed. At the hearing of the application for habeas corpus the mayor, who passed the sentence, testified that the labor referred to was to be performed on the public streets of Blakely, and that the clerk who wrote out the sentence failed to add the words "the public streets of Blakely"; that the sentence as actually passed was a fine of $50, or hard labor on the public streets of Blakely for 60 days. He testified that he was still mayor of Blakely. Thereupon the judge directed the witness to insert the date of the sentence, August 12, 1911; it being agreed by both parties to the record that the trial in the municipal court took place on that date, and to add to the sentence "public streets of Blakely," and to sign his name thereto as mayor and ex officio recorder; and the docket entry as thus amended was introduced in evidence. It appeared that there had been no effort to have the judgment of the municipal court reviewed by certiorari, that no objection to its legality had been made otherwise than in habeas corpus proceedings, and that no part of the sentence had been satisfied. Exception is taken to the allowance of the amendment to the sentence and to the refusal of the application for habeas corpus.

Byron R. Collins, for plaintiff in error Hawes, Pottle & Wright, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). There was no error. It was admitted that the movant was tried for a violation of the city ordinance, and that he was found guilty by the mayor's court, and that he was in the custody of the respondent in pursuance of the sentence then rendered against him; and this custody was legal. It was immaterial that the sentence did not contain the words "on the public streets of Blakely." The ordinance authorized the mayor to punish those convicted under it by fine, or by requiring them to work on the public streets of the city. There was no other place where the sentence to perform labor could be carried out. It necessarily followed that the sentence, following the conviction, of a fine of $50, or the alternative of "60 days at hard labor on," could only mean a fine of $50, or the alternative sentence of 60 days hard labor on the public streets of the city of Blakely. We do not think that the sentence was in any sense doubtful. But, even if it was doubtful, it was clearly made certain by the testimony of the mayor, who had tried the movant and imposed the sentence; and in pursuance of the maxim "Id certum est quod certum reddi potest," it was competent to have the words "on the public streets of the city of Blakely" added to the sentence, as well as to insert the date of the sentence. The date, however, was immaterial, for that part of the sentence which required, as an alternative, labor upon the streets of the city would be computed, not from the date of the sentence, but from the date of the delivery of the accused to the authorities of the city in charge of working the streets with city convicts.

NUISANCE (§ 91*)—PUBLIC NUISANCES—PRESENTMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

The special presentment in this case was not subject to the demurrer filed by defendant, and the court did not err in overruling the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

Error from City Court of Covington; W. H. Whaley, Judge.

The Central Georgia Power Company was convicted of maintaining a nuisance, and brings error. Affirmed.

Walter T. Johnson and Greene F. Johnson, for plaintiff in error. R. W. Milner, Sol., for the State.

POTTLE, J. A special presentment was returned by the grand jury of Newton county against the Central Georgia Power Company, charging it with a violation of Penal Code 1910, § 681. The court overruled a demurrer to the presentment, and error is assigned upon this judgment.

The presentment alleged that the accused, on the 16th day of September, 1911, in the county of Newton, "with force and arms did erect, and did continue after notice to abate it, a nuisance which tends to annoy the community, and which tends to injure and which does injure the health of the citizens in general, by then and there creating and causing a pond of water to overflow and stand upon an area of land of 3,000 acres, which pond contains logs, stumps, limbs, and growing and decaying matter, and is producing malaria, large quantities of mosquitoes, and creating poisons in the air, and causing sickness and disease in the community surrounding said pond in said county." The demurrers were to the effect that the special presentment failed to set out any offense against the law; that it failed to describe the nature and character of the nuisance, or the location of the nuisance; that it failed to set out, either literally or in substance, the notice to abate, or the person to whom the notice was given, or when the notice was given, and further failed to set out the officer or agent of the defendant company to whom the notice was given; that it failed to describe the character of the poisons in the air, alleged to have been created, or the nature and character of the sickness and disease alleged to have been caused by the nuisance, or who were made sick, or when and where the sickness and disease ensued; that it failed to allege that the nuisance "damages all persons who come within the sphere of its operation"; that it failed to set out the manner in which the pond of water referred to in the presentment was created and caused to overflow; that it failed to describe the pond of water by boundaries, or other description, or to identify the particular stream, the obstruction of which caused the pond of water; that it failed to allege that the malaria and large quantities of mosquitoes in the air injured the health of the citizens in general, and failed to allege that the nuisance complained of is a public nuisance.

Section 681 of the Penal Code of 1910, under which the special presentment was returned, is in the following language: "Any person who shall erect, or continue after notice to abate, a nuisance which tends to annoy the community or injure the health of the citizens in general, or to corrupt the public morals, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." We do not think any of the grounds of the demurrer are well taken. While the statute makes criminal the erection, or maintenance after notice to abate, of a public nuisance, it is aimed at the particular kind of a public nuisance described in the statute, to wit, one which tends "to annoy the community, or injure the health of the citizens in general, or to corrupt the public morals." The erection, or maintenance after notice, of a nuisance such as is described in this statute, is unlawful, without reference to whether it is such a public nuisance as is described in Civil Code 1910, § 4457. An indictment is sufficient which charges an offense in the language of the statute, and describes the acts alleged as constituting the offense with sufficient fullness to put the defendant on notice of the offense with which he is charged. Glover v. State, 126 Ga., 594 (1), 55 S. E. 592. It is not necessary that the evidence should be set out in the indictment. It is only necessary that the offense should be charged in the language of the Code, or so plainly that the nature of the charge can be easily understood by the jury. Dowda v. State, 71 Ga. 12 (2).

Tested by these rules, we think that the demurrer was properly overruled. The nuisance is described as being a pond located in the county in which the indictment was found, and it is sufficiently alleged how and in what manner this pond has become a nuisance. It was certainly not necessary to describe the particular kind of poisons in the air, or the particular disease or sickness which had been caused in the community surrounding the pond, nor who were made sick. It is earnestly insisted by able counsel for plaintiff in error that the indictment should have specified and described the particular notice to abate, alleged to have been given, the person by whom it was given, and the person to whom it was given. It is to be noted that the statute does not require any particular kind of notice. It means, of course, actual notice, either written or oral; but any such notice given to any person competent to receive it would be sufficient under the statute. In order to make out this case, it would be necessary for the state to prove notice to a person authorized to receive it on behalf of the defendant company, and such a notice as would be regarded a compliance with the provisions of the statute under which the indictment was framed.

It is argued by counsel for the plaintiff in error that the power company had a right, under the laws of this state, to build and maintain a pond and dam in connection with the operation of its business, and it is insisted that, having the right to do this, the state cannot indict and punish it for an act which it was authorized to perform. But manifestly no such question as this can arise upon demurrer to this indictment. If the point is well taken, it can be made in defense to the indictment when the defendant is put on trial. The defendant is sufficiently informed of the nature and character of the offense alleged against it, and in our opinion the allegations of the presentment are sufficient as against the demurrer which was filed by the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

GRACE v. FINLEYSON et al. (No. 8,279.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.
Rehearing Denied Feb. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EXECUTION (§ 154*)—LIABILITIES ON BONDS.

In order for a levying officer suing for the use of a plaintiff in fi. fa. upon a forthcoming bond to recover, he must show both breach and damage. There is a breach if at the time and place of sale the property is not delivered, or if it is delivered in a damaged condition. However, the obligor in the bond has the right to deliver the property, though it may have been damaged while in his possession, and if he redelivers it in this condition, and it is worth more than enough to bring the amount due on the fi. fa., while there has been a breach of the bond, there is no damage; hence, no recovery can be had upon the bond.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 421-424; Dec. Dig. § 154.*]

2. EXECUTION (§§ 129, 154*)—SALE—LOCATION OF PROPERTY.

Where machinery or other cumbersome personalty of like nature is levied on, the levying officer need not move it, or cause it to be moved to the courthouse where it is to be cried off and sold, provided that he gives notice accordingly in his advertisement of the sale. Where the obligor in a bond given for the forthcoming of such property does not move it from the place where it is levied on, and the levying officer advertises that it is to be situated there at the time of the sale, and the claimant leaves it there, and it so remains until the time of sale, no breach of the bond can be claimed, though the obligor has made no actual tender of it to the levying officer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 290, 421-424; Dec. Dig. §§ 129, 154.*]

Error from Superior Court, Pulaski County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by J. L. Grace for use, etc., against L. F. Finleyson and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

H. F. Lawson, for plaintiff in error. T. C. Taylor and H. E. Coates, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. Grace, as county court bailiff of Pulaski county, levied on an engine, boiler, and other fixtures of a sawmill under an execution issued from the county court in favor of Mitchell and against the firm of Brown & Smith. Finleyson filed a claim. The claim having been withdrawn, the bailiff advertised the property for sale; the advertisement reciting that the property would be sold at public outcry at the courthouse within the legal hours of sale on the first Tuesday in April, but that, the "property being difficult and expensive to transport, it will not be carried to the place of sale, but may be seen and examined at the sawmill of the said J. L. Brown, which is located on the line of the Gulf Line Railway, a quarter of a mile south of Millerville, Ga." The property had never been moved from the place where the levy was made, and was still there at the place stated in the advertisement when the time of sale arrived. The bailiff on the day of the sale claimed a breach of the bond for a failure to redeliver the property in the condition in which it was when it was levied on, and filed suit in the city court of Pulaski county upon the bond for the use of the plaintiff in fi. fa. It appeared at the trial that the plaintiff did not actually tender the property to the bailiff, and that the bailiff took no steps to repossess himself of it, but that it was in fact at the place of sale as described in the advertisement at the time of sale, and that, while it had been injured by a fire which occurred while it was in the claimant's possession, it was still worth a great deal more than the amount of the fi. fa. against it, and that it would have brought more than that amount if offered for sale by the bailiff. The jury, under instructions from the judge of the city court, found for the defendant, and the bailiff brought certiorari. The judge of the superior court, on the hearing of the certiorari, sustained it and remanded the case to the city court for another trial, with instructions that, in order to constitute a performance of the conditions of the bond for a delivery of the property, actual tender must be made, and that notice of readiness to deliver, or the fact that the property was actually ready for delivery at the time and place of sale, is not a satisfaction of the condition; and unless defendants can show an actual tender of the property, or that the levying officer waived an actual tender or repossessed himself of the property, that a verdict be directed for the plaintiff. To this judgment the plaintiff (that is, the constable suing for use) has excepted, alleging as error that the judge of the superior court should have rendered final judgment in his favor and should not have remanded the case for a new trial.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1] To our minds there is error in the court's judgment, but not against the excepting party. We think that the judgment rendered in the city court was the correct determination of the case. In order to recover on a forthcoming bond, two things must be shown—breach and damage. Breach is shown wherever it appears that at the time and place of sale the obligor in the bond failed to deliver according to his contract all of the property in as good condition as he received it in; and in this case a breach of the bond was shown when it appeared that the property had been damaged while in the claimant's possession. But if, as we shall directly attempt to show, there was a compliance with the bond save only in respect to the condition of the property, the plaintiff cannot recover in this case, because there was no damage, since the property even in its depreciated condition was worth considerably more than enough to satisfy the plaintiff's demand. All this is provided for in the Civil Code of 1910, § 6043. Under that section the obligor in the forthcoming bond may deliver the property, notwithstanding it is not in as good condition as it was in when he received it, and is liable upon his bond for damages for deterioration, provided that in no case can damages be obtained upon the bond beyond what is necessary to satisfy the execution.

[2] 2. In our judgment the judge of the superior court was in error in holding, under the particular facts of this case, that there was a total breach of the bond, because the claimant made no actual tender of the property, though the bailiff did not agree to waive tender and did not repossess himself of the property. It must be remembered that the bailiff's seizure of the property was constructive only. He did not take it and carry it away from where it was situated. When the claimant gave bond, he did not move it. If he had moved it, all that would have been necessary on his part would have been for him to bring it and put it where the bailiff said for him to put it, according to the advertisement of the sale. The bailiff's advertisement was public notice to him, as well as to the world, that, while the actual selling or crying off of the property would take place at the courthouse, the property would not be brought there, but was to remain and to be delivered to the purchaser at the mill site where it was situated. When the day and hour of sale arrived, the claimant had the property at the very place at which he ought to have had it. Just what more he could have done we do not see. Counsel for the plaintiff in error say that he should have tendered it to the bailiff at that hour. Does he mean that he should have put this heavy machinery upon vehicles and have brought it to where the bailiff was and have offered it to him at the courthouse? We think not. The bailiff had, following the express provisions of the law, advertised that the property should be situated at the time of the sale at the mill site. He could not have moved the property there, for it was already there. Should the claimant then have gone to the courthouse and have taken the bailiff and carried him to the property? We think not. The bailiff was needed at the courthouse door to cry off the property there. Was it necessary for the claimant to say to the bailiff, "I tender you the property." We think not, for a tender of property cannot be constituted by mere words; and, if the property had not been at the place where it should have been, such words would have been wholly ineffectual for any purpose. By advertising the property for sale at the very place where the claimant had it, we think that the bailiff had waived any further act on the defendant's part. If the claimant had been in any wise resisting the bailiff's control or right of control over the property, a different question might be presented; but nothing of that kind appears. A similar proposition to the one here involved was decided in the case of Willis v. Chowning, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 625, 46 S. W. 45, where it was held that if a sheriff made what is known as a range levy—that is, a levy upon animals running on the range—by mere constructive seizure, actual redelivery was not necessary in order to satisfy a forthcoming bond, provided that at the time of sale the animals were upon the range where the constructive levy had been previously made.

As the defendants in the forthcoming bond have filed no exceptions to the granting of a new trial, we shall not reverse the judgment on that ground; but we refuse to reverse it on the exceptions filed by the plaintiff in the bond.

Judgment affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 101*)—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—REPAIRS BY TENANT.

An agent to rent has no implied power to bind the landlord by a contract to pay a stipulated sum for improvements to be made by the tenant.

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 81*)—AUTHORITY—POWER TO BIND CLIENT.

One employed as attorney at law to collect a claim for rent cannot bind the landlord by a contract to pay for improvements made on the rented premises.

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 175*)—RATIFICATION OF UNAUTHORIZED ACTS—BINDING EFFECT.

A parol ratification by an owner of land of an unauthorized written contract, made by an agent, to pay a stipulated price for improvements to be made on the land, will not be effective to bind the principal, when the improvements were made before the ratification took place, and the tenant has not acted on such ratification to his injury. *McCalla v. BROADWATER v. STATE. (No. 3,892.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PERJURY (§ 23*)—INDICTMENT—FORM OF OATH ADMINISTERED.

It is not necessary in an indictment for perjury to set out in full, either literally or in substance, the form of the oath alleged to have been administered to the defendant as a witness in the judicial investigation in which the perjury is alleged to have been committed. The jury can plainly understand this ingredient of the offense, if it is alleged in the indictment that the oath administered to the defendant was a lawful oath, and the time, place, and nature of the investigation, as well as the authority of the tribunal in which the alleged perjury is said to have been committed, are so distinctly stated as to exclude every other inference than that the oath in fact administered was in substance that prescribed by law, and that it was consciously taken by the accused when he testified as a witness. Generally the form of oath administered to a witness is immaterial, and that the oath was a lawful oath may sufficiently appear from other allegations of the accusation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perjury, Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

2. WITNESSES (§ 227*)—AUTHORITY TO ADMINISTER OATH—MUNICIPAL COURT.

An act of the General Assembly conferring power upon the municipal authorities of a town to try all violators of the ordinances of the town, and to sentence those adjudged to be guilty, and to fine them, imprison them, or compel them to work in a chain gang upon the public streets, creates, by charter, a court. Every court has power "to administer oaths in an action or proceeding pending therein, and in all other cases, when it may be necessary, in the exercise of its powers and duties." Civil Code 1910, § 4644 (5).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Dec. Dig. § 227.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 227*)—AUTHORITY TO ADMINISTER OATH—MUNICIPAL COURT.

In a trial before a municipal court composed of a board of commissioners, any member of the board may administer an oath to a witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Dec. Dig. § 227.*]

4. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 183*)—VARIANCE.

Proof that an ordinance was passed by the town council of a municipal corporation will support an allegation that the ordinance in question was passed by the general council of the same corporation. In view of the fact that the charter of Kingston provides for only one municipal body, the variance between the term "town council," as used in the charter, and the term "general council," as used in the presentment, in reference to this municipal body, is not material.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Dec. Dig. § 183.*]

5. PERJURY (§ 25*)—INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 87*)—MATERIALITY OF TESTIMONY—DATE OF OFFENSE.

It is essential that the materiality of the testimony alleged to have been false should be made to appear in the indictment, and a day certain upon which the alleged perjury was committed must be stated. In the case at bar the allegations of the indictment sufficiently conform to these requirements.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perjury, Dec. Dig. § 25;* Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 244-255; Dec. Dig. § 87.*]

6. DEMURRER OVERRULED—NO ERROR.

There was no error in overruling the demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Bartow County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

L. S. Broadwater was convicted of perjury, and brings error. Affirmed.

M. B. Eubanks, for plaintiff in error. T. C. Milner, Sol. Gen., and Geo. W. Stevens, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Exception is taken to a judgment overruling a demurrer filed to a presentment against the plaintiff in error for the offense of perjury. Without insisting too strongly upon the maxim, "Demurrer, being a critic, must itself be free from imperfections" (Douglas, Augusta & Gulf Ry. Co. v. Swindle, 2 Ga. App. 550, 556, 59 S. E. 600, 602), which might be applied to at least one of the special demurrers, we have fully considered each of the objections sought to be presented.

[1] 1. It is insisted, in the first place, that the alleged lawful oath is not set out in the body of the indictment, and that the facts alleged do not show that the oath was a lawful oath, or that the defendant was sworn as a witness in any case. It is plain, from the allegation of the indictment, that the board of commissioners of the town of Kingston were sitting as such to try one Charles Davenport for a violation of Ordinance No. 39, which is quoted in the presentment. This is a sufficient statement of the case. It is as ample as if the case had been described as Board of Commissioners of the Town of Kingston v. Charles Davenport, or Town Council of Kingston v. Charles Davenport, charged with a violation of Ordinance No. 39. It is not seriously insisted that it is necessary to set out in totidem verbis the oath actually administered upon the trial. Of course, it is necessary that it should be properly alleged that the oath administered to the witness Broadwater on the trial of Davenport was a lawful oath, and it may be that this statement, without more, in the indictment, could be treated as a mere conclusion of the pleader, though we are inclined to doubt this. But certain it is that the allegations in reference to the administration of the oath and the proceeding in which it was administered set forth sufficient facts to enable the jury and the defendant to understand that the accused in the investigation referred to obligated himself to speak truly in regard to the material matter in relation to which he is alleged to have testified knowingly, willfully, and absolutely falsely. It is not necessary in an indictment for perjury to set out in full, either literally or in substance, the form of the oath alleged to have been administered to the defendant as a witness in the judicial investigation in which the perjury is alleged to have been committed. The jury can plainly understand this ingredient of the offense if it is alleged in the indictment that the oath administered to the defendant was a lawful oath, and the time, place, and nature of the investigation, as well as the authority of the tribunal in which the alleged perjury is said to have been committed, are so distinctly stated as to exclude every other inference than that the oath in fact administered was in substance that prescribed by law, and that it was consciously taken by the accused when he testified as a witness. Generally the form of oath administered to a witness is immaterial, and that the oath was a lawful oath may sufficiently appear from other allegations of the accusation.

There are some specific exceptions, such as the form of oath prescribed before the grand jury, which vary slightly from the usual form of oath prescribed for a witness upon the trial of the case. But, where perjury is assigned upon testimony falsely delivered before a grand jury, it will be assumed that the lawful oath charged by the indictment to have been administered was that prescribed to be administered to witnesses before the grand jury; and if, upon the trial, it appears that the required oath was not administered, the defendant will be entitled to the advantage to be derived from a variance between the allegations and the proof. We hardly think, however, that the indictment would be demurrable; if it be alleged that the witness was sworn before the grand jury, and that the oath administered to him was a lawful oath. And so in this case, it being stated in the indictment that the accused appeared as a witness on a certain day, in a case in the municipal court of Kingston, in the trial of one accused of a violation of a city ordinance, and that a lawful oath was administered to him as such witness, it is easily to be understood that the charge of the indictment upon this part of the case is that a form of oath legally suitable to the nature of the investigation then pending was administered to him; in other words, that he swore to tell the truth in the case which was actually on trial, and which he understood to be on trial. As to all matters material to the issue with reference to which he testified, the solemn assumption of an obligation to speak the truth, consciously assumed by the witness in the investigation pending, is more important than the form of the words in which the oath is administered to him. It would seem to us that if the witness had sworn that his testimony in this case would be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, the oath administered to him would have been a lawful oath. Clark's Cr. L. 385; Whart. Cr. L. p. 1287; Bishop's Cr. Pr. §§ 902, 912, par. 2.

[2] 2. The third ground of the demurrer challenges the authority of Griffin (who is alleged to have administered it) to administer, as one of the board of commissioners of the town of Kingston and as president of the board, the oath alleged; and in the eighth ground it is insisted that the board of commissioners of the town of Kingston was not a court, and had no jurisdiction as a court, nor any authority to summon, swear, or hear witnesses. In the original charter granted to the town of Kingston (Acts 1869, p. 81), the board of commissioners was given power to pass such rules and ordinances for the good government and order of said town, the collection of town taxes, the punishment of disorderly conduct, the preservation of peace and quiet, and the protection of the citizens of, and persons visiting, said town, as it might think necessary and proper, and to assess fines, in its discretion, not exceeding $100, for the violation of any of such rules or ordinances; but there was no express grant of power to try the offenders. By the act of 1895 (Acts 1895, p. 242, § 2), the charter was amended, and it was provided that "any person or persons violating any of the laws or ordinances of said town shall be tried therefor by said board of commissioners, and on conviction thereof" shall be punished as prescribed in this section. An act of the General Assembly conferring power upon the municipal authorities to try all violators of the ordinances of the town, and to sentence those adjudged to be guilty, and to fine them, imprison them, or compel them to work in a chain gang upon the public streets, creates, by charter, a court. Swafford v. Berrong, 84 Ga. 65, 10 S. E. 593. Every court has power to administer oaths in an action or proceeding pending therein, and in all other cases when it may be necessary, in the exercise of its powers and duties. Civil Code 1910, § 4644 (5).

[3-5] 3-5. The rulings in the third, fourth, and fifth headnotes require no elaboration. It is only necessary to say, in explanation of the fifth headnote, that the ordinance for a violation of which Davenport was being tried in the municipal court was one forbidding any person to be drunk or disorderly on the streets of the town of Kingston, and it is alleged that the accused, as a witness, swore on the trial of Davenport that the latter "was not drunk on the day and date aforesaid, and that he had been with Charles Davenport from 1 o'clock to about 4:30 o'clock p. m., and that Charles Davenport had not drunk a drop." Clearly this testimony was material to the issue before the court. As to the matter of the date, nothing can be said, except that the indictment alleges distinctly that the day on which the perjury was committed, and the day with relation to which the witness testified, were the same day. As such a state of facts is not impossible, the demurrer fails to present any point for consideration. If upon the trial it should appear that the day with reference to which the defendant testified was a different day from the one on which Davenport was accused of being drunk, even then, perhaps, no question would be presented; for the state is not compelled to prove that the perjury was committed on the exact date alleged in the presentment.

[6] 6. There was no error in overruling the demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 725*)—EXCEPTIONS—SCOPE AND SUFFICIENCY.

Where suit is brought on a promissory note, and the defendant's plea is stricken and judgment entered up against him for the full amount sued for, a bill of exceptions containing a general exception to the final judgment, and an exception to and a specific assignment of error upon the ruling striking the plea, sufficiently brings into question the correctness of the ruling.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 725.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 354*)—MOTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF ANSWER.

As against an oral motion to dismiss made at the trial term a plea to a suit upon a promissory note, distinctly alleging that the defendants have paid to the plaintiffs either in cash or its equivalent more than the amount sued for, and that the overpayments were made through mistake and in ignorance of the sum really due on the note at the time the overpayments were made, is good, both as a plea of payment and as a cross-action to recover the overpayments.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1092-1095; Dec. Dig. § 854.*]

Error from City Court of Cairo; J. R. Singletary, Judge.

Action by J. W. Cochran & Sons against E. E. Prince & Sons. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

J. Q. Smith, for plaintiffs in error. Roscoe Luke, R. C. Bell, and Ira Carlisle, for defendants in error.

POTTLE, J. This was a suit upon two promissory notes. The defendants filed a plea setting up that they had paid the plaintiffs more than the amount due on the notes by $210.75. It was alleged that the different amounts had been paid to the plaintiffs from time to time upon designated dates, but that the plaintiffs had failed to credit these payments on the notes sued on. It was further averred that the overpayments had been made through mistake and in ignorance of the amount really due. The defendants prayed that they might recover from the plaintiffs the amount thus overpaid. On oral motion at the trial the judge struck the defendants' pleas and entered up judgment for the full amount sued for. The defendants have sued out their writ of error to this court.

The bill of exceptions contains a general assignment of error on the judgment striking the defendants' pleas. Error is also assigned upon the refusal of the court to allow the pleas to be amended "in any respect whatever," but it is not alleged that any amendment was offered, and no copy of the amendment is set out in the bill of exceptions or attached thereto as an exhibit. The bill of exceptions then recites that after striking the defendants' pleas the court rendered a judgment for the full amount sued for "to which judgment defendants then and there excepted and now except and assign same as error."

[1] 1. A motion to dismiss the writ of error has been made upon the ground that the assignments of error in the bill of exceptions are not sufficiently specific. There is no merit in this motion. The proper practice in such cases was laid down by the Supreme Court in the case of Lyndon v. Georgia Ry. & Elec. Co., 129 Ga. 353, 58 S. E. 1047, to the effect that, where there is an exception to a final judgment, exception may also be taken to any antecedent ruling of the court during the progress of the trial. Of course, a judgment for the full amount sued for was the inevitable result of the antecedent ruling of the court in striking the defendants' pleas, and the real complaint of the plaintiffs in error is not that final judgment was entered up, but that their pleas were stricken. As we understand the ruling of the Supreme Court in the Lyndon Case, the assignments of error in the present bill of exceptions are sufficient to bring before this court the judgment striking the defendants' pleas. The exception to the refusal of the court to allow the defendants to amend will not be considered, because no amendment is set out in the bill of exceptions or attached thereto as an exhibit.

[2] 2. Upon special demurrer, a plea of payment is bad, unless it allege when, how, and to whom payment is made. Kahrs v. Kahrs, 115 Ga. 288, 41 S. E. 649. But there was no special demurrer in this case. As against a general demurrer or an oral motion to dismiss made at the trial term, upon the ground that no defense is set forth, a plea of payment is good which alleges in distinct terms that the defendant has paid to the plaintiff in cash or its equivalent the full amount of the note sued on. The plea in the present case was certainly good as a plea of payment. We are also of the opinion that as against an oral motion to dismiss, the plea and prayer, in so far as a recovery is sought for overpayments, is good. The defendants allege that the money was paid through mistake, that they did not have access to their notes, and, the proper credits not having been made by the plaintiffs from time to time, they were unable to tell just what amount was due on the notes. This plea was subject to special demurrer, but we do not think that it should have been dismissed upon oral motion made at the trial term.

Judgment reversed.

HEARD v. STATE. (No. 3,860.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 169*)—KEEPING AT PLACE OF BUSINESS—EVIDENCE.

One occupying the relation of employé to the owner of a livery stable cannot, although he works in the stable, be convicted, either of keeping intoxicating liquors at a public place, or of keeping such liquors on hand at his place of business, when the uncontradicted evidence discloses affirmatively that the liquors were not his, and wholly fails to show that he aided or abetted the owner in storing the liquors in the stable, or had any knowledge that they were there.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 169.*]

Error from City Court of La Grange; Frank Harwell, Judge.

Will Heard was convicted of selling intoxicating liquors, and brings error. Reversed.

M. U. Mooty and E. A. Jones, for plaintiff in error. Henry Reeves, Sol., for the State.

POTTLE, J. Heard was tried and convicted under an accusation charging him with keeping intoxicating liquors at a public place, and with keeping such liquors on hand at his place of business. Taken most favorably for the state, as it must be, the material evidence was as follows: The accused was a bookkeeper in a livery stable owned by one Scott. About two months before the warrant was issued, some six or eight casks of whisky and several barrels of beer were found in a cellar under the livery stable, and connected with the stable by means of a trapdoor. All of the casks, except one, were "marked to W. L. Heard at Standing Rock, Alabama." The key to the trapdoor was obtained from Scott by the officer who made the search. Heard could not unlock the trapdoor, because he was paralyzed and crippled in both arms. The whisky was the property of Scott, and the accused had no interest in it. The whisky was ordered by Scott in Heard's name, and with his consent, to be sent to Standing Rock, Ala., to be conveyed thence to Dadeville, in Alabama, where Scott had some negroes doing grading for a railroad company. The whisky came to Standing Rock, and Scott instructed Beall, one of his employes, to take the whisky from Standing Rock to Dadeville, and did not know that Beall had brought it to his place of business in West Point until it was found there by the officer who made the search. It does not appear how or by what agency the beer reached the cellar of Scott's stable, nor who owned it. There is no evidence from which it could be inferred that the accused had any knowledge that either the whisky or the beer was in the stable, or that he was connected in any way, directly or indirectly, with having it brought there.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Manifestly the conviction cannot stand. Granting that Scott knew the liquor was there, guilty knowledge of the employer cannot be imputed to the employe. If the evidence had shown that the accused had confederated with Scott or abetted him in the illegal act, he would be guilty. In this case, proof of knowledge by Heard that Scott was keeping the whisky in his place of business, coupled with the fact that the accused allowed the use of his name to bring the liquors to a nearby town in Alabama, might authorize a finding that he was so connected with the illegal act as to make him guilty. But mere consent, without more, to have the liquors shipped in his name to another state does not make the accused guilty. The conviction rests wholly upon suspicion, and must be set aside.

This case upon its facts differs from Toles v. State, 73 S. E. 597, in that, in the latter case, there were circumstances authorizing a finding that Toles aided and abetted the employer in the illegal act.

Error from City Court of Miller County; M. C. Edwards, Judge.

Action by the D. E. Luther Publishing Company, for the use of the Phillips-Boyd Publishing Company, against L. L. Musgrove. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. I. Geer, for plaintiff in error. Bush & Stapleton, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. During the March term of the city court of Miller county, a suit upon an open account sounding, "Phillips-Boyd Publishing Company v. L. L. Musgrove," was called for trial. Over objection of the defendant the plaintiff was allowed to amend his petition by striking the name of the Phillips-Boyd Publishing Company as plaintiff, and substituting in lieu thereof the name of D. E. Luther Publishing Company, suing for the use of the Phillips-Boyd Publishing Company. Exceptions pendente lite were duly filed to the order of the court allowing this amendment, and error has been assigned in this court upon such exceptions.

[1] It appears that the Luther Publishing Company had been adjudicated a bankrupt and that its assets, including the account sued on, had been sold to the Phillips-Boyd Publishing Company. Under the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 5689, the plaintiff had the right to amend his petition by substituting the name of the D. E. Luther Publishing Company, suing for the plaintiff's use. It was argued in the brief of counsel for both sides, and the record transmitted to this court shows, that the case was originally filed in the name of the D. E. Luther Publishing Company as plaintiff; that at a previous term of the court, over objection of defendant's counsel, the plaintiff was allowed to amend by striking the name of this plaintiff and substituting that of the Phillips-Boyd Publishing Company in its stead, and that exceptions pendente lite were duly filed by the defendant to this ruling. Counsel for the plaintiff in error insists in his brief that, this original ruling being wrong, the court had no power at a subsequent term to correct the error by restoring the name of the original plaintiff as a party suing for the use of the Phillips-Boyd Publishing Company. This position of counsel for plaintiff in error is very probably correct; but there is no assignment of error in the present bill of exceptions which authorizes this court to pass upon such a question. As to this point the only complaint made in the bill of exceptions is that the court permitted the Phillips-Boyd Publishing Company to substitute the name of the D. E. Luther Publishing Company as plaintiff suing for its use. We are compelled to deal with the case as if it had been originally brought in the name of the Phillips-Boyd Publishing Company. There is no merit in this assignment of error, and we cannot look to the record for the purpose of ascertaining that an antecedent error was committed by the court, of which no complaint is made in the bill of exceptions.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 30, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FALSE PRETENSES (§§ 28, 32, 38*)—INDICTMENT—VARIANCE.

In an indictment for the offense of cheating and swindling by obtaining money through false and fraudulent statements and representations, the ownership of the money thus obtained and the name of the person cheated and defrauded should be stated; and the proof in support of these essential allegations must be in strict conformity therewith; otherwise the variance will be fatal. 2 Bishop's New Criminal Procedure, § 184.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 33, 42-44, 50-53; Dec. Dig. §§ 28, 32, 38; Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 42-44.]

2. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 38*)—INDICTMENT—VARIANCE.

An allegation in an indictment for cheating and swindling that the person "cheated and defrauded" was Robert Hutchinson is not supported by proof that the bank of which Robert Hutchinson was assistant cashier was in fact cheated and defrauded by the presentation of a check to Hutchinson as such assistant cashier, accompanied by certain false and fraudulent representations relating to the check, which induced Hutchinson as cashier to cash the check out of the funds of the bank. Under these facts, the bank, and not Hutchinson as an individual, was cheated and defrauded. The fact that Hutchinson subsequently discovered that the bank check cashed by him for the accused out of the money of the bank of which he was cashier was worthless and that he had been deceived by the false representations made to him in reference thereto, and paid the loss thus incurred by the bank, did not change the character of the transaction. The offense was complete when Hutchinson as cashier paid out the money of the bank for the worthless check induced to do so by the false and fraudulent representations then made to him by the accused; and the subsequent act of Hutchinson in making good the loss to the bank did not have the legal effect of relating back to the time when the act of cheating and swindling was fully accomplished and of making him the person cheated and defrauded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 50-53; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

Error from City Court of La Grange; Frank Harwell, Judge.

W. R. O'Neal was convicted of cheating and swindling, and brings error. Reversed.

The indictment alleged, in substance, that W. R. O'Neal "did defraud and cheat Robert Hutchinson in the sum and out of thirty dollars in money, of the value of thirty dollars, by using the following deceitful means and artful practice, to wit: On said day and date O'Neal presented to said Robert Hutchinson, assistant cashier of the La Grange National Bank, a corporation, a check on the Third National Bank of Atlanta, for thirty dollars, and payable to order of said W. R. O'Neal, and purporting to be signed by W. J. O'Neal, for the purpose of having the same cashed, and the same was cashed at the said La Grange National Bank by said Hutchinson, the said Hutchinson relying upon representation made by said W. R. O'Neal that said check was good and would be paid upon presentation; and, said Hutchinson believing that said check was good and would be paid when presented to said Third National Bank of Atlanta, he, said Hutchinson, said assistant cashier, paid to said W. R. O'Neal said sum of thirty dollars in money of value of thirty dollars on and for said check which was worthless, and said W. R. O'Neal knew was worthless, and payment of said check was refused by said Third National Bank, no funds being in said Third National Bank subject to said check, all of which said W. R. O'Neal knew, and knowing his said representation to be false, which was false and intended to be false, and by reason of said false representation said Hutchinson was defrauded and cheated as aforesaid in the sum of thirty dollars."

It is admitted that the evidence proved all the allegations of the indictment except the allegation as to the person who was defrauded and cheated, and as to the ownership of the $30. The evidence illustrating these two allegations was that Robert Hutchinson as assistant cashier paid the check presented to him by the accused "with the funds of the La Grange National Bank," and that the $30 so paid out by Hutchinson as assistant cashier was not his property, but was the property of the La Grange National Bank. The assistant cashier testified that after the check which he had cashed out of the funds of the bank had been returned to the bank it remained in the cash drawer of the bank as a cash item against him for about two days, and that then he took the $30 out of his pocket and "made it good to the bank," that this was in accordance with the custom of the bank that, where any loss accrued to the bank through his work, it was to be sustained by him. There was no printed rule on the subject, but the bank required him to make the loss good where it occurred by his negligence or fault.

It is alleged that the court erred in refusing a timely written request of the defendant that the jury be instructed as follows: "If you find that the defendant defrauded the La Grange National Bank by presenting to its officers this check in evidence, and you find that R. E. Hutchinson did not sustain a loss until after he had ascertained and knew the check was worthless, if it was worthless, and R. E. Hutchinson paid the check, knowing it was worthless at the time he paid it, then the defendant would not be guilty in this case."

Error from City Court of Miller County; C. C. Bush, Judge.

Dick Bush was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

W. I. Geer, for plaintiff in error. P. D. Rich, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. Before the arraignment of the plaintiff in error, he filed a plea in abatement, which the court struck, and this ruling is the ground of exception presented by the writ of error.

[1] The plea in abatement conforms to the requirements laid down in McRae v. State, 71 Ga. 99, Mize v. State, 135 Ga. 295, 69 S. E. 173, Folds v. State, 123 Ga. 167, 51 S. E. 305, and Wall v. State, 128 Ga. 549, 55 S. E. 484, in that it was filed at the proper time; for, this being an accusation, of course there had been no opportunity for the defendant to sooner object. However, in our opinion the court properly struck the plea in abatement, for the reason that the title of the acting solicitor of the city court could not be brought in question by this plea. The court judicially knew that Mr. Rich was the duly commissioned solicitor of the city court of Miller county, and, taking all of the allegations of the plea to be true, he was at least the de facto officer of the court.

[2] Furthermore, the plea was defective, in that there was no statement that the office of the solicitor of the city court had been judicially ascertained to be vacant in a legal sense by reason of the fact that it had been judicially ascertained that Mr. Rich had moved his residence from the county of Miller to the county of Decatur. The exact point was decided by the Supreme Court in the case of Channell v. State, 109 Ga. 152, 34 S. E. 354, in which Justice Lewis, delivering the opinion of the court, holds: "Section 229 of the Political Code [1895] prescribes how offices in this state may be vacated, and one of the methods (see subdivision 5) for vacation is: 'By the incumbent ceasing to be a resident of the county, circuit, or district for which he was elected. In the first case the office shall be vacated immediately; in the latter cases, from the time the fact is judicially ascertained.' It is manifest from this provision that, when an incumbent of an office has moved from the county for which he was elected to another county in this state, the office is not thereby immediately vacated, and does not become so until the fact has been judicially ascertained." It can readily be seen that the court was not called upon to try two issues at once. The validity of Mr. Rich's title to the office, and the guilt of the accused, are not one and the same proceeding.

The proper method of testing the validity of Mr. Rich's title was by quo warranto, brought by any one interested in the office, and, as ruled by the Supreme Court, any citizen may file the writ, because all are interested in the proper discharge of the duties of the office and the proper qualifications of the incumbent. Whitehurst v. Jones, 117 Ga. 803, 45 S. E. 49, and cases cited. However, loss of citizenship does not result from a change of residence not intended to be permanent. By demurring to the plea in abatement the solicitor of the city court admitted, for the purposes of that particular hearing, that he had changed his residence; but it is not altogether clear from the allegations of the plea that, if the plea had not been demurred to the evidence would have sustained the proposition that the office had become vacant by the removal of Mr. Rich from the county of Miller to the county of Decatur. There must be either the tacit or the explicit intention of an expression to change one's domicile before there is a change of legal residence. While it is provided in Civil Code, § 2181, that the domicile of a married man shall be the place where his family resides, the wife (if there be only a wife) or the wife and family, may, for purposes of temporary convenience, or recuperation from ill health, or for the purpose of educating the children, reside for a long time at a place not intended as a permanent abode, without affecting any change of legal residence; this for the reason that, while there is a physical removal, there was never, at any time, an intention on the part of those who moved to abandon the former domicile.

Russell, J., dissenting.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by T. B. Wallace against the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

John A. Boykin and Dorsey & Shelton, for plaintiff in error. Smith, Hammond & Smith, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. Wallace brought suit against the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company to recover the sum of $167.82, which the plaintiff had paid to the company in premiums on a certain life insurance policy, and which, he alleged, he was entitled to recover on account of the wrongful and illegal cancellation of his policy by the defendant company. At the conclusion of the evidence, the trial judge directed a verdict in favor of the defendant, and this is the error assigned.

1, 2. The policy of insurance was issued on March 31, 1904, and provided for the payment of annual premiums of $40 on March 31st of each year, beginning with the date of the issuance of the policy. One of the conditions of the policy was that "premiums are payable at the home office in the city of New York, but at the pleasure of the company suitable persons may be authorized to receive such payments at other places, but only on the production of the company's receipts signed by the secretary, and countersigned by the persons receiving the payments. The plaintiff was allowed, some time after the issuance of the policy, to change the manner of payment of his premiums to quarterly installments of $10.64 each. It appears from the evidence that up to the fall of 1907 the plaintiff was an employé of the defendant company at its branch office in Atlanta; and that he paid his premiums at the office where he was employed. In the fall of 1907, he left the service of the company, and from that time until March, 1908, he paid two quarterly premiums to a collector of the company, who called at the plaintiff's office in the Candler building for this purpose. It was a custom of the company in Atlanta to send out agents to collect the premiums due from its policy holders, and these agents would call, either at the residence, or the business office, of the policy holder, as the latter might prefer. It was also a custom of the company to allow a period of 30 days after the premium became due, under the terms of the policy, within which the same might be paid.

A quarterly premium was due by the plaintiff on March 31, 1908, and under this custom could have been paid at any time up to and including April 30, 1908. This premium was not paid within the grace period; but on May 1, 1908, the plaintiff wrote a letter to the president of the company, addressed to its home office in New York, inclosing a draft for the quarterly premium and also the amount of a premium due by his wife, and asking that the same be accepted. In this letter the plaintiff stated that on April 30th a young lady stenographer at the office of the company in Atlanta called him up on the telephone, and notified him that his premium was due. In this letter the plaintiff also complains at great length of the conduct of certain officers of the company in Atlanta, and of his discharge from the service of the company in 1907, and also because the company's collector failed to call upon him to collect the quarterly premium which he inclosed in the letter.

On May 14, 1908, one of the vice presidents of the company in New York wrote to the company's superintendent in Atlanta, inclosing the plaintiff's draft, and suggesting to the superintendent that there was no reason why a representative of the company might not call at the plaintiff's office to collect his premiums. The superintendent was advised by the vice president that "you can do as you please about making any arrangement such as he desires." The letter further stated: "We are willing to accept the premiums, notwithstanding the grace period has expired under both policies, and although Wallace tells us in his letter that his wife is an uninsurable risk, but if you decide that it will not be convenient to have calls made at his office for collection of these premiums at the time he elects, he should be plainly told that this is the last time we will accept premiums not tendered within the grace period." The last paragraph of this letter was as follows: "We omitted to tell you that Wallace deducted from his remittance ten cents to cover the cost of draft and four cents to cover postage. He, of course, had no right to do this, but we would rather allow it to him than to have a squabble, if you decide that it is best for the company to accept the premiums and reinstate the business." On May 19th Wright, the superintendent, wrote to the plaintiff that if he would come to the office he would assist him in straightening out "these matters which have been referred to me."

On May 26th, no reply having been received from the plaintiff to the last letter, the superintendent again wrote that, unless plaintiff would come to the office within the next day or two, the papers would be returned to the New York office, and he could settle with the officials there. On June 1st the plaintiff wrote the superintendent, stating that he could be found at his office in the afternoon, between certain hours; and that if the superintendent would call on the plaintiff at his office the plaintiff would take the matter up with him. On June 9, 1908, the New York office returned the plaintiff his draft. On the lapsed policy register for the week commencing June 14, 1908, a notation was made that the plaintiff's policy had been canceled.

Upon these facts, the plaintiff insists that the judge erred in directing a verdict in favor of the defendant. In our opinion, the trial judge was clearly right in his construction of the evidence. The plaintiff relied upon a course of dealing varying the express terms of his contract, and also upon a waiver by the defendant company of the forfeiture of his policy, after it had taken place, on account of the nonpayment of his premiums.

[1] In the first place, there was no course of dealing shown under which policy holders had been permitted to pay their premiums after the expiration of 30 days of grace allowed. It does appear that there was a custom of the company allowing this 30 days grace, and also that the company sent out agents for the purpose of collecting the premiums; but there is no suggestion in the evidence that the company had any custom, or that it had, by any previous course of dealing, led the plaintiff to believe that he could pay his premium after the expiration of the 30-day period. But, even if such a custom existed, the company had a right to discontinue it, upon notice to a policy holder who had theretofore been receiving the benefit of such a custom.

[2] It distinctly appears from the letter of the plaintiff to the president of the company that on April 30th, the last day upon which the premium could have been paid, one of the employees of the defendant company called the plaintiff up over the telephone, and reminded him that his premium was due. The plaintiff testified that he had talked with the stenographer at the Atlanta office, but could not remember whether it was in April, or when; but the fair inference from all of his testimony is that his conversation with the stenographer is the one referred to in his letter. This conversation with an employee of the company over the telephone was sufficient to have put the plaintiff on notice that his premium receipt was at the office of the company, ready to be delivered to him upon payment of his premium, and was in effect notice to the plaintiff that the company expected him to call at the office and pay his premium. We think that there is nothing in the evidence which would have authorized the jury to find that there was a custom or course of dealing on the part of the defendant company which authorized the plaintiff to withhold his premium beyond the 30-day period, which had theretofore been allowed to him purely as a matter of grace.

[3] 3. Nor was there anything in the evidence which would have authorized the jury to find that the company had waived the forfeiture, which took place at midnight on April 30th, by reason of the plaintiff's failure to pay his premium before that time. It is earnestly insisted by counsel for the plaintiff in error that the letter of the vice president to the superintendent at the Atlanta office had this effect; but we do not think this is a fair construction of that letter. The substance of the letter was that, while the writer representing the company was perfectly willing to accept the premium and reinstate the plaintiff's policy, yet, at the same time, this was a matter under the direct jurisdiction of the Atlanta office; and it was left to the local superintendent to decide whether it was for the best interests of the company to accept the premium and reinstate the policy. It is true that the letters from the superintendent to the plaintiff indicate that in all probability, if the plaintiff had called at the office of the company in Atlanta, as he was invited to do, the superintendent would have adjusted the matter satisfactorily to the plaintiff. But in none of these letters was there any agreement to do this; and, besides, it appears that the plaintiff did not accept the invitation and call at the office to arrange the matter, as he was requested to do.

Some stress is laid by counsel upon the fact that the company failed to note any cancellation of the policy on its register until the week beginning June 15, 1908, and counsel argue from this that the forfeiture of the plaintiff's policy was in abeyance until that time. But we cannot agree to this proposition. The forfeiture took place, under the terms of the policy, as modified by the custom, about which plaintiff testified, at midnight on April 30, 1908. In order to reinstate the policy, some affirmative act upon the part of the officials of the company amounting to a waiver of the forfeiture was necessary. Mere omission to record it upon the lapsed register until June 15th, or after, could not in any way affect this question.

Retention by the company of the plaintiff's draft, under the circumstances, would not amount to a waiver. A draft is not payment until it is paid. The company did not collect the draft, and ultimately returned it to the plaintiff, who accepted it. In addition to this, the evidence shows that all during the time the company held this draft its officials were making an effort to arrange matters to the satisfaction of the plaintiff. The failure to have his policy reinstated was not due to any lack of diligence or fair dealing on the part of the officials of the defendant company, but was directly due to the plaintiff's own conduct in failing to respond to a very reasonable request on the part of the defendant company's officials that he meet them at their office for the purpose of discussing the matter. There was no error in directing a verdict in favor of the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

RUSSELL, J. (dissenting). I do not think the evidence with reference to the waiver or nonwaiver of the forfeiture on the part of the insurance company is so clear as to have demanded the verdict directed by the court. It is perfectly plain to my mind that the insurer had the right to insist upon the forfeiture at midnight of April 30th; but it requires an absolutely plain case to authorize the court to do more than to define to a jury the meaning of the word "waiver." The proof of waiver is derived from evidence of intention, as developed by the acts and declarations of the parties concerned, and is a question of fact to be determined by a jury. In my opinion, the evidence would have authorized a jury to reach a different conclusion, upon the issue as to whether there was a waiver of the forfeiture, from that implied by the direction of the verdict. Especially is this true when it is the duty of the courts to be "prompt to seize hold of any circumstance that indicates an election to waive a forfeiture, or an agreement to do so." Insurance Company v. Eggleston, 98

A contract contained the following clause: "The J. R. Barnes Coal Company agrees to sell and ship to the Southland Knitting Mills 40 cars straight run of mine coal from Brushy Mountain coal mines, to be delivered at the rate of 3 or 4 cars per month." The trial judge construed this clause as follows: "A contract of delivery of 40 cars of coal, to be delivered at the rate of 3 or 4 cars per month, would imply that there would be required from 10 to 12 months in delivery at the rate of 3 or 4 cars per month; it being the evident intention of the parties that the shipments should be at intervals comparatively regular." Held a reasonable and proper interpretation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 217-223; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

2. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—RESCISSION OF CONTRACT.

Irrespective of the foregoing clause of the contract, there was evidence upon which the jury could have found that the contract had been rescinded by mutual consent, so far as the 2 cars of coal were concerned.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 66*)—REVIEW—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

There being in the bill of exceptions no exception to any final judgment, but only an exception to a judgment striking the defendant's pleas, no question is presented which this court has jurisdiction to decide. This is true, even though there is a recital in the bill of exceptions that the case was finally terminated by a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. Simmons v. Peagler, 7 Ga. App. 252, 66 S. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. MCGUIRE. (No. 3,444.)(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.
Rehearing Denied Feb. 12, 1912.)(Syllabus by the Court.)1. TRIAL (§ 237)—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

The first ground of the amended motion challenges the correctness of the charge "that moral and reasonable certainty is all that can be expected in legal investigations," as applicable to a civil case. This is a general principle codified in section 5730 of the Civil Code of 1910, defining the amount of mental conviction required in all cases; and when this instruction was followed by the statement, contained in the same section, "that in all civil cases a preponderance of the testimony is considered sufficient to produce such mental conviction," it was not injuriously inapplicable to the civil case on trial. 7 Michie's Enc. Digest of Georgia Reports, §§ 654, 655, par. 6.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 542, 548-551; Dec. Dig. § 237.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 234*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUISITES AND SUFFICIENCY—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The following excerpt from the charge is excepted to in the second ground of the amended motion: "The burden of proof in this case is upon the plaintiff. It is incumbent upon him to establish by proof the material allegations of his petition that are not admitted by the defendant. After proving the fact and degree of the injury, if the plaintiff will show himself not to blame, the law then presumes, until the contrary appears, that the defendant company was to blame; or, if he will show, on the other hand, that the defendant company was to blame, the law presumes, until the contrary appears, that the plaintiff was not to blame. So that to make a prima facie case and change the burden of proof the plaintiff need not go further than to show by evidence one or the other of these two propositions—either that the plaintiff was not to blame, or that the defendant was to blame. The defendant company, taking at this stage the burden of proof, can defend successfully by disproving either proposition. The disproof of both is not necessary; but until one or the other shall be overcome, the defense is not complete." Held no error for any reason assigned, or for any other reason. Civil Code 1910, §§ 2780, 5746; Georgia Railroad Co. v. Kenney, 58 Ga. 489; Hopkins on Personal Injuries, §§ 39, 67, and cases cited.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 187*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUISITES AND SUFFICIENCY—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

The instructions excepted to in the third and fourth grounds of the amended motion for a new trial, to the effect that the jury were the exclusive judges of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses, and the rules there given for determining as to credibility, are substantially in the language of the Code, and, in the absence of any request for a more specific charge on the subject, were sufficient. Civil Code 1910, § 5883; Quiggle v. Vining, 125 Ga. 100, 54 S. E. 74; Greer v. State, 6 Ga. App. 785, 65 S. E. 802.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 187.*]

4. NEGLIGENCE (§ 11*)—NATURE AND ELEMENTS—LIABILITY.

The following excerpt from the charge of the court is excepted to in the fifth ground of the amended motion for a new trial: "If a person is wrongfully placed in a position of peril, whereby he is led to make a reasonable and natural effort to escape the threatened danger, the party so placing him in such position is responsible for the consequences of such effort." Held: (1) Correct as an abstract principle of law; (2) applicable to the facts of the case sub judice; (3) not erroneous for any of the reasons assigned. Self v. Adel Lumber Co., 5 Ga. App. 846, 64 S. E. 112; Southwestern R. Co. v. Paulk, 24 Ga. 356; Georgia Ry. & Electric Co. v. Gilleland, 183 Ga. 629, 66 S. E. 944.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 259*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—NECESSITY.

In the absence of a timely written request, it is not error to fail to charge on the rules of law governing the impeachment of witnesses; and this is true, although the witness alleged to have been successfully impeached was the plaintiff, and his right to recover depended on the truth of his evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 648; Dec. Dig. § 259.*]

6. EXCEPTION TO CHARGE—ASSESSMENT OF DAMAGES.

The exception to the charge on the rule for estimating damages for pain and suffering, and the measure of damages in such cases, is without merit. The charge on this subject was substantially in accord with repeated rulings of the Supreme Court. Hopkins on Personal Injuries, pp. 658 and 662, inclusive, and cases cited.

7. EXCEPTION TO INSTRUCTIONS—NO ERROR.

The exceptions to the instructions contained in the eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth grounds of the amended motion for new trial, when considered in connection with the general instructions, are without merit.

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 143*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—RULES—NOTICE.

On giving the following requested instruction, "If the plaintiff receipted for the rule book, and received a copy of it, then he was bound to know the rules," it was not error to qualify it by adding, "If he had time to read and study them before the accident." It is the duty of an employer, not only to give notice of the existence of rules, but so to promulgate them as to afford an employé a reasonable opportunity of ascertaining their terms. Port Royal & Western Carolina Ry. Co. v. Davis, 95 Ga. 292 (3), 22 S. E. 833.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 286; Dec. Dig. § 143.*]

9. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—ASSESSMENT—INSTRUCTIONS.

The evidence in behalf of the plaintiff showing permanent injuries, there was no error in charging in the form suggested in the case of Florida Central R. R. Co. v. Burney, 98 Ga. 1, 26 S. E. 730, as to the method for estimating the damages and the use of the mortality and annuity tables. Savannah, Florida & W. Ry. Co. v. Austin, 104 Ga. 614, 30 S. E. 770.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 273*)—PRESENTATION OF QUESTIONS IN TRIAL COURT—INSTRUCTIONS.

An exception to the charge as a whole raises no question for the decision of this court. The alleged errors specifically pointed out under this general exception are without any substantial merit; the instructions as a whole being fair, full and correct on all the issues made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 273.*]

11. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1004*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT—AMOUNT OF RECOVERY.

The exceptions in this case are numerous, but without novelty or general interest. Considered in the light of the facts and the well-settled rules of law applicable thereto, we have not discovered any material error. The verdict (for $7,000) is large and generous, but not so manifestly excessive as to show bias, prejudice, or mistake on the part of the jury. The evidence proves that the railroad company was liable in damages, that the plaintiff received serious and permanent injuries, and the amount of the verdict has been approved by the trial judge. No reason is shown for the interference of this court.

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 139*)—SALES OF PERSONALTY—PERFORMANCE.

Where suit was brought for the price of an engine sold under verbal contract, and the evidence for the plaintiffs showed that the engine had been delivered to the buyer, who accepted and used it for several months, the court did not err in charging that, if this was true, the contract was not within the statute of frauds. Civil Code 1910, § 3222, subsec. 7.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

1. CARRIERS (§ 277*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

Where a railway company fails to stop its train and permit a passenger to alight at a flag station to which the company has sold him a ticket, he has a right of action for the recovery of such damages as are legally traceable to the wrongful act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1082-1084; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 277*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

Where, however, the act of the carrier is a mere negligent omission of duty, and the passenger's injury consists wholly of the inconvenience occasioned by having to walk a short distance back to the station, the carrier is liable for nominal damages only.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1082-1084; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 278*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

ceding headnote, nominal damages only are recoverable, and there are no aggravating circumstances connected with the mere negligent omission of duty, it is error to instruct the jury that punitive damages may be recovered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 278.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 278*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

In such a case it is also error to charge the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 4504, in reference to vindictive damages, especially that portion of the section which provides: "The worldly circumstances of the parties, the amount of bad faith in the transaction, and all the attendant facts should be weighed."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 278.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 276*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—BREACH OF CONTRACT—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where, in the trial of such a case, the carrier admits the negligence alleged, the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 2780, relating to the presumption of negligence against a carrier, have no application.
